were reasonably safe. While this language is used in some opinions, it has always been used where ordinary care would furnish an appliance that would be reasonably safe; but railroad cars sometimes will not be reasonably safe, although ordinary care has been used. In addition to this, the gist of this action is not the furnishing of an unsafe car. The coal company did not furnish the car. The gist of the action is that the coal company did not furnish Jones reasonable assistance, and required him to do the work in a way that was not reasonably safe. This is the cause of action set out in the petition. The instruction of the court does not follow the cause of action set out in the petition, or attempted to be shown by the evidence. For the same reason instruction No. 5 should not have been given. Instruction No. 4 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that as a matter of law, when a servant enters in the employ of a master, he assumes the risk ordinarily incident to his employment; but, in the absence of an agreement to do so, he is not bound to inspect machinery with which he works." All that part of the instruction following the word "but" should have been omitted. Instruction No. 6 is as follows: "If the jury further believe from the evidence that it was the duty of the plaintiff to inspect the cars before using them, and he failed to do so, or did it in a negligent or careless manner, then the plaintiff cannot recover unless the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was acting at the time under the direct orders of a superior servant, and was prevented from making an inspection of the cars by the orders of a superior servant of the defendant." There was nothing in the evidence to warrant the giving of that part of this instruction following the word "unless." If it had appeared from the evidence that, when the bank boss told Jones to run both ends that day, he had told the bank boss that this would leave him no time to inspect the cars and the bank boss had told him to go on for that day and run both ends anyhow, then an instruction of this sort might be proper, but the evidence did not show anything of this sort.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

BOWMAN v. STRAIGHT CREEK COAL & COKE CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 28, 1909.)

JUDGMENT (§ 143*) — DEFAULT JUDGMENT — SETTING ASIDE — GROUNDS.

When a case was called for trial on April 30th, the court gave judgment for plaintiff, subject to be set aside if defendant presented a defense within three weeks thereafter. On May 21st defendant tendered an answer, presenting both a defense and counterclaim and supported by affidavits. The answer and exhibits also disclosed that the preparation of the answer required the examination of a great many papers, books, and accounts. Held, that it was error to refuse to set aside the judgment and to reject the answer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bell County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by the Straight Creek Coal & Coke Company against R. L. Bowman. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing to set the judgment aside and to permit defendant to file an answer, he appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Cook & Jones and Hazelrigg & Hazelrigg, for appellant. Wm. Ayres, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. On March 16, 1908, the appellant executed to the appellee a note for $3,172.63, payable one day after date. To secure the payment of this note appellant pledged 80 shares of stock in the Pineville Electric Light, Power & Ice Company. On April 8, 1908, the appellee brought suit on the note, and in due time appellant was summoned to appear at the April term, which commenced on April 27th. On April 30th judgment was rendered by default and an order entered directing a sale of the stock to satisfy the note. During the term, and on May 21st, the appellant tendered an answer and counterclaim, supported by affidavit, and moved the court to set aside the judgment and allow the tendered pleading to be filed. The court overruled the motion, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment on the note, as well as the order refusing to set aside the judgment and permit the pleading to be filed.

We express no opinion concerning the answer and counterclaim, except to say that it contained matter presenting both a defense and counterclaim. The only question we are concerned with is whether the court should have set aside the judgment and allowed this pleading to be filed. The answer and affidavit, in addition to setting out the reasons why an answer was not filed when the case was called for trial, contained the following uncontradicted statement: "And at the beginning of the present term his counsel sought to obtain an agreement with counsel for the plaintiff, appellee, whereby he could have at least 15 days' further time to answer; and, failing to get this agreement, on the calling of this case on the fourth day of the present term, he appealed to the court for such time to answer. Whereupon the court announced that judgment might go in favor of plaintiff, subject to be set aside if defendant presented a defense within three weeks thereafter; that his attorneys had been devoting most of their time since then to the preparation of said answer, barring such time as his attorney was called away to London and Monticello, covering about one week, to look about litigation that imperatively demanded the attention of said attorney."

In view of this statement and the further fact that the answer and exhibits disclosed that it was necessary that a great many papers, books, and accounts should be examined in preparing the answer, we think the court erred in refusing to set aside the judgment and in rejecting the tendered pleading.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to set aside the judgment and allow the answer and counterclaim to be filed.

FANTZ v. STEINMETZ.

1. WILLS (§ 693*)—CONSTRUCTION—POWER TO DISPOSE OF PROPERTY.

By will testator gave his widow for life or during her widowhood the whole of his real estate with power to sell any of it for reinvestment or for the support of herself and children, and authorized her to make advancements to the children to the extent of one-third of their legal share, and provided that there should be no division of the real estate until the marriage of the widow and all the children of testator should become 21 years of age. Held, that the widow had power after the children had all become of age, though she had not married, to partition some of the real estate among the children if she deemed that course to be for the best interest of herself and children.

2. WILLS (§ 693*)—CONSTRUCTION—POWER TO DISPOSE OF PROPERTY.

The will further providing that "in the division of my estate all my children shall receive an equal share, and if any one of them should die before said division takes place and leaves children, said children shall be entitled to the share of their parent," testator's grandchildren could not complain of a partition by the widow among testator's children when the latter all became of age, as in that case the grandchildren could not take under the will.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action for specific performance by Conrad Steinmetz against Fred J. Fantz. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. Frank Withers, for appellant. L. A. Hickman, for appellee.

SETTLE, C. J. This appeal presents for consideration the question whether a deed tendered appellant by appellee, and purporting to convey a lot 22 by 150 feet fronting on Logan street near Breckenridge, in the city of Louisville, will pass to the former a good and merchantable title to the lot. The written contract of sale particularly describes the lot, sets forth its purchase by appellant at the price of $600, his promise to pay that amount upon the delivery of a deed conveying a good title, and the undertaking of appellee to make him such a deed. The deed was duly executed by appellee and tendered appellant, but the latter refused to accept it on the ground that it would not pass to him a good title. The nonacceptance of the deed was followed by the bringing of this action by appellee for a specific performance of the contract; the petition setting forth the essential facts and questions of law appertaining to the rights of the parties. A demurrer was filed by appellant to the petition, which the court overruled. Appellant stood upon the demurrer and refused to plead further. The court then entered judgment granting the relief prayed in the petition, and of that judgment appellant complains.

The lot in controversy formerly belonged to Henry Krupp, who died in 1890, the owner of considerable real estate in the city of Louisville. Krupp left a will by which he devised his entire estate to his wife for life or during her widowhood, with remainder to his children, of whom there were and are eight, all now adults. The widow, now 80 years of age, is still living, and has never remarried. In 1906 the widow made partition of some of the real estate left by the testator, the lot in controversy being allotted to Rosa Krupp, an unmarried daughter. Rosa received a deed thereto in which her mother, brothers, and sisters, the wives of the former and husbands of the latter, all united. Later she sold and conveyed the lot to John Kirchdofer, who thereafter sold, and with his wife, conveyed, it to appellee.

It is conceded by the parties to the appeal that the question of whether appellant will receive a good title to the lot in question by the deed appellee tendered him depends upon whether the widow of Henry Krupp had the power under his will to partition the real estate devised. Appellant denies that the will confers upon her such power. The following clauses of the will appear in the record, viz.:

"(3) After the payment of all my just debts, I will, bequeath and devise the rest of all my property real and personal, and mixed, wherever it be situated, to my beloved wife, Francisca Krupp, to hold, use and enjoy the same during her natural life or widowhood, but it is my will and desire that she will give all our children a proper education and support the same until they become of age or marry.

"(4) I give and grant to my said wife full power and authority to sell and convey any and all of my real estate, if she deems it proper to do so, and to reinvest the proceeds in real estate or other property to be held in the same manner as that sold or to use the proceeds to her own support or to the support and education of our children, if such is necessary.

"(5) No division of my estate shall take place during the life of my said wife as long as she remains my widow, and in case my wife should die before my youngest child becomes of age, or if she should marry again my estate shall not be divided before my youngest child becomes of age.

"(6) If my wife deems it proper to make advancements to any of my children she may do so to the extent of one-third of their legal share, but such advancements shall be charged against them as part of their claim in the division of my estate.

"(7) In the division of my estate all of my children shall receive an equal share, and if any one of them should die before said division takes place and leaves children, said children shall be entitled to the share of their parent.

"(8) If my wife should marry again, all power and authority given to her by this instrument shall cease and the court shall appoint a proper guardian for my children and a proper administrator of my estate, in this case one-fifth of my whole estate shall be allotted to her to belong to her absolutely in lieu of dower or any other claim against my estate.

"(9) The shares of my estate which will come to any of my daughters shall belong to them as their private property free from the claim and control of their future husbands not subject to any of the debts of their husbands.

"(10) I appoint my wife, Francisca Krupp, executrix of this my last will and testament and desire that no bond or security shall be requested of her as such."

By the third, fourth, and sixth clauses of the will the testator gives his widow for life or during her widowhood the whole of his real estate, the power to sell and convey any of it for reinvestment and for the support of herself and children and the education of the latter, and also the power to make advancements to the children to the extent of one-third of their legal shares, respectively.

It is unnecessary to determine whether the lot in question was conveyed Rosa Krupp by way of advancement. It is not so claimed in the petition, or therein averred that when conveyed her it did not exceed in value one-third of her interest in the entire estate. It is true the deed of partition refers to the lot as an advancement, but it does not state its value, or say whether it is of greater or less value than one-third of what Rosa will be entitled to from the estate. So, in view of the condition of the record, we cannot rest the partition or conveyance of the lot to her on the ground that it was authorized by the sixth clause of the will which confers upon the widow the power to make advancements to the children. Nor are we prepared to say that a mere general power given the widow by a will to sell the real estate for reinvestment necessarily confers the power to make partition, though such seems to be the view of the law stated in 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (1st Ed.) p. 940, and also by the Supreme Court in Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 25 L. Ed. 855. This court does not seem to have passed on the precise question here presented; so, in determining it, we must rely upon recognized rules of construction as applied to wills, keeping in view the importance of ascertaining the intention of the testator.

Clause 5 of the will provides that there shall be no division of the testator's real estate until two events happen: (1) The marriage of his widow; (2) when all the testator's children become 21 years of age. It is insisted for appellant that another thing was also necessary—that is, the death of the widow—but we incline to the opinion that it was the testator's intention that his widow's life or death should make no difference as to when the division should take place. In other words, we think it was his intention to prevent a division as long as his wife was a widow and might desire to postpone it, so that she might have the control of the whole estate and the benefit of the entire income. At the time of the partition one of the events provided for by the will had happened, the youngest child had reached the age of 21, though the widow was still unmarried. She was then 78 and is now 80 years of age. Having lived a widow 18 years and reached that age, there is little room for doubt that she will remain a widow until she dies. It is true, as contended by appellant, that clause 5 of the will declares that partition shall not be made as long as the testator's wife remains a widow, but other clauses of the will must be read in connection with that clause and the intention of the testator gathered from the will as a whole. Other clauses of the will, especially the third and fourth, show the testator's solicitude for both wife and children and charge the estate with their support, and the fourth clause confers upon the former full power to sell the real estate for the support of herself and children and the education of the latter; the whole matter being left to her discretion. The deed of partition, according to its express declarations, was made for the purpose of providing for the support of the widow and children; and who but the widow was to judge of the necessity of the partition for that purpose? Being invested by the will with the sole discretion and made the only judge in the matter, we will not assume, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the recitals of the deed which recaved her sanction are untrue, or that the partition was not necessary for the support of herself and children when she therein declared it was.

But whether a division of the real estate as here made was, strictly speaking, an application of it to the support of the testator's widow and children in the meaning of the will, is not so material after all. We are convinced that the restriction that the division should not take place during the widowhood of the testator's wife was intended for her protection and to secure to her absolute control of the property, as well as the right to decide for herself whether it was to her best interest to do away with the restriction. If it was for her protection alone, and she waived the restriction and had the right to do so, others cannot complain of the act, and she would be estopped to do so. It is insisted, however, for appellant, that the grandchildren of the testator have an interest as contingent remaindermen in the real estate devised by the will, clause 7 of which provides: "In the division of my estate all my children shall receive an equal share, and if any one of them should die before said division takes place and leaves children, said children should be entitled to the share of their parent." If, as we have indicated, it was the intention of the testator in imposing the restriction upon the division of the realty to better protect the widow in the absolute control thereof, and yet permit her to make such disposition of it as she might deem necessary for the support of herself and children, including the right to partition it and her decision that such partition was necessary when made is conclusive as to the other devisees, it follows that none of the testator's grandchildren can complain of the division; for their parents, the testator's children, were all living when the real estate was partitioned. Therefore the grandchildren can take nothing under the will.

The judgment of the circuit court, being in accord with the conclusion we have expressed, is hereby affirmed.

BOARD OF COUNCILMEN OF CITY OF FRANKFORT v. HERNDON'S ADM'R

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 78*)—FINAL ORDER—ABATEMENT OF ACTION.

An order reciting that the case had been heard on plaintiff's motion to have its amended petition treated as a petition, and that the action stand on such petition as an original action, and the court, being sufficiently advised, overruled the motion, and, plaintiff declining to proceed further, it was adjudged that the action be abated, was in effect a final order of dismissal, and was appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 471; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 643*)—LIEN FOR TAXES—ENFORCEMENT.

In a suit to enforce a lien for taxes, a claim of lien for additional taxes for a subsequent year on the same land was properly set up by amended petition, as authorized by Civ. Code Prac. § 694, subsec. 3.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1308; Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

3. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 58*) — NEW CAUSE OF ACTION—AMENDED PETITION.

Suit having been instituted in December, 1901, to enforce a tax lien, no further action was taken until December 5, 1904, when defendant demurred. The record was lost, and defendant died in January, 1905, after which the record was supplied in 1906, and attempts made to revive the action. In December, 1906, an amended petition was filed, setting up a lien for additional taxes for 1902, on which process was issued and served on the personal representatives of the original defendant. Held, that the amended petition set up a new cause of action, and hence the abatement of the original cause of action would not abate the action pleaded by the amendment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Board of Councilmen of the City of Frankfort against Hallie Herndon's administrator and others. From an order abating the action, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. Cromwell, for appellant. John W. Ray, for appellees.

CLAY, C. On December 31, 1901, the board of councilmen of the city of Frankfort instituted an action in the Franklin circuit court to enforce a lien of the city of Frankfort for taxes on a lot of ground owned by Miss Hallie Herndon for the years 1897 and 1898. This action was filed just a few days before the statute of limitations would have barred the claim of the city for the year 1897. No action was taken in the case until September 5, 1904, when the defendant filed a demurrer to the petition. The record was lost, and the defendant died in January, 1905. The record was supplied under an order of the court in the year 1906. Thereafter an attempt was made to revive the action against the administrator, and after the expiration of 12 months from the appointment and qualification of the administrator an attempt was made to revive it against defendant's real representatives. On December 27, 1906, appellant filed in the clerk's office of the Franklin circuit court an amended petition, setting up a lien for additional taxes for the year 1902. This amended petition was filed a short time before the statute of limitations would have barred the claim. Process was issued upon the amended petition and served upon the personal and real representatives of the original defendant, Hallie Herndon, but not ten days before the first day of the January term, 1907. At this term of the court appellees moved that the action abate for the want of revivor in proper time. At the same time appellant moved that its amended petition, filed on December 27, 1906, be considered as an original petition. At its September term, 1908, the court overruled appellant's motion and ordered that the action be abated. From this order this appeal is prosecuted.

The first question presented is whether or not the order appealed from is a final order. The order appealed from is as follows: "This cause having been heard upon the motion made by plaintiff that its amended petition be treated and considered as a petition, and that said action proceed on said petition as an original action, and the court, being sufficiently advised as to the matters of law arising thereon, overruled said motion; and, plaintiff declining to plead further, it is adjudged that the action be abated, to all of which plaintiff excepted, and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted." It is manifest that this order not only overrules the motion of plaintiff to have its amended petition treated and considered as a petition, but directs that the action itself be abated. The effect of the order is the same as if it directed that the amended petition be dismissed. By this order appellant was out of court. It could take no further steps in the court below so far as the present action was concerned. We therefore conclude that the order appealed from was a final order.

As to the main question, it is the contention of counsel for appellees that the abatement of the original action carried with it the abatement of every proceeding that was a part of that action. The amendment in question, however, was not made for the purpose of strengthening the original petition; in fact, it presented an entirely different cause of action. It attempted to set forth a lien for taxes for years other than those embraced in the original cause of action. It derived no support from the original petition, nor did it add any strength to that petition. Inasmuch as the lien sought to be enforced was a lien upon the same property involved in the original action, it was entirely proper that the lien should be set up in the same action by amended petition; indeed, that is the method pointed out by the Code (subsection 3, § 694, Civ. Code Prac.). Had no process been served upon decedent's administrator and her heirs, a different question would be presented. In the case before us, however, the cause of action arising upon the amended petition, taken in connection with the service of process upon the parties in interest, has in it all the elements of an original action. The effect of the amended petition being the same as if it were an original petition, we think it would be taking entirely too narrow a view of the question to hold that the amended petition should abate, along with the original action, merely because the subsequent action was instituted by way of amended, instead of original, petition. Whether or not the action represented by the amended petition should abate should depend entirely upon whether or not it was in effect a new action, and not upon the fact that the pleading by which it was instituted was denominated an amended petition. Tested by this rule, the trial court should have directed that the amended petition be treated as an original action, and erred in dismissing the amended petition along with the original action.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MILLER'S ADM'R v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.

1. RAILROADS (§ 370*)—INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

The rule that where the public generally, with the acquiescence of a railroad company, has continuously used the tracks for a long time, the presence of persons on the track must be anticipated by the company in running its trains, so that as to such persons it must give warning and keep a lookout, is confined to cities and thickly populated communities.

2. RAILROADS (§§ 355, 365, 369, 376*)—TRESPASSERS ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

A pedestrian on a railroad track going from the depot to a town of 160 inhabitants 1,200 feet away is a trespasser, and the company does not owe to him the duty of keeping a lookout, of having the train under a reasonable control, and of giving timely warning of the approach of the train, but must exercise ordinary care to prevent injuring him after actually discovering his peril.

3. RAILROADS (§ 377*)—TRESPASSERS—CARE REQUIRED.

Trainmen may presume that a trespasser on the track will hear the repeated whistles, and will heed the same, and get off the track, until it becomes reasonably apparent that he is oblivious of the approach of the train.

4. RAILROADS (§ 376*)—INJURIES TO TRESPASSERS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action for the death of a person struck by a train, the evidence showed that decedent was a trespasser, and that he was so deaf that he could not hear the signals, and that after his presence on the track was discovered the brakes were applied, the engine reversed, and repeated blasts of the whistle sounded until he was struck, the evidence failed to show actionable negligence, though there was no proof that the engine bell was rung.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ohio County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by J. L. Miller's administrator against the Illinois Central Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. B. Likens, for appellant. H. P. Taylor, Blewitt Lee, and Trabue, Doolan & Cox, for appellee.

CLAY, C. This action was instituted by J. W. Miller, as administrator of Joseph L. Miller, deceased, against the appellee, Illinois Central Railroad Company, to recover damages growing out of the death of his intestate. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the railroad company asked for a peremptory instruction. This was refused. At the conclusion of all the testimony the motion for a peremptory instruction was renewed, and sustained. Judgment was then entered in favor of appellee. From that judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

The record discloses the following facts: Horse Branch, in Ohio county, Ky., is a town of the sixth class, and has about 160 inhabitants. Appellee owns and operates a line of railroad through the town. It also operates a branch line extending from the main line at Horse Branch to Owensboro. Appellee's depot is located about 1,200 feet east of the town limits. On January 22, 1908, appellant's intestate, Joseph L. Miller, arrived at Horse Branch depot on appellee's east-bound train, which arrived at about 12:55 a. m. About an hour later he was struck and killed by appellee's freight train No. 151. Besides the track on which appellant's intestate was struck, appellee had three other tracks: One known as the "Horse Branch" track, another the "business" track, and the third "the siding." The point at which the accident occurred was not within the limits of the town of Horse Branch, but was at a point 40 feet east of the town limits. The accident did not occur on a public road or street. Appellee's tracks, as they approach the depot and for 400 or 500 feet beyond it, have a considerable curve. The depot is about 1,200 feet from the place of the accident. The distance of the place of accident from the point where the track begins to curve around the depot is 767 feet; that is, the track is straight for about that distance. As the train which struck decedent approached Horse Branch, it whistled for the semaphore and received the board. It answered the board by two short blasts of the whistle. As it rounded the curve onto the straight track, it whistled certain signals to one or more trains standing on the side tracks. At that time there were three other trains on tracks other than that upon which appellant's intestate was killed. There were also some box or storage cars upon these tracks. While the decedent might have been seen from the depot if all the tracks were clear, it is certain from the evidence that the trains and cars upon the track obstructed the view of the engineer and fireman of the train until the straight track was reached. There was some testimony to the effect that the decedent had been loitering around the place of the accident a few minutes prior to the time he was killed. According to the testimony of the engineer and fireman in charge of the train that killed decedent, and of the only eyewitness who testified for plaintiff, the engineer, immediately upon reaching the straight track, gave the alarm signal, applied the brakes, reversed the engine, and continued to signal by repeated blasts of the whistle until decedent was killed. According to the testimony of an engineer who was in charge of an engine upon a side track, the decedent hesitated as if undecided whether to go to one side or the other side of the track. He was then struck and killed. The decedent was quite deaf. One witness testified that he had to write in order to talk to people, although witness claimed that decedent could hear a loud noise. The repeated blasts blown by the engineer were heard by witness as located some distance from the place of the accident. The train causing the injury consisted of 26 cars. It ran 43 car lengths after the engineer discovered decedent's position. Its speed at the time was about 40 miles per hour.

There was proof to the effect that there was some travel along appellee's tracks between Horse Branch and the depot; that passengers from Horse Branch in going to and from the depot, instead of using the road provided for that purpose by the railroad company, would use appellee's tracks. It is therefore insisted by counsel for appellant that this customary use of appellee's tracks imposed upon it the duty of keeping a lookout, of having its trains under reasonable control, and of giving timely warning of the approach of its trains. In discussing when and under what circumstances such duties are imposed upon railroad companies this court, in the recent case of Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. v. Nipp's Adm'r, 125 Ky. 49, 100 S. W. 246, uses the following language: "It has been ruled by this court that, where the public generally with the knowledge and acquiescence of the railroad company have continually used the tracks for a long period of time, the presence of persons on the track at the point where it is so used must be anticipated by the company in running its trains, and it owes to persons thus habitually using its right of way the duty of giving warning and keeping a lookout. Davis v. L. H. & St. L. R. Co., 122 Ky. 528, 92 S. W. 339, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 458, 121 Am. St. Rep. 481; McCabe v. Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co. (Ky.) 89 S. W. 683; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Redmon, 122 Ky. 385, 91 S. W. 722. But the operation of this rule has been confined to cities and thickly populated communities, and has not been and will not be extended to rural communities or sparsely settled regions, although footpaths crossing the track and the right of way may be used by a large number of persons each day. In the country districts traversed by lines of railway it is no uncommon thing for numbers of persons in going to public places, such as schoolhouses, churches, stores, and the like, to use paths or ways that cross the railroad tracks, but that are not private or farm crossings, and also to travel upon the right of way and tracks of the company. It may be also conceded that these persons use the right of way and tracks of the company with its acquiescence in the sense that it does not interfere with their use, or take steps to prevent it; but this use by individuals of the tracks and right of way of railroad companies in places of this character does not convert them from trespassers into licensees, nor does it impose upon the company any duty of lookout or warning. Persons who thus use the tracks and right of way do so at their peril. They are trespassing upon dangerous premises, and assume the risk of any accident that may befall them by passing trains. Gregory v. L. & N. R. R. Co. (Ky.) 79 S. W. 238; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. See (Ky.) 79 S. W. 252; Brown v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 97 Ky. 228, 30 S. W. 639; C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Perkins (Ky.) 47 S. W. 259; Wilmuth's Adm'r v. Illinois Central R. R. Co. (Ky.) 76 S. W. 193; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Redmon, 122 Ky. 385, 91 S. W. 722. The same distinction is also pointed out in the case of Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Murphy's Adm'r, 123 Ky. 787, 97 S. W. 729, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 352. This is one of the cases upon which appellant relies. The accident in this case did not occur at a public crossing; nor did it occur within an incorporated town. It is therefore governed by the rule applying to injuries inflicted upon persons walking along railroad tracks in or near villages or sparsely settled hamlets. In such cases the party injured or killed is treated simply as a trespasser, to whom there is owing no duty except to use ordinary care to avoid injuring him after his peril is discovered. L. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Jolly (Ky.) 90 S. W. 977; Smith v. I. C. R. R. Co. (Ky.) 90 S. W. 254; L. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Hathaway, 121 Ky. 668, 89 S. W. 724, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 498; M. & O. R. R. Co. v. Dowdy (Ky.) 91 S. W. 709; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Redmon, 122 Ky. 385, 91 S. W. 722.

As appellee did not owe to the decedent the duty of keeping a lookout, of having the train under reasonable control, and of giving timely warning of the approach of the train, the only question involved in this case is whether or not those in charge of the train used ordinary care to prevent injuring the decedent after his peril was actually discovered. It is insisted that the fact that the engineer saw the decedent when he was 1,200 feet away, and the train after striking the decedent ran its full length, was evidence of the fact that those in charge of the train failed to exercise ordinary care to stop it after seeing decedent on the track. As stated above, however, there is nothing in the record to show that decedent's peril was discovered until the straight track was reached. The train was then 767 feet distant. Furthermore, those in charge of the train had a right to presume that the decedent would hear the repeated blasts of the whistle, and would heed them and get off the track, until it became reasonably apparent from his manner that he was oblivious of the approach of the train. The undisputed evidence shows that after decedent's presence upon the track was discovered the brakes were applied, the engine reversed, and that repeated blasts of the whistle were sounded until decedent was struck. It is true there was no proof that the bell was rung; but it is manifest that, if the decedent could not have heard the louder and more effective signals resulting from the blasts of the whistle, he could not have heard the ringing of the bell. This fact under the circumstances of this case did not constitute negligence.

A careful reading of the entire record convinces us that the unfortunate accident resulting in the death of decedent was due, not to any negligence upon the part of the railroad company, but to his own deafness which prevented him from hearing the signals, which would have been heard by any one not suffering from the same affliction. We therefore conclude that the peremptory instruction in favor of appellee was proper.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Ben J. Mattingly against the Kentucky Coal Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Drury & Drury, for appellant. L. O. Flournoy, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. The Kentucky Coal Mining Company issues to its miners aluminum checks stamped on one side "Kentucky Coal Mining Company," and on the other side, "Good for one dollar in merchandise." It issues similar checks for 50, 25, 10, and 5 cents. Ben J. Mattingly became the owner of these checks for value to the amount of $235.65, and, the company declining to pay them, he brought this suit to recover the amount. A trial was had upon which the following agreement of facts was filed:

"That defendant is a corporation operating a coal mine at Waverly, and pays its laborers at the times required by law. Further, that frequently its laborers make application to it in advance of pay day for assistance, and that it did upon such application issue to said laborers aluminum checks or coins marked '100,' '50,' etc., and at the time of the issue of said checks or coins it agreed upon pay day to redeem same at their value, which it was agreed was as follows: A check marked '100' was good for 90 cents; a check marked '50' was good for 45 cents; a check marked '25' was good for 22½ cents; a check marked '10' was good for 9 cents; and a check marked '5' was good for 4½ cents. No checks were ever issued to pay wages that were due, and often checks were issued when nothing had been earned. For such checks the laborers were charged as follows: For check marked '100' they were charged $1; for check marked '50' they were charged 50 cents; for check marked '25' they were charged 25 cents; for check marked '10' they were charged 10 cents; for check marked '5' they were charged 5 cents. The defendant had an arrangement with several merchants in Waverly for the redemption of such checks at the agreed value for which it redeemed same from the miners. It had no such agreement with Mattingly. The checks offered by Mattingly are of the type and kind issued by defendant. For such coins the defendant paid the following sums on pay day. For the coin marked '$1' it paid 90 cents; for the coin marked '50' it paid 45 cents; for the coin marked '25' it paid 22½ cents; for the coin marked '10' it paid 9 cents; and for the coin marked '5' it paid 4½ cents; all in money. Plaintiff demanded payment of these checks both in merchandise and in money, and payment was refused, except upon the terms stated just above, and that this would only be paid him provided he would deposit these checks on either the 1st or 15th of the month, and the defendant would pay these checks upon the above terms on the following pay day. The company redeemed all checks on same terms, whether same were presented by the merchant or the miner to whom they were issued. Coins represented in the majority of cases actual value of labor done or to be done frequently issued when no work had been done and often as pure charity; that is to say, sometimes a miner would come in and could not get board and the company would advance aluminum checks. Often men left and the company would get no return. Not more than $25 or so was so issued. Sometimes miners overdrew and quit company. All checks issued company expected to redeem at 90 cents on the dollar, the 10 cents to pay for bookkeeping and profit and loss.

"It is further agreed: That checks or coins similar to those sued on in this case were issued by defendant company to its miners from time to time, and that same passed current in the town of Waverly where the defendant's mine was located, and were redeemed by defendant company from any holder at the prices stated in the first part hereof, and that plaintiff Mattingly is now the holder for value of the checks or coins sued on and made part of his petition. That it is impossible to say or ascertain to whom defendant issued and delivered the checks sued on herein. It is further agreed that the plaintiff, Mattingly, is not a miner and has never been so, and has never been in the employment of the defendant, but has gone into the open market, and has bought the coins sued on at a discount for a speculation, and for the purpose of testing the question of the right of the defendant to issue such coins to its miners as aforesaid. Plaintiff bought these coins from the Waverly Mercantile Company, and that company had gotten these coins in the usual course of trade, and got the most of them from a butcher in Waverly, and the butcher, in turn, from the sale of meat to the employees of the defendant or their families, and possibly some of them from other parties as such coins passed current generally all over the town of Waverly with the knowledge of the defendant.

"After issue and after passing into the channels of trade, the identity of the coin is lost."

The defendant's answer contained, among other things, the following: "The defendant says it has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether or not it ever issued the checks sued on and described in plaintiff's petition, or that same were ever delivered by defendant to any employé or that they represented the true value of the labor performed, or that plaintiff is now the owner of any of said checks or coins for value, or that the face value of these represents two hundred and thirty-five dollars and sixty-five cents ($235.65) or any other sum."

The rule is that a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief is not good as to facts within the defendant's knowledge. The defendant is presumed to know its own checks, and it cannot require the plaintiff to prove the genuineness of a check when it is unwilling to say the check is not genuine. For the same reason this allegation is insufficient as to the delivery of the checks to an employé. The checks are a promise in writing to pay, and the law presumes they were based on an adequate consideration. The agreed facts show that the plaintiff was the holder for value of the checks sued on.

This brings us to the real question in the case: Has the defendant a right to a deduction of 10 per cent. from the face of the checks? Section 244 of the Constitution is as follows: "All wage earners employed in this state in factories, mines, workshops or by corporations shall be paid for their labor in lawful money. The General Assembly shall prescribe adequate penalties for violations of this section." Under this section the defendant may lawfully issue checks to its miners to show what it owes them, but these checks must at the next bimonthly pay day be paid at their face value; otherwise, the miners will not be paid for their labor in lawful money, but will be scaled one-tenth of their earnings because a check was issued to them. Section 2219, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 1815), provides: "All contracts and assurances made, directly or indirectly, for the loan or forbearance of money, or other thing of value, at a greater rate than legal interest, shall be void for the excess over the legal interest." The company did not lend its men any money. Its lending its credit to them until the next bimonthly pay day in consideration of a deduction of 10 per cent. from their wages was a contract the law will not sanction or enforce. If such contracts were upheld, our usury laws would be vain and useless; for they could in this way be evaded without the lender being out of his money at all.

We are therefore of opinion that the circuit court on the agreed facts properly entered judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. PAYNE.

1. CARRIERS (§ 317*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger while alighting at a depot, the evidence showed that the approach of the train to the depot had been properly announced, and that the way from the train to the platform was lighted by a brakeman, evidence of the extent of the carrier's freight business, conducted at its freight depot on the other side of the track, and on the side that the passenger attempted to alight, was inadmissible, at least in the absence of evidence that the passenger knew of the existence of the freight depot, or that he had business to transact there.

2. CARRIERS (§ 286*) — DEPOTS — CARE REQUIRED.

A carrier must keep its depot platform and approaches thereto properly lighted, so as to permit passengers to pass safely to and from the train.

3. CARRIERS (§ 317*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for injuries to a passenger while alighting at a station, by the sudden starting of the train, evidence of negligent failure to properly light the depot was inadmissible.

4. WITNESSES (§ 37*)—COMPETENCY—KNOWLEDGE.

A witness coming to a town in the spring is incompetent to testify as to the manner and extent of the lighting by a carrier of its depot platform at the town during the summer before.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where the ground relied on for a recovery is the commission of a negligent act in one respect, it is prejudicial to permit evidence establishing another and different negligent act.

6. TRIAL (§ 110*)—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

Where counsel for the successful party persistently pursued a line of interrogation of witnesses which the court ruled to be wrong, and which one reasonably acquainted with the rules of evidence knew to be improper, and the course pursued was for the purpose of prejudicing the jury, the conduct of the counsel was reversible error.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—REVERSAL AND RETRIAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

Where instructions have been approved by the appellate court as the law of the case, only such instructions should be given on a retrial where the evidence on the retrial is the same as on the former trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by T. L. Payne against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Benjamin D. Warfield, William C. McChord, and William W. Spalding, for appellant. Hugh P. Cooper, for appellee.

LASSING, J. This is the second appeal of this case. The opinion on the former appeal is found in 104 S. W. 752. As the facts are fully stated in that opinion, they are not restated here. Upon the return of the case a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict for $1,000 in favor of the plaintiff, and to reverse the judgment predicated on that verdict, this appeal is prosecuted.

Four grounds are relied upon for reversal: First, that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence; second, that the court erred in admitting incompetent evidence; third, because of misconduct of plaintiff's counsel; and, fourth, for errors in instructing the jury.

We will consider these questions in their natural order. The incompetent evidence complained of as prejudicial is this: Plaintiff was permitted to prove, over the objection of defendant, the extent of its freight business, which was conducted at its freight depot on the south side of the main track; also that the local agent and his assistants had an office at the freight depot, where the freight business of defendant company was transacted. The evident purpose of this testimony was to establish in the plaintiff a right to alight from the train on that side rather than on the north side of the track, or rather to excuse him from being negligent in so doing. Plaintiff was a passenger, and, so far as the record shows, had no business to transact at the freight office, and no occasion to go there, for it does not appear that he knew of the existence of the freight depot on that side of the track. It was about 10 o'clock at night when the train reached the station, and the freight depot was then closed. The approach of the train to the depot had been properly announced, and the way from the train to the platform was lighted by the brakeman, who had a lantern to light the way if additional light was needed. This evidence did not tend in the least to throw any light upon the manner in which plaintiff was injured, and could serve no purpose other than to confuse the minds of the jury.

Again, plaintiff introduced, over the objection of the defendant, evidence as to what lights were maintained at the depot. It is unquestionably the duty of the railroad company to keep its depot platform and approaches thereto properly lighted, so as to afford passengers an opportunity to pass safely to and from the train; and a failure to have the platform and the approaches thereto lighted would render the company liable in damages to one injured as a direct result of such neglect. But the negligence complained of and relied upon in this case was the sudden starting of the train; and, having specified the particular act of negligence relied upon, plaintiff cannot recover by showing other acts of negligence. No claim is made in the pleadings that the platform was not sufficiently lighted, or because of insufficient lights plaintiff could not see where or how to go, but the sole ground relied upon is that the train started with a sudden jerk, and threw him to the ground and under the wheels, to his injury. This evidence, not bearing upon the issue made by the pleadings, was incompetent, and should not have been admitted, and this is especially true as to the evidence of the witness Hagan, who testified that he did not come to Lebanon until in the spring of 1906, and, of course, could know nothing of the way and extent to which the platform was lighted in the summer of 1905, when the accident occurred. He knew nothing of how the platform was lighted at the time of the injury, and could not testify upon this point even if this character of testimony was permissible. All incompetent evidence is not prejudicial to such an extent as to warrant a reversal; but, where the ground relied upon for a recovery is the commission of a negligent act in one respect, it is prejudicial to permit evidence tending to establish another and different negligent act to go to the jury, for the jury would no doubt receive the evidence tending to establish the latter act as having some important bearing upon the act of negligence charged, and hence such evidence would be prejudicial.

The misconduct of counsel complained of in this case was the repeated asking of incompetent questions over the objection of counsel for defendant, and in the face of the rulings of the court that such questions were incompetent. Counsel for plaintiff attempted to establish that the servants in charge of defendant's trains on other occasions had been guilty of acts of negligence similar in character to that for which a recovery was sought in this case. This the court held to be incompetent; but, in spite of his ruling to this effect, counsel for plaintiff persisted in pursuing this line of interrogation almost to the point of exasperation. To each new question bearing upon the same subject counsel for defendant would object, and the objection was promptly sustained, and exception taken, and the question immediately asked in another form with the same result. These questions were incompetent, and the line of interrogation attempted to be pursued wholly improper; and, when the trial court had so decided and ruled, counsel for plaintiff should have desisted in his efforts to bring the matter before the jury. Of course a large discretion is allowed an attorney in presenting his case, and so long as it does not appear that he is knowingly and intentionally violating the rules of practice in the introduction of evidence, or otherwise, the fact that he does so will furnish no grounds of complaint to opposing counsel, where the error is corrected by the court; but in a case like that here presented, where counsel persistently pursues a line of interrogation which the court rules to be wrong, and which one reasonably well acquainted with the rules governing the admission of evidence must know to be improper, the conclusion is irresistible that it is done for the purpose of influencing and prejudicing the minds of the jury in arriving at a verdict. No court should countenance such conduct; and, when the trial judge, because of his kindness of heart, or long-suffering and forbearing nature, permits it to go unpunished, there remains nothing to do but deprive the one offending of the fruits of his victory thus earned. This case must be reversed for other reasons; but, if there were none such, this misconduct upon the part of plaintiff's counsel would furnish abundant grounds for reversal.

The rules of practice now recognized and approved by our court, and courts generally, are the result of ages of experience in the administration of justice. They are necessarily general in their nature and application, and subject to many exceptions, variations, and modifications, and so it is not to be expected that, in their practical application to individual cases, mistakes and errors will not be, at least occasionally, made by counsel. Such, in fact, may be expected; but, where corrected by the trial court, no ground of complaint exists because of such mistake. Since no one is infallible, and all are liable at times to be mistaken, and honestly so, in the exercise of the judgment as to what is competent to be proven in support of a given proposition, errors of this character will necessarily occur with more or less frequency, but such are errors of judgment; they are not of the class with which we are dealing. Where the record shows that an attorney persistently and dogmatically pursues a line of interrogation over the objection of opposing counsel and the adverse ruling of the court to the extent here shown, the conclusion is irresistible that such was not due to error of judgment, but in pursuance of a determination to present the matters about which the questions are asked to the jury in spite of court and counsel. Such conduct should neither be tolerated nor excused by the trial court, and no litigant should be permitted to profit by such practice.

In the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Reaume (Ky.) 107 S. W. 290, it was expressly held to be a reversible error to repeatedly and persistently ask incompetent questions. And in the case of Marcum v. Hargis (Ky.) 104 S. W. 693, this court held that, where a line of questions had been ruled to be incompetent, the trial court did not err in requiring counsel, before he would permit the question to be asked, to first submit it to him, not in the hearing of the jury, in order that he might determine its competency before he would permit it to be asked. The reason for the rule is apparent. Where an incompetent question is asked, opposing counsel must either permit it to be answered or enter his objection; and, although the trial court refuses to permit the question to be answered, the very fact that the same question in a different form is repeatedly asked, and a vigorous objection interposed to its answer, emphasizes its importance in the minds of the jury, and necessarily prejudices the case, and for this reason, if for no other, where this practice is pursued to the extent indicated in the record in this case, the judgment should be reversed.

Excluding from our consideration the evidence which we have held to be incompetent, there was no material difference between the evidence brought out on the last trial and that produced on the former trial. This being so, only the instructions which were approved as being the law of the case on the former trial should have been given. The court, however, in addition to such instructions, gave the two following additional instructions: "No. 7. If you believe from the evidence, that there was no platform opposite where plaintiff attempted to get off the train, or that there was as good a platform on the side where he did attempt to get off, and that he did not increase the danger of injury to himself in any way by attempting to get off on the right-hand side, you cannot find for the defendant under instruction No. 6. No. 7½. The mere fact that the plaintiff was intoxicated, if he was intoxicated, does not affect his right to recover in this case one way or the other, unless you believe from the evidence that by reason of his intoxication he failed to exercise such attention and care for his own safety as might be usually expected of a sober person of ordinary prudence under like circumstances." It has frequently been held that, where certain instructions have been approved as the law of the case, upon a retrial only such should be given, and it is error for the trial court to fail or refuse to give those, or to give other or additional instructions. Of course, if the facts upon the retrial were different from those upon the former trial, the trial court would be justified in making the instructions conform to the facts. Such a condition, however, does not exist in the present case, and the trial court should not have given either instruction 7 or 7½.

As the case must be retried, we again refrain from passing upon the question as to whether or not the verdict is against the evidence; but, for the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for another trial consistent herewith.

KEEN'S ADM'R v. KEYSTONE CRESCENT LUMBER CO.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 88*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

Defendant employed men to cut standing timber and haul the logs to a place where it had established a mill. The superintendent of the lumber camp left, and defendant hired another person with his mill and a fireman, paying for the mill and fireman a stipulated price a month and made the person foreman of the camp. The foreman hired decedent to fire a boiler which exploded and killed him. Held, that the foreman was not an independent contractor, and decedent was an employé of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 144-146; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—FURNISHING DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

Where a master knows that machinery is defective, the servant continuing to work with knowledge of the defect is not precluded from recovery for injuries sustained therefrom, unless he had knowledge of the dangers likely to result from the further use of it.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 205*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—COMPLAINT TO MASTER OF DEFECTIVE APPLIANCE—ASSURANCE OF MASTER OF ABSENCE OF DANGER.

Where a servant, who was firing a defective boiler, drew the foreman's attention to escaping steam and was assured that there was no danger, he had a right to rely upon the assurance and continue at work; the danger not being so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person would have refused to perform the work under the circumstances.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Death action by Shade Keen's administrator against the Keystone Crescent Lumber Company. There was a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

N. J. Auxier and A. E. Auxier, for appellant.

NUNN, J. This action was instituted in the Pike circuit court September 14, 1907, seeking to recover $2,000 in damages for the death of Shade Keen, which was caused by the explosion of a steam boiler in a sawmill operated by appellee company, and in which Keen was working at the time as fireman. At the conclusion of all the testimony the court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for appellee.

It is shown by the pleadings and proof: That Keen had a very short experience in working about a sawmill, and had been firing only seven or eight days; that he was unacquainted with machinery; also, that the boiler which exploded had been in use over 20 years; that the dome on the boiler was cracked and had been for a month or two before the explosion; that the "stay bolts" within the dome stood upright and were fastened below and in the top of the dome to hold it; that for some cause they had decayed and were nearly severed, possibly by rust, at the time the explosion occurred. Appellee, by its answer, admitted that Shade Keen was its servant at the time he was killed, that there was a crack in the dome of the boiler, and that the steam escaped therefrom, but denied that the stay bolts were defective, and alleged that Keen knew of the escape of the steam through the crack in the dome, and that he took the risk of the dangers incident thereto. Appellant, by reply, admitted that Keen knew of the escape of the steam and of the crack in the dome, but alleged that he did not know of the dangers he was subject to in working about it, that he was assured by appellee's superintendent within two or three minutes before the explosion that there was no danger of an explosion and that it was safe for him to work at that place, and, relying upon this assurance, he continued his labor. The testimony of each party authorized all these allegations.

On August 24, 1908, appellee filed an amended answer withdrawing its original allegation and admission concerning the employment of Keen, and alleged that he was the employé of one Thacker and not its servant, that Thacker was an independent contractor operating the mill for himself, that appellee had no control over Keen, and that Thacker controlled him. These allegations were controverted, by agreement, of record. The facts with reference to this matter were, in substance, these: Appellee was the owner of a number of standing trees on a certain creek in Pike county and employed a lot of men to cut the trees and haul the logs to a certain point on the creek where it had established a mill to saw them into lumber of the kind and character fixed in bills furnished by it to the manager or sawyer. One Barcus had been superintendent of this lumber camp, but for some reason left. Then it was appellee employed Thacker and his mill and a fireman for the price of $100 per month, and made Thacker superintendent of the camp. Thacker was introduced by appellant as a witness, and he testified as follows: "I was to have $100 a month for my mill and fireman, and I was to have pay for what work I did. They were to bear the expenses, keep up repairs of the mill. They put me in as foreman at the mill. They paid me $3 per day for this." He also testified that he employed one Dick Syck as fireman, that he performed this labor for some time, but during the latter part of the work he did some of the sawing for which he received $1.50 a day, until upon his (Syck's) complaint his wages were raised, and he did most of the sawing. Keen was employed by the foreman, Thacker, to work at the "skidway," and, when Syck was running the saw, Keen was sent from the skidway to do the firing, and, as stated, the last seven or eight days before the explosion he was firing at the mill the most of his time. His wages were $1.50 per day, no change in which had been made. Thacker testified that Keen knew he was his hand when firing the mill. The facts proved do not show that Thacker was an independent contractor. He and all the other hands at the mill were under the control and directions of appellee, and appellee was required to use reasonable care to furnish reasonably safe appliances and machinery with which its employes were required to labor, and, if the death of Keen resulted from want of such care on its part, it is responsible. When it rented the mill from Thacker, to all intents and purposes it was its mill for the length of the lease, and, in addition to this, it expressly contracted to keep the mill in repair, and the law required it to keep it in a reasonably safe condition. Keen was a laborer for it, and it was as much its duty to furnish reasonably safe machinery for his protection as for Syck or any one else laboring at the mill. He was not in any sense a trespasser.

The case of Edward Messmer, Jr., by, etc., v. Bell & Coggeshall Co. (the opinion in which was delivered by this court March 23, 1909) 117 S. W. 346, is applicable to the case at bar. In that case it was contended by appellee: That one Wommer was employed by it under a special contract to make or squeeze boxes at so much per 1,000, and Wommer was to employ and pay all of his helpers; that Edward Messmer, Jr., was employed by Wommer as one of his helpers; that while he was engaged at labor with Wommer and under his directions he received his injuries. It was admitted that it, by check, paid Messmer his wages, but it was done by the directions of and as a favor to Wommer. The amount of the wages was charged to Wommer, and the company took a credit by it when it settled with Wommer on the contract price it had with him. In discussing that case the court said: "The squeezing of the boxes by Wommer was simply one of the intermediate steps between the beginning and the end. The manufacturing of the boxes was the thing that the employer was doing, and, from the beginning of the box to the end, all the persons who worked on it were under the control of the employer. Without the power of control in the employer, the business could not reasonably be conducted. Wommer was as fully under the control of the foreman of the factory while squeezing boxes as when running the saw or doing other work about the factory. We therefore conclude that Wommer was not an independent contractor, but a servant of the Bell & Coggeshall Company, and that it was liable to the plaintiff for his negligence, if he was negligent."

In the case at bar appellee had control over Thacker and all the hands at the mill, and it is reasonable to presume that Thacker, knowing this fact, reserved the right to select the employe who should fire the mill. However, this did not make such employe the servant of Thacker, but he was a laborer for appellee and entitled to the same protection from it as any other employe in the mill.

It is shown by the testimony, without contradiction, that the mill furnished to do the work was defective and dangerous, and for that reason appellee says that appellant is not entitled to recover because Keen, with the knowledge of that fact, continued to labor at the mill and take the risk. It is true that Keen knew of the crack or defect in the dome of the boiler, but it is not shown that he knew of the danger incident thereto. He knew of the crack, but he might not have known that there was any great risk in continuing his labor. When the master knows that the machinery with which he furnished employes to labor is defective, he must show, before he can relieve himself from liability for injury to one of his employes, to the satisfaction of the jury, that his employe continued to labor with the defective machinery with the knowledge of the defective condition and the dangers likely to result from the further use of it. In addition to this, Keen had a right to rely upon the assurance of Thacker as to the safety of the boiler. As stated, it was shown without contradiction that Keen, two or three minutes before he was killed, called Thacker to him and called his attention to the escaping steam from the dome and expressed a fear of its exploding. Thacker answered that there was no such danger; that it was safe to continue to fire the boiler.

In the case of Lasch, by, etc., v. Stratton, 101 Ky. 672, 42 S. W. 756, it appears that the employe notified the foreman who had charge of the factory that he feared the machinery was defective, but was assured by the foreman that it was not dangerous, and that he continued to operate the machinery relying upon such assurance, and it was held that he had a right to rely upon such assurance and was not guilty of contributory negligence, unless the danger or risk was so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would have refused to perform the work under the circumstances. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Shivell's Adm'x (Ky.) 18 S. W. 944, and Rogers v. South Covington & C. St. Ry. Co. (Ky.) 112 S. W. 630.

Appellant was clearly entitled to have his case submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded for further proceedings herewith.

HITE v. HITE'S EX'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 681*)—ESTATES IN TRUST—APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE—POWER OF COURT.

Testator devised his estate to three trustees, and provided that there should always be two trustees, and that an appointee under an appointment made with the consent of all the adult devisees should not be required to give bond, and that, where an appointment was made without such consent, the trustee should execute a bond. One trustee resigned and one died. All the adult devisees, except one and his daughter, requested the appointment of a son of one of the original trustees. He was fitted for the trust, and would give the matter his personal attention. Held, that the court properly appointed him trustee as against the objection that a trust company should have been appointed.

2. TRUSTS (§ 378*)—TRUSTEES—BONDS—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

A bond of one appointed testamentary trustee conditioned as required in the will on his faithfully discharging the duties, without specifying any amount, is a common-law obligation, and the sureties are responsible for all moneys of the estate coming into the hands of the trustee notwithstanding the act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 125, c. 49), providing that the bond of a fiduciary shall be in a penal sum, and that the surety shall not be liable beyond such sum.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, First Division.

"To be officially reported."

Proceedings for the appointment of a testamentary trustee of the estate of W. C. Hite, deceased. From an order appointing John W. Barr, as trustee, Louis Hite, a devisee, appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Hieatt, for appellant. Humphrey, Davie & Humphrey, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Many years ago W. C. Hite died in Jefferson county, the owner of a large estate. By his will he devised his estate in trust, the income to be paid to certain persons for life, and to others in remainder. He appointed as trustee Thomas L. Barrett, William W. Hite, and Judge John W. Barr. All three qualified. He left a widow and five children. The widow and the oldest son, W. W. Hite, have since died. Judge Barr resigned the trust and Allen R. Hite was appointed in his stead. Thomas L. Barrett died. When W. W. Hite died, Allen R. Hite was the only surviving trustee. The will provided that it was the desire of the testator that there should be always two trustees. It also provided that, if an appointment was made by the written consent of all the devisees over 21 years of age, the trustee so appointed should not be required to give bond; but, if the appointment was made without such consent, then he requested the court to require the trustee to execute "bond with good security for the faithful discharge of his duties." All the adult devisees, except Louis Hite and his daughter, Lucile Hite, requested the court to appoint John W. Barr as trustee, and to allow him to qualify without bond. Louis Hite opposed the appointment, insisting that a trust company should be appointed trustee. The court appointed John W. Barr, who executed a bond conditioned as provided in the will, with security worth double the amount of the estate; and, under an agreement between Barr and the Fidelity Trust Company of which he is the president, it was ordered by the court that he should appoint the Fidelity Trust Company as his agent to manage the trust, the trust company in consideration of receiving the compensation that would go to Barr guaranteeing his fidelity in the management of the estate. From this order Louis Hite has appealed, insisting that the court erred in not appointing as trustee a trust company on the ground that a trust company is better qualified to manage such an estate; that it never dies; that it is always accessible; that it can give bond with less trouble than an individual; and that so large a bond would be required of the trustee that it would be very burdensome for an individual to give it, and difficult for the court to protect the estate by keeping the bond good. He also insists that the bond executed by Barr as trustee does not conform to the statute and is not sufficient.

We do not see that the circuit court abused a sound discretion in the matter. All the adult devisees, except Louis Hite and his daughter, requested the court to appoint Mr. Barr. Among other things, they wished him to be trustee for the reason that his father was one of the original trustees, and on account of the fact that they felt assured that he would give the matter his personal attention, and for other reasons that need not here be elaborated. He is a man eminently fitted for such a trust, and no objection is made here to him on that score. The court is not required to appoint a trust company as trustee, and especially is this true where a majority of the persons interested desire an individual appointed; or when from the nature of the case the appointment of the person selected will be likely to lead to a management of the estate that will be satisfactory to those interested. It seems to us from the record that the court made an ideal selection, and that no interest of the appellant's was prejudiced. The act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 125, c. 49) requires that the bond of a fiduciary shall be in a penal sum, and that the surety shall not be liable beyond the sum so specified. This act was passed manifestly for the benefit of sureties in such bonds, and to protect them from the liability which had been imposed upon them in some cases under the previous statute under which they had been held liable without regard to the amount specified in the bond. The bond here specifying no amount, the sureties of the trustee are responsible for the faithful discharge of his duties by him and for all moneys coming to his hands belonging to the estate. The bond conforms to the provision of the will. The absence of an amount to limit the liability of the sureties can hurt nobody but the sureties, and they are bound upon the bond as a common-law obligation. The proof filed before the chancellor shows that the bond is amply sufficient. If at any time it should develop that the bond is not sufficient, the trustee may be required to give an additional bond in the circuit court.

Judgment affirmed.

HAMILTON et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 21*)— APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR WITH WILL ANNEXED—REVOCATION.

Where the probate of a will nominating no executor is set aside on appeal after the appointment of an administrator with will annexed, the letters of administration to him may be revoked, and an administrator may be appointed, under Ky. St. 1909, § 3897 (Russell's St. § 3920), providing for the appointment of an administrator who will settle the estate as prescribed by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bracken County.

"To be officially reported."

Proceedings for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of Ahab A. Hamilton, deceased, after the setting aside on appeal the probate of the will of the deceased. From an order appointing S. W. Bradford administrator, Oliver T. Hamilton, administrator with will annexed, appeals. Affirmed.

H. P. Willis, W. A. Byron, and Lindsay & Edelen, for appellant. Geo. Doniphan and Geo. B. Kinney, for appellees.

NUNN, J. On April 26, 1908, one Ahab A. Hamilton died domiciled in Bracken county, Ky. He left a paper purporting to be his last will, which was thereafter probated in the Bracken county court; and appellant was duly appointed administrator of his estate with the will annexed, no executor having been nominated in the will, and he duly qualified as such. Thereafter some of the heirs at law of Ahab A. Hamilton appealed from the order of probate to the Bracken circuit court, and on the trial of the appeal the paper was adjudged not to be the last will of Hamilton. Therefore it was ordered by the circuit court that the county court set aside the order probating the will and appointing appellant Oliver T. Hamilton as administrator with the will annexed. The county court complied with this order. On March 2, 1907, the county court, upon motion of the heirs of Hamilton, appointed S. W. Bradford administrator of the estate. Appellant appealed from the judgment of the county court removing him as the administrator with the will annexed to the circuit court. Upon the hearing of the case, that court affirmed the action of the county court, and appellants have appealed from the ruling of the circuit court.

It appears to us that the only question on this appeal is whether appellant or Bradford is legally empowered to settle the estate of Ahab A. Hamilton, and, unfortunately for appellant, he failed to make Bradford a party to this appeal. But, waiving this question, it appears plainly to us that the administrator with the will annexed occupied the same relation to the estate that an executor named in the will would have occupied had one been named and qualified. The administrator with the will annexed is required to settle the estate in the way and upon the terms prescribed in the will. Where there is no will, the administrator settles the estate as prescribed by the statute. He receives his appointment under section 3897, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 3920), which provides that, if no person applies for administration, the county court may at the second term after the death of a person grant administration to a creditor or any other person whom the court in its discretion may appoint. All the parties in interest were before the court in the will case, and were before the county court when Bradford was appointed, and all the heirs, except appellant Oliver T. Hamilton, asked for and approved the appointment of Bradford. The question is: Does the defeat of the probate of the will on the appeal authorize the removal of one who had been appointed administrator with the will annexed? We have not been cited to, nor have we been able to find, any decisions in this state directly upon this point, but the question has been decided in other states. In 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 819, it is said: "If the will is set aside after an administrator with the will annexed is appointed, his letters may be revoked." See the authorities there cited to sustain the text. In the case of Smith v. Stockbridge, 39 Md. 640, the court said: "Where a will which has been admitted to probate has been declared void by the Court of Appeals, administration with the will annexed is also void." See, also, the case of Kilton v. Anderson, 18 R. I. 136, 25 Atl. 907, 49 Am. St. Rep. 751.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

FRISBIE v. BIGHAM MASONIC LODGE NO. 256.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 30, 1909.)

1. PARTY WALLS (§ 5*)—CONTRACT AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF WALL—DURATION OF EASEMENT—DESTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS.

Defendant sold plaintiff a part of a lot for a specified sum and the further consideration of using the wall of the building about to be erected by plaintiff. The deed specified the manner in which defendant was to join her building to that of plaintiff, and provided that certain abutments projecting from plaintiff's wall were to be furnished by plaintiff. Held, that the deed gave defendant a perpetual easement in plaintiff's wall, and on the burning of the buildings defendant could demand that abutments be provided on the rebuilding of plaintiff's building and could use the wall without a payment of any part of the cost to plaintiff, and before the wall was rebuilt the right to the easement was in abeyance.

2. EASEMENTS (§ 42*)—CONSTRUCTION OF GRANT.

Where the language used in a grant of an easement is ambiguous as to the nature or extent of the right, the meaning given to it will be the one most favorable to the claimant of the easement.

3. CONTRACTS (§ 153*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF PARTIES.

A contract should be so construed as to give effect to the intention of the parties, and the language used should receive a common-sense interpretation, and, when the language is indefinite or ambiguous, it is proper to look to the condition of the parties and their probable motive and object.

4. PARTY WALLS (§ 5*)—EXISTENCE OF RIGHT—EVIDENCE.

The fact that plaintiff, on erecting its second buildings, again put its wall in condition for defendant to build to it, and defendant again made use of the wall, was a recognition of the continuation of defendant's right to use the wall.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Party Walls, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Crittenden County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Bigham Masonic Lodge No. 256 against Electa M. Frisbie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

J. G. Rochester and H. V. McChesney, for appellant. L. H. James and Jno. W. Blue, Jr., for appellee.

SETTLE, J. In the year 1895 the appellee, desiring to erect a three-story brick building in Marion, Ky., found that a lot which it then owned was too small to contain such a building, and it therefore purchased of the appellant, who was then Mrs. Electa Boaz, a parcel of ground from an adjoining lot owned by her, receiving of her and her then husband, J. D. Boaz, a deed therefor, which is in words and figures as follows: "This deed of conveyance made and entered into this the 8th day of November, 1895, by and between Electa M. Boaz and John D. Boaz, her husband, residents of Marion, Crittenden county, Kentucky, parties of the first part, and the trustees of Bigham Lodge F. & A. M. No. 256, of Marion, Kentucky, for the use and benefit of said lodge, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of three hundred and forty dollars, cash in hand paid to the parties of the first part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration of joining the south wall of the Masonic building when completed, as herein specified, the parties of the first part have sold and conveyed, and do by these presents, hereby sell and convey to the parties of the second part for the purpose aforesaid, and their successors in office, the following described land lying in Marion, Crittenden county, Kentucky, and at the east end of the Masonic lodge lot: (Description of the land omitted.) It is agreed by and between the parties hereto that the parties of the first part are to have the privilege of joining to the first two stories of Masonic Lodge building, on the south side when erected, but are to join to same by means of a four-inch abutment at the base and brick projecting from said wall for four inches at the second floor, but no holes or indentations is to be made in said wall. Said projecting brick and abutment are to be placed in position by parties of the second part in a safe and substantial manner, but such anchors as may be necessary for the purpose of adjoining are to be furnished by the parties of the first part. Said property is conveyed unto the parties of the second part. To have and to hold forever unto themselves and successors and assigns in office and with covenant of general warranty. In testimony whereof, we have hereunto subscribed our names, this the day and date aforesaid. Electa M. Boaz. J. D. Boaz."

At that time appellant also had in contemplation the erection of a two-story brick business house upon what remained of her lot after the conveyance of a part of it to appellee. Hence the insertion in the deed to the latter of the provisions relating to her right to attach or join her building to the south wall of the building to be erected by appellee. In the years 1895 and 1896 appellee erected its three-story brick building as contemplated, and about the same time, or shortly thereafter, appellant also erected on her lot adjoining that of appellee a two-story brick building as purposed by her. In constructing on its own lot the south wall of its building, appellee, as it had covenanted in the deed from appellant to do, at its own expense extended the foundation over on appellant's lot adjoining, 18 or 20 inches, to furnish a rest for the joists of the ground floor of her building, and further up in its wall made a similar projection for the support of the joists of the second floor of appellant's building. Appellee, by thus extending the foundation of its wall and making the projection therefrom above, enabled appellant to attach her building to it and make the south wall of its building the north wall of hers, all of which was in conformity to the provisions of the deed between the parties.

In March, 1905, these two buildings, with several others in the same block, were destroyed by fire, for which neither appellant nor appellee was responsible. In the spring of 1906 appellant and appellee each again erected a building of the same dimensions to take the place of the one destroyed; that of the latter being first commenced and perhaps first completed. In erecting its last and present building, appellee, by again extending the foundation of its south wall over on appellant's lot for appellant's ground joists, and by making the projection in the wall as a rest for the joists of the second story of her building, again caused the one building to be attached to the other, and made the south wall of appellee's building the north wall of appellant's building. The erection of the south wall of its building up to and including the projection made for the support of the second floor joists of appellant's building seems to have cost appellee $553, and the payment of one-half of this sum, $276.50, it demanded of appellant, but she refused to pay it or any part thereof. Thereupon appellee brought suit against her in the court below for the $276.50, and for $100 damages it claimed to have sustained for injuries resulting to the south wall of its building from the negligence of appellant's employes in erecting her building. The circuit court on the trial rejected appellee's claim for damages, but gave it judgment against appellant for $276.50, as half the cost of that part of its south wall in use as a wall for appellant's building. The latter complains of the judgment, and by this appeal seeks its reversal.

We think it manifest that the deed by which appellant conveyed appellee a part of the ground occupied by its building reserved and conferred upon her a perpetual easement in the south wall of its building. In other words, the right to join her building to the south wall of appellee's building was a part of the contract whereby she parted with the title to the parcel of ground purchased of her by appellee, and a part of the consideration for its sale. Of this there can be no doubt for it is so expressed in the following language of the deed: "That for and in consideration of the sum of three hundred and forty dollars, cash in hand paid to the parties of the first part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration of joining the south wall of the Masonic building when completed, as herein specified, the parties of the first part have sold and conveyed and do by these presents hereby sell and convey to the parties of the second part, for the purposes aforesaid, * * * the following described land. * * *" So careful were the parties in respect to the right thus conferred upon appellant to use the south wall of appellee's building as the north wall of her building, that the further and entire agreement between them in regard thereto was set forth in a subsequent part of the deed with such particularity as to direct the manner in which appellant should attach or join her building to that of the appellee, how the foundation and wall of appellee should be prepared for such use, the preparation therefor to be made by appellee, and that it should be done at its cost. We find nothing in the language of the deed that limits or confines the right or easement thus acquired by appellant to the building erected by appellee immediately following the execution and delivery of the deed. The deposition of appellant clearly shows her understanding that the easement was not confined to the use by her of the wall of that building, but that it was a continuing right which would apply to any building that appellee might erect upon its lot. If such was not the understanding of the persons representing appellee, it does not satisfactorily appear from their testimony. The original contract of sale and deed, later executed, were both written by an official representative of appellee, and, if it had been understood by the contracting parties that there was to be any limitation placed upon appellant's easement in appellee's wall which would have confined it to the building destroyed, he surely would have incorporated it in the deed.

Neither fraud nor mistake in the execution of the deed is alleged. Where a writing indicates an evident intention to grant an easement, but its language is ambiguous as to the nature or extent of the right, it should be given such meaning as would be most favorable to the claimant of the easement. It is also a recognized rule of construction that a contract should be so construed as to give effect to the intention of the parties, and the language used, should receive a common-sense interpretation, and, when it is indefinite or ambiguous, it is proper to look to the condition of the parties, their probable motive and object. While in our opinion appellant, under the contract evidenced by the deed in question, by purchase acquired a perpetual right to join or build to the side wall of any building appellee might have or erect upon the lot adjoining hers, subject to the stipulations contained in the deed as to the manner of doing it, we would not be understood as holding that appellant's right was such that she could, after the destruction of the two buildings, have compelled appellee to rebuild in order that she might again have the use of its wall. After the destruction of appellee's building, and while it had no building on its lot, appellant's easement was in abeyance; but, when it rebuilt, the easement was revived.

We are further of the opinion that, as the right here asserted by appellant is in the nature of a grant based upon a good and sufficient consideration, it carries with it, as a part of the grant, the additional right to demand of appellee that it prepare, in the manner required by the deed and at its own cost, the south wall of its present building for the joining of appellant's building to it. Appellee is as much bound by the terms of the deed to do this at his own expense as it is to allow appellant to join her building to its wall, for the one duty is as imperatively required by the language of the deed as the other; and, in apparent anticipation of appellant's claiming the right to join her building to the south wall of its present building, appellee, as before stated, in erecting that wall, extended it at the foundation and also made the upper projection, as required by the deed, thereby putting it in condition for appellant to build to it, which she has done. These acts of appellee, while not conclusive as amounting to recognition of appellant's right to the use of its wall, would seem to furnish some evidence of their belief in such right.

Although this court has reviewed many cases involving litigated questions as to party walls, it has not had before it a case presenting the precise question now under consideration, nor have we been cited by counsel to a case in point outside of Kentucky; but, notwithstanding the absence of direct judicial authority, we are unable to escape the conclusion that appellant is entitled to the enjoyment of the right she asserts, and that she is not chargeable with any part of the cost to appellee of the south wall of its building or of the work performed by it in preparing the wall for her use.

We have not considered the claim of appellee to damages for alleged injury to its wall charged to appellant, as there is no cross-appeal from that part of the judgment disallowing such damages.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

GREEN v. QUISENBERRY et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 250*)—BOND—ACTION—PETITION.

Plaintiff, a life tenant, leased the land, agreeing to place and hold his tenant in peaceable possession, but, before a crop had been planted, the remaindermen sued both plaintiff and his tenant for forfeiture of plaintiff's life estate for waste, and obtained an injunction restraining plaintiff and his tenant from cropping the land. Held, that a petition on the injunction bond after the injunction had been dissolved, alleging such facts and that plaintiff was damaged by the loss of the rent, stated a cause of action, though it did not allege that the injunction expressly commanded plaintiff not to collect the rent under the lease, or restrained the tenant from paying it; the tenant not being liable for rent because of failure of consideration.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 219*)—DUTY TO OBEY.

It is the duty of the party against whom an injunction is issued to obey it as long as it remains in force, regardless of whether it was rightfully or wrongfully issued.

3. INJUNCTION (§ 252*)—ACTION ON BOND—PETITION.

Plaintiff in an action on an injunction bond is limited to the damages alleged.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 252*)—ACTION ON BOND—ATTORNEY'S FEES—RIGHT TO RECOVER.

Where an injunction is the only relief sought, and gives that relief, if sustained, no recovery for attorney's fees can be had on dissolution of the injunction, but if injunctive relief is ancillary, or is relied on to secure the relief when obtained, a recovery may be had on the bond for reasonable attorney's fees for services in dissolving the injunction; and hence, in an action by the remaindermen against the life tenant and his tenant in possession to forfeit the life estate for waste, where an injunction was obtained against further waste, which was subsequently dissolved, the life tenant was entitled to recover reasonable attorney's fees paid or incurred for services in dissolving the injunction,

"To be officially reported."

Action by John L. Green against J. R. Quisenberry and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. R. Burnam & Son and J. Tevis Cobb, for appellant. S. M. Wallace and W. S. Moberly, for appellees.

SETTLE, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Madison circuit court sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing appellant's petition; the action being one to recover upon an injunction bond damages appellant claims to have sustained by reason of the wrongful issue of an injunction by procurement of the appellee J. R. Quisenberry, who, together with the appellee R. E. Turley, as surety, executed the bond required to obtain it. It appears from the averments of the petition that appellant owns the life estate in a 60-acre tract of land in Madison county which he early in the year 1908 leased to Leonard Minter for a term of three years at an annual rental of $333.33⅓. By the terms of the lease Minter was to clean up the land, put it in suitable condition for cultivation, and cultivate 50 acres of it in corn and tobacco. The lease also contained a covenant that appellant would place and hold Minter in peaceable possession of the leased premises. The latter took possession of the land, and immediately commenced to clean it up preparatory to its cultivation. After Minter had done considerable work in preparing the land for a crop, but before he had an opportunity to plant the crop, the appellee Quisenberry, owner in remainder of the land, brought in the Madison circuit court against the appellant as life tenant and Minter lessee of the land an action for waste and to recover the land by a forfeiture of the life estate of the former and treble damages amounting to $500 for the alleged waste. In that action, following the execution of a proper bond therefor, the injunction in question was obtained whereby the life tenant was restrained from permitting performance by the lessee, Minter, of the covenants of the lease, and the latter from doing work upon the land, and from pitching or producing a crop for or during the year 1908. Appellant and Minter filed answers to the petition in that case, denying the alleged waste, the right of appellee to the forfeiture or damages claimed, and controverting the grounds alleged for the injunction. The trial of the case, which occurred in October, 1908, resulted in a judgment dismissing the action and dissolving the injunction. Shortly after the rendition of that judgment, appellant instituted the present action against appellee and the surety in the injunction bond to recover the damages resulting to him from the wrongful obtention by appellee of the injunction, which the petition alleges is $350 for loss of rent on the land by reason of and during the continuance of the injunction and $250 fees paid his attorneys, making altogether $600.

The only question presented by this appeal for our consideration is: Does the petition in the instant case state a cause of action? The circuit court held that it did not; and hence the demurrer interposed by appellees to the petition was sustained. We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. Fairly construed, the averments of the petition are to the effect that the injunction not only prevented Minter, appellant's tenant, from proceeding with the work of clearing up the land, preparing it for cultivation, and also from producing a crop in 1908, but that it likewise prevented appellant from collecting of the tenant the rent for that year. The action was against both appellant and his tenant and the injunction issued against and executed upon each of them. While it did not in express terms command appellant not to collect the stipulated rent or restrain the tenant from paying it, both were restrained by it from performing the rent contract until it was too late to prepare the land for cultivation, or to raise a crop in the year 1908. Obviously the tenant was not liable under the circumstances for that year's rent, nor could appellant by suit have compelled him to pay it; for the tenant, if sued for it, could have escaped liability upon the ground of a failure of consideration, as he was not permitted to raise a crop that year, and received no benefit from his mere possession of the land. Besides, under a covenant of the lease, appellant was obliged to protect him in the peaceable possession of the leased premises, and the right to cultivate it and produce a crop of corn and tobacco upon 50 acres of it. Moreover, it was the duty of appellant and his tenant to obey the injunction as long as it remained in force, regardless of whether it was rightfully or wrongfully obtained; nor were they relieved of this duty until the injunction was by judgment of the court dissolved. The fact that the injunction was wrongfully issued having been determined by the judgment dissolving it rendered in the former action, and appellant being protected by the injunction bond as well as his tenant, we conclude that the petition states a cause of action as to the claim of appellant for damages resulting from the loss of rent for the year 1908. But, as the petition does not allege any other damage than what appellant sustained in the loss of rent, his recovery on that score should not exceed the amount he was to receive from his tenant by way of rent for the year 1908, viz., $383.33%.

The question of whether the further item of $250 damages by way of an attorney's fee claimed in the petition to have been expended by appellant in defeating the injunction, the reasonableness of which is duly alleged, can be recovered by him, is not free from doubt. The rule, however, seems to be that when the injunction is the only relief sought, and, in fact, gives the relief, if sustained, no recovery for attorney's fees can be had; but when the injunction is merely ancillary, or in aid of the relief sought, or is relied on to secure the relief when obtained, a recovery may be had on the bond for the payment of reasonable attorney's fees when the defendant has succeeded in dissolving the injunction. Tyler & Apperson v. Hamilton, etc., 108 Ky. 120, 55 S. W. 920; Turnpike Company v. Dulaney, 86 Ky. 518, 6 S. W. 590; Burgen v. Sharer, 14 B. Mon. 497. We gather from the averments of the petition in the instant case that the action in which the injunction was obtained against appellant and his tenant was brought by the remainderman to recover of appellant as life tenant the land the latter leased to Minter, on the ground that appellant by committing or suffering waste had forfeited his life estate therein which entitled the remainderman to immediate possession. The remainderman also sought to recover in that action of the life tenant treble damages for the waste committed, and, in addition, obtained the injunction to prevent the life tenant and his tenant from committing further waste to the land. In this view of the matter, it would seem that the primary purpose of the action was the recovery of the land and damages for the injury to it from the waste resulting from the life tenant's acts or sufferance while in possession. If this be true, the injunction was not the only remedy, but was merely ancillary or in aid of the relief sought, for its object was to prevent further waste, and therefore alleged irreparable injury before the termination of the prime or real cause of action. Perhaps our meaning can be better explained by quoting the following illustration contained in Turnpike Co. v. Dulaney, supra: "So, in case of an injunction, when the widow asserts her right to dower, and obtains an injunction to stay waste, the right to dower may be conceded or litigated; and, if it turns out that the injunction was improperly granted and is dissolved, a recovery may be had for the attorney's fees arising from the employment to dissolve the injunction. Injunctions, therefore, like attachments when dissolved, and are obtained as ancillary to an original proceeding, the obligors on the injunction bond are liable for a reasonable attorney's fee. To this extent the doctrine has been carried by this court as to the measure of recovery on attachment, and injunction bonds, but no further."

While in the instant case the averments of the petition as to the claim for attorney's fees are somewhat indefinite, yet on the whole they seem to authorize a recovery of attorney's fees on the injunction bond, but the recovery can go no further than what would be a reasonable fee paid, or agreed to be paid, by appellant in the employment of counsel to resist and defeat the injunction. We have seen from the excerpt quoted above that an action upon an injunction bond is governed by the same rule that applies to an action upon an attachment bond. In either case the damages that can be recovered on the bond, including attorney's fees, are such as result from the order of injunction or attachment, and not the damages incurred by reason of the action independent of the injunction or attachment. Trapnall v. McAfee, 3 Metc. 34, 77 Am. Dec. 152; Shultz v. Morrison, 3 Metc. 99; Caldwell v. Deposit Bank, 109 Ky. 197, 53 S. W. 589. So, in the matter of the attorney's fee claim by appellant, we will say that, if the whole of it was incurred in defending the action in which the injunction was obtained, nothing by way of such fee can be recovered on the bond, but, if incurred in defending the injunction alone, it can be, or, if incurred partly in defending the injunction and partly in defense of the action, it is recoverable as far as applicable to the injunction. Johnson v. Farmers' Bank, 4 Bush. 283; McClure v. Renaker (Ky.) 51 S. W. 317.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Caldwell County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by J. R. Kevil against the City of Princeton. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hodge & Hodge, for appellant. Darby, Lis-anby & Gates, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Near Court Square in Princeton, Ky., is a large spring, which has been known ever since the town was located as the "Big Spring," and was for many years the chief reliance of the town for water. A large underground stream flows under the town coming out at this spring. Some 25 years ago E. H. Daniels dug into the stream above the Big Spring and installed a waterworks plant from which he supplied water for his storehouse and dwelling house, and also supplied a number of persons in the town by pipes laid under the streets and alleys of the town. He had a tank which held 50,000 gallons of water and an engine with which he pumped up the water into the tank. From the tank the water ran out through his mains to his customers by gravity. Some years ago he sold his property, including his waterworks plant, to J. R. Kevil, who continued to operate the waterworks plant as he had done. The city, in the course of time, installed a waterworks plant, and on July 5, 1907, by an ordinance, directed its street commissioners to make connections running the sewerage of the city into the subterranean stream which fed Big Spring above the plant of Kevil. This was done, and Kevil thereupon brought this suit against the city, charging that thereby it had contaminated the water so as to render his water plant valueless, to his damage in the sum of $5,000. An answer was filed by the city traversing the allegations of the petition as to the damage done, and on final hearing the jury to whom the case was submitted found a verdict for the defendant. The court entered a judgment on the verdict dismissing Kevil's petition, and he appeals.

Kevil showed on the trial by the evidence on his behalf: That at the time the sewerage was run into the stream he was using the water in his property; that this use of it by him was worth $5 a month; that he was selling it to neighbors whose property he could get to without crossing any street or alley of the town, who paid him $8 a month; that he had other customers whom he reached by his pipes passing under or along the streets of the town, who paid him $30 or $40 a month; that the water was good up to the time the sewerage was run into the stream; and that it cost him only a nominal sum to operate the plant. The court excluded from the consideration of the jury all evidence as to his customers whom he reached by passing under or along any of the streets or alleys of the town, and of this he complains. Although these pipes had been in the streets for over 25 years, Daniels had no authority from the town authorizing their being put there. They had been put down and had remained in the streets simply by sufferance. Although they had been there so long, no right to maintain them had been acquired by adverse possession, as no written notice had been given the town as provided by section 2546, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 221), which is as follows: "The limitations mentioned in the first article of this chapter shall not begin to run in respect to actions by any town or city for the recovery of any street, alley, or other public easement, or any part of either, or the use thereof in such town or city, until the trustees, or the council or the corporation, by whatever name known or called, have been notified in writing by the party in possession, or about to take possession to the effect that such possession will be adverse to the right or title of such town or city. Until such notice is given, all possession of streets, alleys and public easements, or any part of either, in any town or city, shall be deemed amicable, and the person in possession the tenant at will of such town or city."

We had this subject before us in City of Covington v. Hall, 98 S. W. 317, and in City of Latonia v. Latonia Agr. Ass'n, 109 S. W. 356, and in those cases the previous cases are referred to. As his use of the streets to deliver the water to his customers was simply by reason of a license from the city, which it had power to revoke at any time, he cannot recover damages from it for not allowing him to carry on a business which it had power to stop and the court properly so held. Rough River Tel. Co. v. Cumber- land Tel. Co., 119 Ky. 475-476, 84 S. W. 517.

In the subterranean stream referred to some distance above the point where Daniels tapped it, there is an opening from the top of the ground into the stream known as "Cave Spring"; this being substantially what is commonly known as a "sink hole"—that is, it is a low place through which the surface water from the surrounding territory runs into the stream. This surrounding territory embraces 73 acres of land, a large part of which is within the city of Princeton and thickly populated. There are within it, among other things, two large livery stables, and a number of other houses, the filth from which is washed by the surface waters into this cave. The proof for the city is to the effect that for many years before the sewers were run into the stream there was a bad odor in this cave, and that the quantity of filth which thus ran into the stream rendered it unfit for domestic purposes. The city also showed that there were other openings along the stream by which the surface water ran into it and contaminated it. The plaintiff objected to all this evidence, insisting that one wrong does not justify another, and that one injury to the water does not justify a greater injury. This is true, but the question here is: How much injury did the city inflict upon the plaintiff? And to enable the jury to decide this question intelligently it was proper that the city should show that other causes were contaminating the stream, for the result which the plaintiff complains of may not in fact be due to the act of the city, and, if the water was so contaminated before as to be rendered useless for practical purposes, the city may show this to establish its defense that it has done the plaintiff no real injury. Section 242 of the Constitution provides: "Municipal and other corporations, and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, shall make just compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed by them; which compensation shall be paid before such taking, or paid or secured, at the election of such corporation or individual, before such injury or destruction." Under this section the city cannot take this underground stream for a public sewer without compensating the plaintiff for the injury it has thereby done him; but, if he has suffered no substantial loss by the act of the city, it may show this fact that the jury may arrive at a proper verdict in the case.

The court gave the jury these instructions: "(1) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the water obtained by the plaintiff for use in his waterworks plant on his lot, and obtained from the Big Spring creek, was of such quality that same could be and was profitably used by the plaintiff in his waterworks plant, up to the time the sewers constructed by the city were turned into said creek, and that the connecting of the sewers by contaminating the water in the creek depreciated the value of plaintiff's waterworks plant by rendering it unprofitable to operate it, then the jury will find for the plaintiff. (2) If the jury find for the plaintiff, they will award him such sum in damages as will reasonably compensate him for the depreciation, if any, in the reasonable market value of his waterworks plant, directly due to the contamination of the water by the city's sewers, considering its reasonable market value immediately before the contamination caused by the sewers and its reasonable market value immediately thereafter, but not exceeding $5,000, the sum claimed in the petition. (3) If the jury believe from the evidence that the water in the Big Spring creek, prior to the building of the sewers by the city, was not of such quality that the plaintiff could and did operate his plant therewith profitably, and that same was not rendered unprofitable to operate by reason of the connecting of the sewers with said creek, they will find for defendant. (4) The court says to the jury that the plaintiff in operating his waterworks plant had no right to the use of the streets and public alleys in the city, and in determining the question of the profitable operation of said plant they will only consider such use as was being made of it on the plaintiff's own property and such other places as were supplied with water therefrom, without entering on or using the said streets and alleys, with his water pipes or mains."

These instructions fairly submitted to the jury appellant's case. They were not at least prejudicial to him. The gist of his action was that the city had polluted the water. If it had not substantially injured the water, he had no cause of complaint. He was allowed to recover not only for the use of the water at other places supplied by him, but also for the use on his own property; and, as we have said, the court properly excluded the use of the water by persons whom he reached by crossing the streets and alleys of the city. The evidence was very conflicting, but there was much evidence on behalf of the city that the water was unfit for use before the sewers were turned into the stream, and that the turning of the sewers into it did the plaintiff no damage.

by the injury, and for any permanent reduction of earning power.

2. RAILROADS (§ 282*)—INJURIES TO LICENSEE—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries to a third person engaged in loading a car by the negligence of the railroad in moving the car without warning to plaintiff, plaintiff could not recover exemplary damages.

3. RAILROADS (§ 275*)—INJURIES TO LICENSEES — MOVING CAR — WARNING — NEGLIGENCE.

Where persons other than employees by the consent of a railroad company are loading a car, it is negligence for the company to move the car without first giving notice to the persons so engaged, if their presence is known or could be ascertained by ordinary care, so that they might have reasonable time to save themselves from injury.

4. RAILROADS (§ 282*)—INJURIES TO LICENSEES—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a plaintiff while loading a car by the sudden movement of the car, the issue was whether plaintiff had been notified. The court charged that failure of defendant to have a servant standing on the moving train by which the car was moved to give notice of its approach entitled plaintiff to recover, that the railroad company could not rely on any action of plaintiff prior to the approach of the train as constituting negligence as a defense to the action, but if, after the train approached, plaintiff by his own carelessness contributed to the injury, he could not recover. Held, that such instructions were erroneous for failure to present the issue raised.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nelson County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by John H. Crow against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Benjamin D. Warfield and John S. Kelly, for appellant. Nat. W. Halstead, Morgan Yewell, and F. E. Daugherty, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. While assisting in loading logs on a car of the appellant company that had been placed on a siding for that purpose, one of the skids used in loading fell on appellee and injured him quite severely. In loading the logs two skids, each about 18 feet long, 10 inches wide, and 12 inches thick, were placed with one end on the ground and the other on the car. A rope was then put around the log, and with the assistance of horses attached to the rope, and on the opposite side of the car from the logs, it would be rolled from the ground on the skids to the car. At the time appellee was injured, the rope had broken, and he was sitting down near the side of the car directly under one of the skids, engaged in fixing the rope. While so employed an engine backed some cars in on the siding where the car that was being loaded was standing, causing it to move, and its movement resulted in the skid falling on appellee. The testimony for appellee conducted to show that the persons loading the car were not notified that it would be disturbed, while, on behalf of appellant, there was evidence to the effect that appellee and the others were warned to be on the lookout, as the car would be moved. It is conceded that no brakeman was on the car that struck or bumped against the car being loaded with logs. Upon a trial of the case before a jury, appellee received a small verdict, and the company appeals.

The only errors that we need notice are those respecting the instructions given. In instruction No. 2, the measure of damage that appellee was entitled to recover was not correctly defined. In cases like this compensatory damages are confined to the expense of cure, value of time lost, a fair compensation for physical and mental suffering caused by the injury, and for any permanent reduction of the power to earn money. Carson v. Singleton (Ky.) 65 S. W. 821; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Logsdon, 114 Ky. 746, 71 S. W. 905; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hall, 115 Ky. 579, 74 S. W. 280. In instruction No. 3, the jury were told that they might award punitive damages. The evidence in this case did not warrant an instruction upon the subject of exemplary damages. Instruction No. 4 reads as follows: "It was the duty of defendant, in backing its train on the side track and forcing it in contact with the car at which plaintiff was at work, to have had a servant standing on said moving train to give notice of its approach to the plaintiff's car, and, the defendant failing to have said servant on the watch on said moving train on the occasion of the plaintiff's injury, the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury should find for plaintiff according to the degree of negligence found as set out in instructions 2 and 3 herein." In instruction No. 5, the court said: "The defendant failing to have said servant on said moving train as indicated in the next preceding instruction, it cannot rely on any action, nonaction, or conduct of the plaintiff prior to the approach of its said train towards the car where the plaintiff was at work as constituting contributory negligence, or in any manner or degree as a defense to the action. But if the jury shall believe from the evidence that, after the said train began its approach to the car where the plaintiff was at work, he, by his own carelessness or negligence, contributed to his injury, and without which the said injury would not have occurred, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find."

Instructions Nos. 4 and 5 were virtually a direction to find for appellee, as it was admitted that there was no employé on the moving train to give notice of its approach to the car plaintiff was assisting to load. These instructions were radically wrong. They did not present at all to the jury the real issue in the case, which was whether or not appellee had not been notified before the car was moved. In cases like this, the law is that, when persons other than employes are by the consent or direction of the railroad company engaged in loading or unloading a car, it is negligence on the part of the company to move the car so being loaded or unloaded without first giving notice to the persons engaged in loading or unloading it, if their presence is known, or could be known by the exercise of ordinary care, so that they may have reasonable time and opportunity to save themselves from injury. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Farris (Ky.) 100 S. W. 870. The liability of the company in this case turns upon the question whether or not notice was given to appellee before the car was moved; whereas, the trial court instructed the jury that they were liable unless a person was on the moving car. If, as a matter of fact, appellee had been previously notified that the car he was loading would be moved, it was immaterial, so far as he was concerned and under the facts of this case, whether there was any person on the moving car or not.

Judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McLean County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by James O. Howard and others against W. A. Howard for a division of certain land. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Clark, for appellant. R. Alexander, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. Alex A. Howard bought a tract of land in what is now McLean county in the year 1850, and resided on it until his death in 1860. He left surviving him a widow and four children, who continued to reside on the land until the year 1868, when the dwelling house burned. They then moved to another tract, where they lived, renting this farm, until 1877. The widow then returned to it, and lived there until 1882, when she married a man named Collier and went to Henderson, Ky. She then rented this tract of appellant, W. A. Howard, who was one of the four children of Alex Howard; he agreeing to pay her annually for the use of the farm. One of the other children, a daughter, conveyed her fourth interest to her brother, appellee James O. Howard. In the year 1893 James O. Howard sold to W. A. Howard his half of the land for $400, subject to his mother's life interest. The mother died in the year 1904. In 1905 W. A. Howard filed a suit in the McLean circuit court against James O. Howard, alleging that he had been in adverse possession of the land for 15 years, and praying that his title to it be quieted. James O. Howard filed an answer, in which he set up the deed which he had made W. A. Howard and the notes for $400, which remained unpaid, and asked that his lien be enforced. Before this case was tried, the courthouse burned, and, the papers not having been supplied, the action was dismissed without prejudice. James O. Howard then brought an action against W. A. Howard to recover on his notes and enforce his lien on the land. In this action W. A. Howard filed an answer, denying that he had accepted the deed from his brother, and alleging that he was the owner of the land by adverse possession. After this answer was filed, when the parties met to take depositions, it was agreed between them that the notes should be canceled, and that James O. Howard's half of the land should be conveyed back to him. At the next term of the court a judgment was entered pursuant to the agreement, and a deed was made pursuant to the judgment to James O. Howard for one-half of the land. He then instituted this action, under section 490 of the Civil Code of Practice, for a division of the land, asking that his half of it be cut off to him. W. A. Howard filed an answer, in which he set up the same defense as he had set up in the former action. Proof was taken, and on final hearing the circuit court adjudged the plaintiff, James O. Howard, the relief sought. W. A. Howard appeals.

It appears from the evidence that, when Alex Howard in 1850 bought the land, there was a lien on it for the purchase money; that in a suit against him to foreclose the

Then the land was ordered sold, and William H. Howard became the purchaser of the land, and a deed was made to him for it in 1853. Who William H. Howard was, or what was his relation to Alex Howard, does not appear; but it does appear that Alex Howard remained upon the land until his death, and that his widow and children have held it ever since, without any claim on the part of William H. Howard to it. Under such circumstances it must be presumed that William H. Howard held the land for Alex Howard. The appellant, W. A. Howard, in no way connects himself with William H. Howard, who purchased the land in 1853. Beside, he entered on the land under his mother, and held it under her. He is bound by the judgment by which the deed was made to his brother, J. O. Howard. It is immaterial that that judgment was entered by agreement. An agreed judgment is as binding as any other judgment, unless it is opened in the manner provided by law. The proof shows clearly that the agreement was made between W. A. Howard and James O. Howard, and that the judgment was entered pursuant to their agreement. If there was any mistake about this, the court that entered the judgment may, in a proper proceeding, grant relief by opening or modifying it; but until it is so opened or modified it is conclusive on W. A. Howard that his brother, James O. Howard, is the owner of one-half of the land.

Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 590*)—CONTINUANCE—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

When the indictment against defendant for a capital crime was returned, the court set the trial for four days later, and appointed an attorney to defend. Counsel, after conference with defendant, at once placed subpoenas for certain witnesses in the hands of the sheriff, but, when the case was called for trial, applied for a continuance because some of the witnesses had not been served, some of them were absent, and counsel had not been able to prepare a defense. The court, ascertaining that the attendance of all the absent witnesses save one could be procured by the time they were needed, directed defendant's counsel to state the facts which the other witness would testify to, and ordered the affidavit to be read to the jury, and directed the commonwealth to admit the truth thereof, and refused the continuance. Defendant was convicted and sentenced to be executed. Held, that the court abused its discretion, denying the continuance.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 33*) — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

If accused unlawfully and willfully shot and killed deceased in a sudden affray, or in a sudden heat and passion, with a felonious intent to kill, or if the killing was the direct and natural, though unintentional, result of a reckless, wanton, or grossly careless use of a gun by defendant in struggling with deceased for its possession when he knew it was dangerous to life, if handled in that manner, he would be guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 34*) — INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

If the shooting and death of deceased resulted from the unintentional and careless discharge of a gun by defendant in struggling with deceased to retain the gun to shoot another, when deceased was trying to prevent such shooting, defendant would be guilty of involuntary manslaughter.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McCracken County.

"To be officially reported."

Jonas Smith was convicted of patricide, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jas. Campbell, for appellant. Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SETTLE, C. J. The appellant, Jonas Smith, was indicted in the court below for the murder of his father, Amos Smith. He was brought to trial within four days of the return of the indictment, by verdict of the jury declared guilty as charged, and given the death penalty. Of that verdict, the judgment entered thereon, and the refusal of the circuit court to grant him a new trial he complains; hence this appeal.

The facts leading to and connected with the homicide were few and simple. It appears from the evidence that appellant and his father are negroes, the latter being an old man 70 years of age, and that both lived with a brother of the former and son of the latter in the city of Paducah. The evidence showed appellant to have been a violent and reckless man, and that he had served a term in the penitentiary, but that he and his father had always been on good terms. It was also shown by the evidence that appellant and one John Polk, also a negro, were enemies; that shortly before the killing of Amos Smith appellant had threatened to kill Polk; and that on the morning of the day of the homicide appellant purchased a number of gun cartridges. It was further shown by the evidence that appellant about 7 p. m. of that day met John Polk on the street near his home, which was close to that of appellant, and with a shotgun attempted to shoot him, but that he was prevented from doing so by the act of Polk in grabbing the gun and calling for help; that the father and two brothers of Polk, hearing the cries, came to his rescue, and assisted him in holding or trying to take the gun from appellant. At that juncture appellant's father, Amos Smith, hearing the cries and seeing the altercation, appeared on the scene, and at once undertook to assist the Polks in wresting the gun from his son. When he took hold of the gun, the Polks released their hold upon it, and left to him the task of taking it from appellant. In the struggle that continued between appellant and his father for the possession of the gun the weapon was discharged, and the balls entering the body of the latter caused his death. According to the testimony of several of the Polks, during the struggle between father and son over the gun the son in an angry manner, and with an oath, told his father, if he did not release his hold upon the gun, he would shoot him, and this declaration was immediately followed by the discharge of the gun. Appellant denied the making of such a declaration, but admitted the shooting of his father, and claimed that it was purely an accident.

Although numerous grounds were urged for a new trial, but two of them impress us as being worthy of consideration. These are (1) the failure of the circuit court to grant the continuance asked by appellant before the beginning of the trial; (2) its alleged failure to properly instruct the jury.

When the indictment was returned, the court informed appellant that the case ought to be disposed of at that term, and ordered that it be set for trial four days later. Being then advised by appellant that he had not secured counsel and was without means to employ one, the court appointed a member of the bar present to defend him. The counsel named accepted the appointment, and, after a hasty conference with appellant, at once procured and placed in the hands of the sheriff subpoenas for certain witnesses whose names appellant furnished him. When the case was called for trial on the day fixed by the court, appellant, through his counsel, informed the court that he was not ready for trial, and moved that the case be continued until the next term of the court, filing in support of the motion the affidavits of himself and counsel, in each of which was set forth the absence of certain witnesses, some of whom had not been served with the subpoenas issued at appellant's instance on the day of the return of the indictment, and the further fact that appellant's counsel had not been able to fully investigate the facts connected with the homicide for which appellant was indicted, or to properly prepare his defense. The court, having ascertained that the attendance of all the then absent witnesses, save one, could be procured by the time they would be needed, refused the continuance, and, requiring appellant to state, in the form of an affidavit, the material facts to which the one witness whose attendance could not be procured would testify, ordered that it be read on the trial as the deposition of such witness and admitted by the commonwealth as true. To the ruling of the court in refusing the continuance the appellant duly excepted, and the trial proceeded with the result previously indicated. Under the circumstances of this case the court's refusal of the continuance asked by appellant was an abuse of discretion. The appellant may be a brutal and dangerous man, but by the showing of the record he is certainly an ignorant one. His penniless and friendless condition, together with his ignorance and the fact that his counsel between the time of his appointment to represent him and the beginning of the trial was almost constantly engaged in discharging his professional duties in other cases pending in the same court, made it well nigh impossible for him to properly prepare appellant's case for trial within the three or four days' time allowed by the court. That appellant's counsel is a capable lawyer all who know him will concede; but, while the record manifests the skill and care with which under the circumstances he conducted appellant's defense, it also shows the embarrassments that inevitably result from the hasty and incomplete preparation of a case. He should have had reasonable opportunities for conferring with his client and the members of his family; reasonable time for looking up witnesses, and ascertaining their testimony, and for making such further preparation as would secure for his client a fair and impartial trial.

We are also satisfied that the jury were not instructed as to all the law of the case. Instruction No. 1 was properly given, for it correctly advised the jury of the law in respect to the crime of murder, and told them in what state of case they would be authorized to find appellant guilty of that crime, and what in that event should be his punishment. We cannot, however, approve instructions 2 and 3 as given by the lower court. They fall short of an accurate statement of the law as to voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, and altogether failed to submit to the jury the question of whether the killing of deceased resulted from sudden heat and passion on the part of appellant excited by the interference of the former in trying to wrest from him the gun to prevent the shooting of Polk. "It is essential to the commission of voluntary manslaughter that the homicide should have been willfully and intentionally committed (i. e., in a sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion), or under such circumstances as to strike one at first blush as so reckless and wanton as to be felonious, though apparently not intended by the perpetrator." Montgomery v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 81 S. W. 264; 1 Bishop's New Crim. Law, § 314; York v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky. 360; Smith v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky. 318, 20 S. W. 229. On the other hand, if the homicide resulted from the careless and unintentional discharge of the gun by appellant in the doing of an unlawful act, such as struggling with his father to retain the gun when the latter was holding it to prevent him from wrongfully shooting Polk, the act was involuntary manslaughter and punishable at the common law by fine or imprisonment in jail, or both, in any amount and for any length of time, in the discretion of the jury. Brown v. Commonwealth, 122 Ky. 628, 92 S. W. 542; Ewing v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 111 S. W. 352. In lieu of instructions 2 and 3, the court should on a retrial give the following:

Although the jury may believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant shot and killed deceased with a gun, loaded as in instruction No. 1 described, if they believe from the evidence that he committed the act without previous malice, but shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such shooting and killing was unlawfully and willfully done by defendant in a sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion and with the felonious intent to kill deceased, or shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the shooting and killing of deceased, if done by defendant, was the direct and natural, though unintentional, result of a reckless, wanton, or grossly careless use or handling of any of said gun by defendant in struggling with deceased for its possession, when he knew it was dangerous to life if so handled by him, they should find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary not less than 2 nor more than 21 years.

If, however, they should believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant shot and killed deceased with a gun, and that such shooting and death of deceased resulted from the unintentional and careless discharge of the gun by him in doing an unlawful act, such as struggling with deceased to retain the gun for the purpose of shooting John Polk, if he was so struggling for the possession of the gun for such purpose, when deceased was trying to prevent him from shooting said Polk, if he was so trying, they should in that event find defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter, and fix his punishment at a fine in any amount, or imprisonment in jail any length of time in the discretion of the jury. If the jury believe from the evidence that the killing of deceased by defendant was not murder, voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, as defined in the instructions, but was unintentional and accidental, they should acquit him.

In addition to instruction No. 1, and those herein directed to be given, the circuit court will again give the instructions numbered 4 and 5. The record fails to disclose any error in the admission or rejection of testimony.

On account of the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with the opinion.

PALMER TRANSFER CO. v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 28, 1909.)

INSURANCE (§ 183*)—ACCIDENT INSURANCE—PREMIUMS—POLICY—CONSTRUCTION.

Where an accident policy issued by plaintiff covering the drivers of vehicles of defendant transfer company provided that the premium was based on the entire compensation earned by the drivers, and that, if it should exceed the sum set forth in the schedule furnished, defendant should pay the additional premium earned, plaintiff was entitled to a premium based on the entire compensation paid the drivers, though part of the time they were employed as stablemen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, McCracken County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Fidelity & Casualty Company against the Palmer Transfer Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Crie & Ross and Miller & Miller, for appellant. Wheeler, Hughes & Berry, for appellee.

LASSING, J. The Palmer Transfer Company is a corporation doing a general transfer and passenger business in the city of Paducah. In the course of its business it employs a number of men to drive its hacks, busses, and other vehicles, and also employs a number of men as stablemen, hostlers, blacksmiths, etc. On November 1, 1904, it took out a policy of accident insurance in the appellee company, covering its drivers of vehicles. This policy was No. 43,076, and the premium charged therefor was estimated from a statement made by the appellant company, showing the number of drivers in its employ, and the weekly salary paid to each. This policy ran for 12 months. On November 1, 1905, the first policy expired, and another policy was issued in lieu thereof, for 12 months; the premium upon this policy being estimated the same as upon the first policy. On November 1, 1906, a third policy was issued for the same purpose, and the premium was estimated in the same way. In the application for each of these policies it was represented that there would be three hacks, one hotel coach, one United States mail wagon, and two baggage wagons engaged in the conduct of appellant's business. Each policy contained the following provision regulating the premium thereon: "Condition J: The premium is based upon the entire compensation earned by the drivers of the assured during the period of this policy. If the assured himself drive any draught or driving animal or vehicle there shall be included therefor in the compensation a sum equivalent to the average compensation of the driver of a team covered hereunder. Whenever employes are compensated, in whole or in part, by store certificates, board, merchandise, credits or any other substitute for cash, the amount of compensation covered by such substitutes shall be included in the compensation. If such compensation exceeds the sum set forth in the schedule, the assured shall immediately pay the company the additional premium earned; if such compensation is less than the sum set forth in the schedule, the company will return the unearned premium, when determined; but the company shall receive or retain not less than fifty dollars ($50.00), it being agreed that this sum shall be the minimum earned premium."

At the date of the delivery of each of these policies, the estimated premium thereon was paid by appellant, and at some time after the expiration of the first and second of said policies, upon a statement made by appellant to appellee, appellee rebated to appellant company a portion of the premium which it had paid at the date of issue of the policy. It appears that no auditor of appellee had, in the meantime, audited the books of appellant to ascertain whether or not the statement made by appellant as to the amount of money annually paid to its drivers was correct. Some question having been raised as to the correctness of the reports furnished by appellant, appellee caused the books of appellant company to be audited, and this investigation disclosed the fact that appellant had, during each of the years covered by the contract of insurance, paid to its drivers a sum largely in excess of that reported in the statement which it had made to appellee, and demand was therefore made by appellee upon appellant, not only for the return of the premium rebated, but also for the payment of the additional premium for each year as called for by the contract of insurance. Appellant, while admitting that it had paid to its drivers the amount of money reported by the auditor for appellee company, insisted that, inasmuch as their said drivers had not devoted more than one-half of their time to the business of driving, the sum which they had reported as paid to their drivers was, in fact, in excess of what it should have been. The appellant company had charged one-half of the sum paid to those employed as drivers to their account as stablemen. It seems that these drivers, when not actively engaged in driving, were required to do other work around the transfer barn.

It appears from the pleadings that appellant also took out other accident insurance with appellee, covering its stablemen and other employes. The annual premium charged on this latter class of policies was much cheaper than that charged on the policy covering the drivers. Appellant refused to pay the sum demanded by appellee, or any sum whatever as additional premiums, and thereupon appellee instituted a suit to recover same. Appellant answered and joined issue upon the material allegations of the petition, which formed the basis of appellee's claim, and, in addition, pleaded that as to the claim on policies 1 and 2 there had been a settlement and an adjustment thereof, in which the appellee company had refunded to it certain designated portions of the premium which had been paid when the policy was issued. It also pleaded that the method of bookkeeping which had been adopted and followed by it had been approved, acquiesced in, and consented to by the local agent of the appellee company. The material allegations of the answer were traversed, proof was taken, and the case submitted to the chancellor for judgment. He found in favor of the insurance company for the full amount sued for, and, being dissatisfied with that finding and judgment, the transfer company appeals.

Counsel for appellant cannot seriously rely upon the defense of settlement as to the dispute over premiums covering the first and second policies of insurance. There was no settlement, but the insurance company, without investigation, accepted the statement furnished it by appellant as correct, and fixed the premium for each year according to the statement as regulated by the terms of the policy. If, as a matter of fact, the statement for each of said years, as furnished by appellant, was not correct, and appellee was deceived or misled by reason thereof, appellant would be in no position to avail itself of its own error or wrong. The policy itself furnishes the real contract. The method of bookkeeping adopted and used by appellant has nothing to do with the questions involved in this litigation. The contract of insurance provides definitely and distinctly the manner in which the premiums to be paid shall be estimated at the date upon which the policy is issued, and determined with accuracy at the expiration thereof. Hence it is immaterial that the local agent of appellee was advised of the method of bookkeeping used by appellant. The premium to be paid is determined, not by the method of bookkeeping employed, but by the amount of money actually paid to the drivers. The only question therefore which we deem it necessary to consider is whether or not, under the provisions of the policy, appellant had the right to have the premiums on said policies fixed by considering the total compensation paid to the drivers while actually engaged in the business of driving, or whether the total compensation received by them while in the employ of appellant company must be taken into account.

ardous one, the greater part of the hazard is confined to the use of its vehicles, and hence the cost of insuring it on account of loss by accident that may occur to passengers riding in its vehicles, or to the public that may be injured by reason of any negligence of its drivers, is correspondingly high. It would be impossible to determine what would be a fair charge to make for assuming this risk without some data to serve as a guide, and hence appellee required that appellant furnish certain information concerning the nature, character, and extent of its business as a condition prerequisite to entering into a contract of insurance. This information is the "statement" in the policy. The facts therein set out were exclusively within the knowledge of appellant, and, as they form the very basis and foundation of the contract, it is bound by them. It will be observed that the statement describes the number and character of vehicles used in the transportation of passengers and freight, and gives the number of drivers employed and their compensation. There is no intimation in this information furnished as to what part of each driver's time is employed in driving. No such information is sought, and if it had been it could not have been furnished with any degree of accuracy, for this would necessarily depend upon the run of business which appellant would have. No estimate of the hazard assumed could be based upon such information, but when appellee knew the number and kind of vehicles used by appellant in its business, and the number of drivers employed and their pay, a basis was furnished upon which an estimate could be made. Upon such statement the value of the hazard was figured and the contract of insurance made, with the proviso that, should there be an increase or decrease of drivers so employed, the cost of insurance should be increased or decreased accordingly.

If appellant's contention is correct, then there would have been no occasion for issuing a different policy covering different grades of employes; but all that would have been necessary to do would be to state the total number of employes, and how much of the time of each (estimating as he proposes in this case to do) would be devoted to the discharge of the several duties that might be assigned to them. The fact that the business was not conducted in this way is persuasive that such a plan was not contemplated. If part of the time of the driver was taken up in the discharge of other duties, and his compensation while so employed properly chargeable as pay to "stableman," then for such time he was not a driver, and if an accident had occurred while he was driving, and the insurance company had sought to defend upon the ground that he was a stableman, would such a defense be regarded as meritorious? Certainly not; and, as such fact could not be used as a defense by the insurance company, it can no more be used as a shield by the transfer company to enable it to escape liability when called upon to pay the premium as fixed by the terms of the contract.

The contract fixes the premium by taking into consideration the number of vehicles used, and the drivers employed, and their compensation, without regard to the length of time actually employed by each driver while driving, and the trial court having so construed it, and entered his judgment accordingly, we are of opinion that it should be, and is, affirmed.

JOHNSON v. GORDON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 585*)—RES JUDICATA.

A judgment for defendant in forcible entry proceedings is not a bar to a forcible detainer proceeding, since whether defendant forcibly entered the demise or not had no relevancy to whether she forcibly detained it after being legally required to surrender the possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1084, 1085, 1092-1095, 1097; Dec. Dig. § 585.*]

2. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 5*) — WHERE LIES.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 452, subs. 4, providing that the refusal of one who has made a forcible entry on the possession of a tenant for a term to deliver possession to the landlord, on demand, after the term expires, is a forcible detainer, one entering premises with or without the consent of the tenant and refusing to vacate on demand of the landlord after the tenant's term expires is guilty of forcible detainer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 23-28; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2372, 2373.]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 63*)—ESTOPPEL TO DENY LANDLORD'S TITLE.

Neither a tenant nor one entering under him can deny the landlord's title in a proceeding by the latter to recover possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by A. N. Gordon against Elizabeth M. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. S. Crawford and Geo. C. Webb, for appellant. J. D. & G. R. Hunt and Falconer & Falconer, for appellee.

O'REAR, J. Appellee was in possession of a certain house and lot on Maxwell street and Lexington avenue in the city of Lexington, having bought it from the trustee of a building association. His tenants occupied the premises for several years. Finally he rented the place to one Morrison, and turned over the key to him that he might go into the possession. Morrison did enter into the possession, but, before he had finished moving in his furniture, the appellant who was a former owner of the property, and who claims that the building association had extorted usury from her and had in its foreclosure suit against the property proceeded irregularly to the judgment of the sale, went to Morrison and prevailed upon him to surrender the possession to her. Morrison's lease was from month to month for a term, conditioned upon his prompt payment of the rent. Appellee, learning that Morrison had abdicated, brought forcible entry proceedings against appellant. He was successful in the country, but upon the traverse in the circuit court the jury found the appellant not guilty. Thereupon appellee instituted this forcible detainer proceeding against appellant to recover the possession of the property.

In the country and upon the traverse the judgment was that appellant was guilty. Upon this appeal two grounds are assigned as error. The first is that the trial court erred in excluding the verdict and the judgment in the circuit court upon the former traverse, which were attempted to be used as a bar to this proceeding. We think the circuit court was correct in that ruling. Whether the defendant was or was not guilty of having forcibly entered the demise had no relevancy to whether she had forcibly detained it after being legally required to surrender the possession. Shepherd v. Thompson, 2 Bush, 176.

The other question presented involves the nature of appellant's act in getting the possession from Morrison. It is contended that, if appellant went into possession with the consent of Morrison, then her entry was not forcible, and did not come under subsection 4, § 452, Civ. Code Prac., which provides: "The refusal of a person who has made a forcible entry upon the possession of a tenant for a term to deliver possession to the landlord, upon demand, after the term expires," is a forcible detainer. Whether appellant entered with or against the consent of Morrison is in some doubt, but, whichever it was, she is guilty of the forcible detainer, having refused to vacate the premises upon demand of Gordon after Morrison's term expired. If she entered under circumstances set out in subsection 4 of section 452, Civ. Code Prac., supra, she is guilty. If she entered by consent of Morrison, then she held under him, and could acquire no greater right from him as against his landlord than he himself had. So when Morrison would have been required to surrender the possession to his landlord, appellant, who entered under him, was likewise required to surrender the possession. The tenant cannot deny his landlord's title, neither can one who enters under the tenant deny it, in a proceeding by the landlord to recover the possession.

The facts and law were appropriately submitted to the jury. There is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

CAMPBELL v. PREECE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 103*)—SALE OF LAND—WRITTEN CONTRACT.

The statute of frauds is sufficiently complied with if there is a written memorandum of the contract for the sale of land, signed by the party to be charged.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 104*) — CONTEMPORANEOUS MEMORANDUM.

A memorandum of a contract for the sale of land, sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, need not be contemporaneous with the contract; it being sufficient if it is subsequently executed and ratifies the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 209; Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 119*)—NATURE AND EFFECT OF STATUTE.

The statute of frauds pertains only to the evidence of a contract, so that a contract, in the making of which the statute has not been complied with, is void only because of the lack of legal evidence to establish its existence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 103*)—"MEMORANDUM"—SUFFICIENCY.

A "memorandum," required by the statute of frauds, is such a written declaration of the parties to the agreement as will relieve the court from relying on parol evidence to ascertain the subject of the contract.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4472-4473; vol. 3, p. 7720.]

5. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 108*)—MEMORANDUM—REQUISITES—TERMS OF CONTRACT.

A memorandum, sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, need not state the terms of the contract as to the consideration which may be proved by parol, even if to do so involves contradiction of the memorandum.

6. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 118*)—MEMORANDUM—SINGLE WRITING.

Two or more writings, signed by the party to be charged, and shown to refer to the same subject-matter, and describing the subject of the contract so that it may be identified, may together constitute a sufficient memorandum.

7. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 118*) — SALE OF LAND—MEMORANDUM—SUFFICIENCY.

In 1894, plaintiff sold defendant by parol and placed him in possession of land described, for $1,000, to be paid for in cutting and hauling timber from the land for plaintiff. In 1899,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes plaintiff executed a receipt to defendant for $265 as part payment "on the land sold him by myself on the Shanty branch," and in 1900 an instrument was executed, reciting that defendant thereby sold to plaintiff all the merchantable timber now standing on the lands that plaintiff sold to defendant, situated on the Shanty branch, etc., at a specified price, etc. Held that, the parol contract of sale being admitted, such writings, construed together, constituted a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by A. W. Campbell against Joseph Preece. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Roscoe Vanover, for appellant. N. J. Auxler, P. B. Stratton, and Hazelrigg & Hazelrigg, for appellee.

O'BEAR, J. In 1894 appellant sold to appellee by parol contract, and put him in possession of, a tract of land situated "on the Shanty branch on left fork of Peter creek in Pike county, Kentucky" (and which is particularly described in the pleadings and judgment in this case), for the agreed price of $1,000, to be paid for by appellee in cutting, hauling, and delivering to appellant the timber from the land at so much per thousand feet. A contract as to some of the timber was not concluded till 1900, when it was reduced to writing, and signed by both parties. It contained this recital: "That the said Preece does hereby sell to the said Campbell all the oak, poplar, ash, cucumber, basswood and any other woods that merchantable timber can be obtained from, that is now standing on the lands that said Campbell sold to said Preece situated on the Shanty branch on the left fork of Peter creek, Pike county, Kentucky, at $1.50 per M. feet where it now stands." The first contract between the parties as to the timber to be cut and delivered in part payment for the land seems to have been in parol. When it was executed, upon a settlement a balance was found due to appellee, which was credited upon the purchase price of the land, as evidenced by the following receipt: "$265.00. Phelps, Ky. March 31, 1899. Received of Joseph Preece two hundred and sixty-five dollars as part payment on the land sold him by myself on the Shanty branch. A. W. Campbell." A further credit was due upon a settlement of the second timber contract, which has been referred to above. Appellee failed to pay all the purchase money; nor was appellant able, until after the commencement of this suit, to convey a good title to the land; nor did he ever offer to convey any title to appellee. This suit was brought recently by appellant against appellee in ejectment, the former electing to treat his parol agreement to convey the land as void, because it was conceived by him to be within the statute of frauds and perjuries. Appellee defended, setting up the parol purchase of the land and the subsequent ratification thereof in writing, making proffer of the two writings copied above. He tendered payment of the balance of the purchase money, and asked a specific execution of the contract. The action having been transferred to equity, the circuit court adjudged that the contract was enforceable, and that it be specifically enforced. Appellee paid the adjudged balance of the purchase money into court, which appellant declined to accept, but prosecutes this appeal from the judgment decreeing the performance of the contract. The question for decision is the sufficiency of the written memoranda of the contract.

The statute of frauds and perjuries, as now in force in this state, so far as material to this case, reads (section 470, Ky. St. [Russell's St. § 1775]): "No action shall be brought to charge any person * * * upon any contract for the sale of real estate or any lease thereof for a larger term than one year, * * * unless the promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, ratification, or some memorandum or note thereof, be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his authorized agent. But the consideration need not be expressed in the writing; it may be proved when necessary, or it may be disproved by parol or other evidence." It is not necessary to the validity of the contract that it shall be in writing. If there be a written memorandum of it, signed by the party to be charged, it is taken out of the statute. Nor is it necessary that the memorandum be contemporaneous with the contract. If it be executed subsequently, and ratifies the contract, it is sufficient. The statute pertains to evidence of the contract—not to its validity. While it follows that, if the required evidence of the contract be wanting, its enforcement is denied, and the contract is said to be void, it is void only because of the lack of legal evidence of its existence.

The note or memorandum required by the statute is such written declaration of the parties to the agreement as will relieve the court from relying upon parol evidence to ascertain the subject of the contract. When the subject is established by a sufficient writing, there is then such evidence of the contract upon that score as satisfies the statute; and, if the contract be then established by the proof, it may be enforced. Nor is it necessary that the terms of the contract, in so far as they constitute part of the consideration, be stated in the writing, or, if stated therein, that they be proved as stated. Camp v. Moreman, 84 Ky. 635, 2 S. W. 179. The consideration, so the statute allows, may be shown by parol, even if to do so involve a contradiction of the written memorandum. Nor is it necessary that the written memorandum, evidencing the contract or ratifying it, be contained in one writing. If two or more writings, signed by the party to be charged, and shown to be referable to the same subject-matter, describe the property so that it may be identified, it is sufficient. Camp v. Moreman, supra. The parol agreement is not disputed. Both parties agree as to it. Nor is the identity of the property, or the balance owing upon it, in dispute. So the question comes down to this: Is the subject of the contract sufficiently identified by the writings?

Reading the two writings together, it is noted that appellant states he had theretofore sold appellee certain land on the Shanty branch on the left fork of Peter creek, in Pike county, Ky. The location of the land is then established. Its boundary remains alone to be ascertained. The writings speak of the transaction in the past tense. It refers to the land which Campbell had sold to Preece. If it had stated, "the land where Joseph Preece now lives," or the land "where Joseph Preece lived in 1899," it would not be questioned that the description would have been sufficient. Parol evidence is always receivable to identify the land spoken of in the writing, but not to designate it. Thus in Henderson v. Perkins, 94 Ky. 207, 21 S. W. 1035, the memorandum ran: "Have this day sold and by these presents sell my home place and storehouse to L. D. Perkins, of Rocky Hill, Barren county, Kentucky, for and in consideration of four thousand dollars," etc. The court said: "We think this is a sufficient memorandum of the contract to take it out of the statute. There was a partial execution of it, and the description of the land, although defective, was sufficiently full for easy identification."

In Overstreet v. Rice, 4 Bush, 1, 98 Am. Dec. 279, the memorandum was that the parties had "this day swapped farms." It appears that each had taken possession of the land received in exchange by him. The court, implying that the language of the writing was too uncertain to be enforceable without itself, held that, when the parties by their conduct had rendered the uncertainty sure by taking possession and consummating the mutual exchange, the impediment was removed. That was but another way of identifying what would have been impossible without extraneous aid, owing to the ambiguity of the writing—a course familiar in the construction of contracts whose terms or descriptions are ambiguous. In Ellis v. Deadman's Heirs, 4 Bibb, 466, the writing was: "4 Jany. 1808. Received of Jesse Ellis $—, in part payment for a lot he bought of me in the town of Versailles, it being the cash part of the purchase of said lot. Nathan Deadman." The writing was held to satisfy the statute as to the description of the land. Kay & Casey v. Curd, 6 B. Mon. 100, Tucker v. Denton (Ky.) 106 S. W. 280, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 289, Usher v. Floyd, 83 Ky. 552, Moayan v. Moayan, 114 Ky. 855, 72 S. W. 33, 60 L. R. A. 415, 102 Am. St. Rep. 308, and Vorheis v. Biting (Ky.) 22 S. W. 80, are relied on by appellant. Those cases (except Moayan v. Moayan) were instances where there was no identification, or means of identification, afforded by the writings. If the writing identifies the land, that, of course, ends the inquiry. If it does not identify it, but affords means of identification, that is deemed sufficient. If the means of identification are other records or writings, it is practically certain. But if not other writings, as it may not be, it may nevertheless be a satisfactory means. All that is required is that it shall be susceptible of certainty. If, when the means are resorted to, it is still left open what lands are meant to be conveyed, the description will be bad. Therefore it is never good to refer to a future event, as that could not have been certain when the memorandum was made. But generally a reference to an existing or past event is good. There it can be known certainly what was intended; for that which has transpired is changeless. "The place where I live" identifies one place only, and is susceptible of being shown definitely and unerringly. "The place which I sold to A." is likewise susceptible of identification; and, if I had sold but one place to A., it is as certain as would have been a more particular description. It is from such instances that the maxim has arisen, "That is certain which can be made certain." If the description had read, "beginning at an oak tree on Shanty branch in Pike county," and "then following the marked lines and fences around the tract to the beginning," while it would have been held a sufficient description, it would have required extraneous aid to have located the particular oak that constituted the beginning corner, as well as the fences and lines around the tract. In the Moayan Case, supra, it was said, inter alia: "It is as essential that the terms be specified as the description of the property." That expression, taken out of its connection, is misleading. The court was there discussing the opinion in Ellis v. Deadman, supra, in which it had been held that the description was good, but that the memorandum was deficient in not stating the terms of the contract. We were explaining the ground upon which Deadman's contract had been held insufficient under the statute, as it was. For the statute of frauds and perjuries of 1706, then under consideration (1 Litt. St. 371), did not contain the clause found in our present statute relative to the consideration.

We find that the description in the memoranda in this case was sufficient to satisfy the statute. Hence the judgment below is affirmed.

PECK-WILLIAMSON HEATING & VENTILATING CO. v. MILLER & HARRIS.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—REQUISITES—MUTUALITY.

A contract between a manufacturer and a selling agent by which the manufacturer agrees to give the agent exclusive sale of its goods in a specified locality for one year, and to bill its goods at certain discounts from its price list, and the agent agrees to sell exclusively the manufacturer's goods and to push their sale during the term of the contract, is not void for want of mutuality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 326*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—GROUNDS OF ACTION.

The violation by a manufacturer of a valid contract with a selling agent renders the manufacturer liable in damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 326.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 279*)—DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP—RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS—CONTRACTS.

Where the breach of a contract with a partnership occurs prior to the dissolution of the partnership, such dissolution cannot be urged as a defense in an action for the breach, even if such dissolution terminated the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 636, 637; Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 279*)—DISSOLUTION AS TERMINATION OF CONTRACT WITH PARTNERSHIP.

Where both partners are liable on a contract, the dissolution of the firm will not terminate the contract.

5. CONTRACTS (§ 324*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—NATURE OF REMEDY.

Where the measure of damages for the breach of a contract is the amount of profits to which plaintiffs would be entitled, it is immaterial whether they sue for damages or for an accounting of profits.

6. CONTRACTS (§ 202*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING BREACH.

A contract by defendant to give plaintiff the exclusive sale in a certain locality of its "residence furnaces, furnace fittings, and laundry dryers," in consideration of plaintiffs agreeing to sell exclusively the goods manufactured by defendant, is not breached by the sale of airtight stoves by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 918-920; Dec. Dig. § 202.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Miller & Harris against the Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Gaines, T. W. Thomas, and R. C. F. Thomas, for appellant. Sims, Du Bose & Rodes, for appellees.

CLAY, C. The appellees, W. H. Miller and R. E. Harris, partners doing business in Bowling Green, Ky., under the firm name of Miller & Harris, instituted this action against appellant, the Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Company, to recover damages for the violation of a contract whereby appellant gave to appellees the exclusive right of sale for a period of one year from February 23, 1906, of their furnaces and furnace fittings in Bowling Green and vicinity. Appellant filed an answer, which consisted of a traverse, a plea of fraud in the execution, and operation of the contract, and a counterclaim of $1,000. The allegations of the answer were denied by reply. The action was then transferred to equity, and judgment rendered by the chancellor in favor of the appellees for the sum of $150. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The contract sued upon is as follows:

"This agreement, entered into by and between the Peck-Williamson Heating and Ventilating Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, party of the first part and Miller and Harris, of Bowling Green, Ky., parties of the second part, witnesseth:

"That the party of the first part agrees to give the exclusive sale of its residence furnaces, furnace fittings and laundry dryers, in the following territory, to wit: Bowling Green and vicinity for the term of 1 year from date, and further agrees to supply suitable advertising matter free of cost. The party of the first part agrees to bill its goods to the parties of the second part, at the following discounts from prices listed in catalogues I, said prices being F. O. B. Cincinnati or Wellston, O.:

Furnaces.....	50 per cent.
Laundry dryers....	30 per cent.
Furnace fittings..	30 per cent.
List in 1904 laundry dryer catalogue.
Repair castings....	5 cents per pound net.
No. 730 Favorite underfeed furnace, complete with casing.....	$ 88 00
No. 734 Favorite underfeed furnace, complete with casing.....	105 00
No. 738 Favorite underfeed furnace, complete with casing.....	120 00

"A charge will be made for crating and hauling on orders amounting to less than ten ($10.00) dollars.

"In consideration of the above prices and exclusive agency, the parties of the second part agree to sell exclusively the goods manufactured by the party of the first part, and push their sale during the term of this contract; and further agree to make settlement for all goods shipped by giving a 60 days acceptance the first of each month for all goods purchased the previous month, or pay cash less 2 per cent.

"The parties of the second part especially agree not to show this contract, or in any way make known its contents to any person whomsoever.

"In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this 23rd day of Feb'y, A.

D. 1906. The Peck-Williamson Heating and Ventilating Co., By W. T. Jameson.

"Acceptance. We, parties of the second part, hereby accept the foregoing proposition of the Peck-Williamson Heating and Ventilating Company and agree to push the sale of the 'Favorite' furnaces and will order all furnaces used during the continuance of this agreement.

"Done at Bowling Green, Ky., this 28rd day of Feb'y, A. D. 1906."

It is first insisted by appellant that the writing set out above is not a contract, because of its lack of mutuality. With this contention we are unable to agree. By the terms of the contract the parties of the second part are given the exclusive sale of appellant's furnaces, furnace fittings, etc., in the city of Bowling Green and vicinity for the term of one year. The party of the first part further agrees to bill its goods to the parties of the second part at certain discounts from the price list in its catalogue. In consideration of the prices quoted and of the exclusive agency, the parties of the second part agree to sell exclusively the goods manufactured by the party of the first part, and to push their sale during the term of the contract. Here we have obligations proceeding from each party to the contract, and which are capable and possible of performance. Under such circumstances there can be no doubt of the validity of the contract. The contract is such as to protect the rights of either party thereto. It is manifest, therefore, that, if appellant violated its contract, it is liable in damages. Chipman v. Turner, Day & Woolworth Handle Co. (Ky.) 106 S. W. 852. According to the testimony for appellees, the latter, immediately upon execution of the contract, began to make efforts to sell appellant's furnace. They did this by distributing advertising matter which appellant furnished, and by personal solicitation among those who they supposed would likely purchase furnaces. A few days after the contract was entered into appellant's special agent in charge of the southern territory, W. T. Jameson, came to the hardware store of appellees, and found the appellees busy. He thereupon left the store. Soon thereafter he made arrangements with one C. H. Smith to take the agency for the furnaces. During the continuance of the contract Jameson and Smith sold from 12 to 14 furnaces. According to the testimony for appellant, this change in the agency was made because appellees had no mechanic qualified to do furnace work, and because they were not pushing the sale of the furnaces. A careful reading of the whole record, however, convinces us that appellees were not given a reasonable time in which to make or push the sales of the furnace. After the expiration of a little over a month, appellant secured the services of another agent. It appears that some time about the 1st of July W. H. Harris retired from the firm of Miller & Harris, and one Rogers took his place. It is therefore insisted by appellant that the contract was terminated by the dissolution of the firm. It appears, however, that appellant's violation of the contract occurred long prior to that time. Even, then, if the firm's dissolution thereafter terminated the contract, it would not be available as a defense by appellant. But the dissolution of the firm had no such effect upon the contract. As between appellant and Miller & Harris, both were liable to appellant on the contract, and appellant was liable to them. It may be that between Miller & Harris, Miller alone was liable, or alone had the right to recover.

It is next insisted that appellees' cause of action, if they had any, would sound in damages to them, and not in an accounting of profits. In a case of this kind, where the measure of damages would be the amount of profits to which the appellees would be entitled, that question is immaterial.

Counsel for appellant further claim that appellees violated their contract by selling certain airtight stoves during the continuance of the contract. This was not a violation of the contract on the part of the appellees, for the goods manufactured by the party of the first part and referred to in the contract are evidently furnaces, furnace fittings, etc., and not ordinary stoves used for household purposes. Appellant was not competing with ordinary stoves, but with other furnace manufactories.

The plea that appellees were guilty of fraud in the execution and operation of the contract is not borne out by the evidence.

Being of the opinion that the weight of the evidence is in favor of the finding of the chancellor, the judgment is affirmed.

HACKETT'S EX'RS v. HACKETT'S TRUSTEE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 30, 1909.)

1. BANKRUPTCY (§ 148*)—PROPERTY ACQUIRED BY TRUSTEE—AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

The life estate of a bankrupt acquired by will after the adjudication of his bankruptcy does not pass to his trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 625; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 156*)—INTERVENTION IN OTHER PROCEEDING—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

A petition of intervention filed in an action for the construction of a will by a trustee in bankruptcy claiming the estate created by such will is insufficient where it fails to show that testator died before the adjudication in bankruptcy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

3. PLEADING (§ 205*) — SCOPE OF GENERAL DEMURRER.

A general demurrer to a petition of intervention filed in an action to construe a will by a trustee in bankruptcy claiming an estate created by the will questions the sufficiency of the petition to show that testator died before the adjudication in bankruptcy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 205.*]

4. BANKRUPTCY (§ 156*) — INTERVENTION IN OTHER PROCEEDING—PLEADING—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a petition of intervention filed in an action to construe a will by a trustee in bankruptcy claiming an estate created by such will fails to show that testator died before the adjudication in bankruptcy, under the rule that a pleading must be construed most strongly against the pleader, it will be presumed that testator's death was after the adjudication.

5. BANKRUPTCY (§ 156*) — INTERVENTION IN OTHER PROCEEDING—PARTIES.

Where a will gave a bankrupt a life estate in land in trust for himself and his wife and children, the wife and children are necessary parties to a petition of intervention filed in an action for the construction of the will by the trustee in bankruptcy claiming the bankrupt's interest in the estate created by the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Madison County.
"Not to be officially reported."

In an action by the executors of B. C. Hackett, deceased, for the construction of a will, the trustee in bankruptcy of T. B. and Jacob Hackett filed a petition in intervention. From a decree for the intervener, the executors appeal. Reversed.

A. B. Burnam & Son, Smith & Smith, and J. A. Sullivan, for appellants. Grant E. Lilly, for appellee.

LASSING, J. In December, 1905, B. C. Hackett, a bachelor, died a resident of Madison county, Ky. He left a last will by which he disposed of his estate. After the probate of this will, his executors brought suit to settle his estate, and asked the court to construe certain sections of his will, and direct them how to proceed. The following are the provisions of the will involved in this litigation:

"II. I own 550 acres of land, more or less located on the waters of Otter creek, in Madison county, Ky., and known as the Oren and B. C. Hackett farm. This land has been divided into two parts by survey made by B. F. Crook, surveyor. Of said farm, 300 acres more or less, are in the possession of T. B. Hackett, being the west part of the whole boundary, and adjoining Ira N. Scutter, Mrs. John Davis, etc. Of said boundary, and being the east part thereof, 250 acres, more or less, are in possession of Jacob Hackett.

"I will said boundary of 300 acres, more or less, now in possession of T. B. Hackett, to said T. B. Hackett, in trust for his use and that of his wife and infant children residing with him, equally, for and during the life of T. B. Hackett, and on his death, I will that said farm go to and be equally divided among his children, and the representatives of any that may be dead take their dead parent's part or interest in said farm.

"I will boundary of 250 acres, now in possession of Jacob Hackett, to said Jacob Hackett in trust, for his use, and the benefit and the use of his wife and infant children residing with him, equally, for and during the life of said Jacob Hackett, and at the death of said Jacob Hackett I will that said farm go to and be divided equally among all the children of said Jacob Hackett; and that if any of his children shall be dead, then leaving issue or descendants, that they take their dead parent's part the same as if he or she were alive.

"I will that neither T. B. nor Jacob Hackett be required to execute any bond as trustees aforesaid, and that they shall manage said farms respectively and control same according to their judgment. Said trust farms shall be respectively held for the use and benefit only of Jacob and T. B. Hackett, and their wives and their infant children who may reside with them on said farms. On the death of said T. B. Hackett and Jacob Hackett, respectively, and as they die said trusts shall cease, and each of said farms shall descend as above provided."

Thereafter J. J. Greenleaf, trustee in bankruptcy of T. B. Hackett and Jacob Hackett, filed an intervening petition, in which he sought to be made a party to the suit, and set up the fact that they had each been adjudged a bankrupt, and that he had been duly appointed and qualified as their trustee; that, under the second clause of the will, they each took an undivided one-half interest for life in certain lands devised to them in said clause. He asked the court to so adjudge, and that their interest in the said lands be subjected to the satisfaction of their debts. General demurrers were filed to the petition of the executors, and also to the intervening petition of the trustee in bankruptcy. These demurrers were each overruled, and, no further pleading being filed, the allegations of the intervening petition were taken as confessed, and judgment entered in accordance with the prayer thereof. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Three questions are raised:

First. The intervening petition fails to show when T. B. and Jacob Hackett were adjudged bankrupts; that is, whether before or after the death of their uncle, B. C. Hackett. If before, of course, the trustee had no interest in the estate that passed to them under the will of their uncle, and it is insisted for the appellants that it was necessary that the intervening petition state affirmatively such facts. The omission of these necessary allegations from the intervening petition is practically conceded by counsel for appellee, but he insists that as this point was not made in the lower court, and is a defect which could have been readily cured, the case should not be reversed for that reason. To this objection it is only necessary to state that the general demurrer filed specifically raised this point, and, under the general rule that a pleading must be construed most strongly against the pleader, it must be presumed, in the absence of an allegation to the contrary, that the said T. B. and Jacob Hackett were adjudged bankrupts before the date of the death of their uncle, and hence the pleading in the form in which it is presented to us fails to state a cause of action on the part of the trustee in bankruptcy, and the demurrer should have been sustained.

The second point raised is that there is a defect of parties; that, as the wives and children of T. B. and Jacob Hackett are jointly interested with them in the ownership of the land or parts thereof sought to be subjected to the satisfaction of the claims in the hands of the trustee against said T. B. and Jacob Hackett, they should have been made parties to his intervening petition. To this objection counsel for appellee responds that, while it is true that the wives of T. B. and Jacob Hackett were not named as parties to the suit, still as they were represented by counsel through their husbands, who were also their trustees, their interests were fully looked after and protected, and the fact that they were not made parties to the litigation affords no ground for complaint on their part, or reason why the judgment should be reversed; and, further, that before advantage could be taken of this omission on appeal it would be necessary that a motion be made in the circuit court to correct the error. This position of counsel for appellees is wholly untenable, and is no doubt due to the fact that he has confused the object sought to be attained in the original suit with that in his intervening petition. The executors have nothing whatever under the terms of the will to do with the land which appellee seeks to subject in satisfaction of the claims of the creditors of T. B. and Jacob Hackett. The purpose of the original suit was to settle the estate of B. C. Hackett, and, as a means to that end, the executors sought the guidance, direction, and instruction of the court as to how they should proceed in the management of certain other lands and matters which were, by the express provisions of the will, entrusted to them, whereas the purpose of the intervening petition is, in effect, to have the lands described therein partitioned among their respective owners, and the interests of T. B. and Jacob Hackett therein set apart and subjected to the satisfaction of their debts. It is true that, in order to have this done, it is necessary that clause 2 of the will under consideration be construed so that the definite interests of said T. B. and Jacob Hackett in said land might be ascertained. As the wives and infant children of T. B. and Jacob Hackett have an equal present interest with them in said lands, and are therefore directly interested in the result of the claims prosecuted by the trustee in his intervening petition, they are necessary parties to said action, and no valid judgment could be rendered until both the wives and the infant children of T. B. and Jacob Hackett have been made parties, and properly brought before the court.

As the judgment must be reversed for these reasons, we deem it unnecessary to pass at this time upon the other questions raised.

The wives and infant children of T. B. and Jacob Hackett should be made parties defendant to the intervening petition, and brought before the court thereon, the demurrer to the said petition should be sustained with leave to amend, and if the pleading, when so amended, states a cause of action against T. B. and Jacob Hackett, then they should be permitted to plead and set up a homestead interest in said land, and make such other defense as they desire or can.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

TAYLOR et al. v. CUNDIFF et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 28, 1909.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 42*)—ESTABLISHMENT—ORDER—LOCATION OF SCHOOL.

The order of the county court under St. 1909, § 4464 (Russell's St. § 5736), providing that an order shall fix the boundary of a proposed graded school district and direct the holding of an election, provided that no point of the boundary shall be more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the site of the proposed schoolhouse, and that the location and site of the schoolhouse are set out with exactness, sufficiently locates the schoolhouse to validate the election, where, after specifically setting out the boundary, it provides that the site shall be south of a certain line and as near as practicable to the center of the district, so that the boundary line shall be at no point more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the schoolhouse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 42*)—CREATION—ELECTION—ORDERS.

Where the county court ordered an election to be held at E. on a certain date on the question of creation of a graded school district, its subsequent order referring to the first order, and reciting that it appears by a report on file that said election "was duly held at the time and place set forth in said order," sufficiently shows the election was held at E.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 909*)—PRESUMPTION—PERFORMANCE OF DUTY BY OFFICER.

There being in the record a statement, certified to by the sheriff who was ordered to open a poll on the question of creation of a school district, setting out that in accordance with the order "notice is hereby given that an election will be held," etc., it will be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the officer performed his duty by publishing the notice as required by law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by J. M. Taylor and others against H. V. Cundiff and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. Denton, for appellants. Virgil P. Smith, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. The appellants attack the validity of a tax levied to establish and maintain a graded school in Pulaski county upon the grounds: (1) That the order of the county court creating the school district and authorizing the levy of the tax, if a majority of the voters favored the establishment of the school, is void because the order fails to describe or designate the site of the schoolhouse in the district; (2) that the election returns of the poll opened for the purpose of ascertaining the will of the voters was not certified according to law; (3) that the school was not organized in accordance with the order of court. Their petition was dismissed, and they appeal.

Section 4464, Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 5736), provides in part that the county judge, after he receives a petition, shall enter an order "fixing the boundary of any proposed graded common school district, as agreed on by the county judge and the petitioners, and directing the sheriff or other officer, whose duty it may be to hold the election, to open a poll in said proposed graded common school district, at the next regular state, town or city election to be held therein, or on any other day fixed by said judge in said order, * * * provided * * * that no point on the boundary of any proposed graded common school district be more than two and one-half miles from the site of its proposed schoolhouse, and that the location and site of said schoolhouse in said district are set out with exactness in said petition to the county judge."

The order of the county court calling an election describes the proposed district as follows: "Beginning at J. S. Higgins (Andy Gibson place); thence with the line of district No. 2 (Somerset) to R. Gibson's place, not including it; thence to John Hanes, including him; thence to L. A. Gover's farm, including it; thence to Perk Hamilton's farm, not including it; thence down Pitman creek to the railroad bridge; thence with the railroad, not including it, to E. F. Parker's, including him; thence to John D. Gover's farm, including it; thence to James Cowan's farm, including it; thence to S. I. Govers, including him; thence to Joe Barnes, including him; thence to where the line of district No. 1 crosses the Monticello road; thence with said line of district No. 1 to the beginning. The site of the schoolhouse shall be located south of the original line of the city of Ferguson and as near as practicable to the center of the district, so that the boundary line of said district shall not at any point be more than two and one-half miles from the schoolhouse."

It is not insisted that the boundary is insufficient, but the contention is that the site of the schoolhouse is not accurately defined. It is neither practicable nor necessary that the site of a schoolhouse in a graded school district should be exactly in the center of the district. The direction in the statute is that "no point on the boundary of any proposed graded common school district shall be more than two and one-half miles from the site of its proposed schoolhouse, and that the location and site of said schoolhouse in said district are set out with exactness." A substantial compliance with this statute in reference to the designation of the site of the schoolhouse is all that is required, and, while the location of the school building is not as accurately defined as it might be, this fact will not invalidate an election in other respects conforming to the law. The election returns were not properly certified at the time they should have been; but counsel candidly admits that the result of the election was properly certified afterwards, and that the subsequent action of the commissioners, as held in Mullins v. McKeel, 109 Ky. 539, 50 S. W. 849, remedied the defect in the first returns and certification.

The next objection urged against the validity of the tax is that the orders of court do not show with sufficient certainty that an election was held. The order of court entered on February 18, 1907, directs the sheriff of Pulaski county "to open a poll and cause an election to be held at Elihu on the 6th day of April, 1907, the same being 40 days and more after and from the entry of this order, for the purpose of taking the sense of the legal white voters residing within said boundary." The next order recites, in part, that: "By an order made by this court at the regular February term, 1907, of said court, an election was ordered to be held within the boundary proposed for said district. It now appears from a report on file that said election was duly and legally held at the time and place set forth in said order." It is true the order reciting that an election was held does not certify that it was held at "Elihu," as required in the order directing an election, but the recitation that it was held at the time and place mentioned in the order leaves no room to doubt that it was held at Elihu, so that we find little merit in this objection.

It is further insisted that there is no statement in the record that notices of election were published in the manner required by the statute. We find, however, in the record a statement certified to by the sheriff of Pulaski county, to whom the order to open a poll was directed, setting out that in accordance with the order "notice is hereby given that an election will be held at Elihu, Ky., and a poll opened in said voting place on the 6th day of April, 1907, for the purpose of getting the sense of the legal voters of said district." In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we will presume that the officer did his duty and published the notices as required by law.

It is suggested that the graded school district was not properly organized, but this intimation is not borne out by the record.

Perceiving no objection to the validity of the tax, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

DR. C. BOUVIER SPECIALTY CO. v. JAMES, Auditor, et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 49*)—LICENSES—"COMPOUNDING OR ADULTERATING."

The manufacture of buchu gin by pouring pure gin on a bed or mat of buchu leaves and allowing it to percolate through; then adding distilled water and syrup, the gin comprising some 50 per cent. or more of the compound, which is 46 per cent. alcohol and designed for use as a beverage, constitutes a "compounding or adulterating" within St. 1909, § 4114A et seq. (Russell's St. § 6157), imposing a license tax of 1¼ cents a wine gallon on the business of compounding, rectifying, adulterating or blending distilled spirits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 49*)—DISTILLED SPIRITS—"SINGLE-STAMP SPIRITS."

Single-stamp spirits within St. 1909, § 4114A et seq. (Russell's St. § 6157), imposing a tax on the business of compounding, rectifying, adulterating, or blending distilled spirits known and designated as single stamped spirits, is not confined to whisky, but includes any distilled alcoholic spirits used as a beverage whether single or double stamped.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Dr. C. Bouvier Specialty Company against Frank P. James, as Auditor, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred Selligman, for appellant. Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Jno. F. Lockett, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellees.

O'REAR, J. By an act of the General Assembly, extraordinary session of 1906, the business of compounding, rectifying, adulterating, or blending distilled spirits, "known and designated as single-stamp spirits," is required to pay a license tax of 1¼ cents a wine gallon, on such compounded, blended, or rectified article. Section 4114A et seq., Ky. St. 1909 (Russell's St. § 6157). Appellant is a domestic corporation engaged in the production of what it has named "buchu gin." It was required to report and pay license tax on its business. It now sues the Auditor of Public Accounts to recover the sums so paid, alleging that the payments were coerced from it and were made under a mistake of law and fact as to its liability therefor. It asserts that its product is not blended or rectified spirits, but is a medicinal preparation solely, and that, while it contains some 46 per cent. of alcohol, it has certain of the constituent elements of buchu, which, with the syrup and water that is added, make it potable, and impart to it certain medicinal properties. Just what per cent. of the properties of buchu is incorporated in the product is not stated in the petition. It is manufactured by pouring pure gin upon a bed or mat of buchu leaves and allowing it to percolate through; then add distilled water and syrup, the gin comprising some 50 per cent. or more of the compound. "Gin" is distilled alcoholic spirits, made from rye and barley, flavored with juniper berries or turpentine. It is notoriously strong alcoholic spirits. When diluted and sweetened, with the slight flavor of buchu leaves added, it would be, and doubtless is, an attractive drink as a beverage, and is so advertised by appellant. The quantity of the medicinal properties of buchu leaves is negligible, or may be, as this product is made; but, although it may have some medicinal quality, its main constituent is gin, and the principal use designed for it is as a beverage. The process of making it is a "compounding" or "adulterating," as those words are used in the statute.

While the statute speaks of "single-stamp spirits," it was not intended to confine it to whisky, as appellant contends; but any distilled spirits, alcoholic and used as a beverage, whether single stamped or double stamped, are included within the intent of the act. Brown-Foreman Co. v. Commonwealth, 125 Ky. 402, 101 S. W. 321. The act is primarily a revenue act, is so denominated by the Legislature, and classed as such by it and the compiler of the statutes. Incidentally it was designed to protect the distillers of straight whiskies, and to protect the public from spurious and adulterated articles. The business of making a merchantable potation to be sold as a beverage, by blending distilled alcoholic spirits of the proof which is required to pay a revenue tax to the United States government, with any other liquid, or by adulterating such distilled spirits by diluting it so it will have a lower spirit proof, is taxed by the statute. Nor does it make any difference what name may be given the product, or what uses, whether good or innocent, it may be suited to. That occupation or business is taxed, and the license prescribed by the statute is necessary, or it is unlawful to conduct it.

Such was the effect of the judgment of the circuit court, and it is affirmed.

NICHOLS v. PENNINGTON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 29, 1909.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 298*)—CONTESTS—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

In a school district trustee election contest, under St. 1909, § 1596a (Russell's St. § 4046), providing that the courts shall try contested election cases in lieu of boards of contest, etc., the court had no jurisdiction to pass on the alleged want of eligibility of the contestee because of nonresidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 303, 305; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

2. ELECTIONS (§ 298*)—CONTEST—COUNTING VOTES IMPROPERLY EXCLUDED.

Where in an election contest it appeared that two persons whose votes were refused were legal voters, the court could not consider their votes as cast, but could only declare that there was no election, where their votes, if cast, would have changed the result.

3. ELECTIONS (§ 298*)—CONTEST—REVIEW OF FINDINGS OF ELECTION OFFICERS.

Where election officers had reasonable ground to find that persons who offered to vote were not entitled to do so, such findings will not be disturbed by the courts in a contest.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenup County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Petition by William Pennington against J. B. Nichols to contest the latter's election as school district trustee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. S. Cooper, for appellant. E. E. Fullerton, for appellee.

NUNN, J. There was an election held in a school district in Greenup county on the first Saturday in August, 1908, under the provisions of an act which took effect March 24, 1908 (Laws 1908, p. 133, c. 56), for the purpose of electing a trustee for that district. There were two candidates legally presented to be voted for, to wit, the parties to this action. When the polls were closed it was ascertained by the election officers that appellee had received 30 and appellant 31 votes. The officers of the election certified to the election of Nichols. The county school superintendent for that county recognized Nichols' election and inducted him into office. Within the time fixed by the statute, and on the 5th day of August, 1908, appellee filed a petition in the circuit court of Greenup county for the purpose of contesting the election of Nichols. The grounds alleged for the contest were that Nichols was ineligible to the office because he did not reside, at the time of his election and qualification, in that district; but his place of residence was in an adjoining district. He named one person who voted for Nichols who, he alleged, had been convicted of a felony and who had not been pardoned, and by reason thereof was not entitled to vote. He also gave the names of two other persons whom he alleged were legal voters in that district, and who appeared at the polls and offered to vote and were refused the privilege, and that they would have voted for him, if they had been permitted to vote. Appellant filed his answer within the time fixed by the statute, namely, subsection 12 of section 1596a Ky. St. (Russell's St. § 4046), by which he controverted the allegations of the petition. Appellee took his proof within the time prescribed by the statute. Appellant did not take any testimony, and the case was submitted for trial. The court sustained appellee's contest and awarded him the office.

The testimony tended to show that Nichols' dwelling house was not within the district in which the election was held, and it must have been upon this evidence that the lower court sustained appellee. The court, in a contest case like this, has no power to consider and pass upon such a question. In the case of Wilson v. Tye, 122 Ky. 508, 92 S. W. 295, this court decided that this section of the statute (section 1596a) was especially enacted to give the courts a right to try contested election cases, in lieu of boards of contest, and it defines the power of the court, and the rules of procedure, and the court is compelled to conform to them in such trials. It fixes the time for the filing of the petition, answer, reply, and within what time each of the parties must take their proof. It requires both the circuit court and the Court of Appeals to hear and determine the case as speedily as possible, giving such cases preference over all others, and then defines how the court shall try them by ascertaining from the record who was elected; but if it appears that there has been such fraud, intimidation, bribery, or violence in conducting the election that neither the contestant nor contestee can be adjudged to have been fairly elected, the court, in such event, should adjudge that there has been no election. The court in that case said: "In our opinion, when the General Assembly enacted this statute, in lieu of the former statute, with reference to the trial of contested elections, it was intended to relegate the question of eligibility or legal qualifications for the office to a different or other mode of procedure."

That case is conclusive of this question. There was no testimony, or at least no competent testimony, introduced showing that any person voted for appellant at that election who had been convicted of a felony. There was testimony showing that two persons offered to vote at that election and were not permitted to do so, for the reason, as the officers of the election conceived, they were not legal voters in that district. These two persons testified that they would have voted, had they been permitted to do so, for appellee; but the fact is they did not vote, and the election officers did not have, nor has this court, the right to consider those two votes as cast. The result of the election can be determined only by the number of votes actually polled, and of these appellant had the majority. If the two persons who offered to vote and were refused were legal voters, the only power this court would have would be to declare that there was no election. This court could not declare appellee elected. However, the testimony as to the qualification of the two persons named left the mind in doubt as to whether or not they were legal voters in that precinct at that election, and the officers of the election had reasonable grounds to conclude that they were not, and we will not disturb their finding. Nor would we interfere with their conclusion had they, under the evidence, decided otherwise.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Alfred Johnson's administrator against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. S. Hill and Russell & Hill, for appellant. W. C. McChord, W. W. Spalding, and Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellee.

NUNN, J. Alfred Johnson was killed by one of appellee's engines, which was attached to some passenger coaches, on its line of road in Marion county, Ky., something near 300 yards south of a small station called "Riley." There were two tracks at this point. One was the main and the other a side track. These two tracks were six or eight feet apart. The space between them was filled with cinders which had been made level and smooth. Johnson and the train were moving north towards the station when he was killed. On either side of the two tracks appellee had a fence which extended north to a cattle guard that crossed both tracks near the station, but it does not appear how far they extended south. Immediately on the outside of the fence on the east side was a public road running parallel with the tracks. Johnson resided a few miles south of Riley station.

The testimony tended to show: That Johnson left his home for the purpose of looking for a hog that had strayed; that he moved towards the station along the public road until he reached a point where the two tracks came together; that at this point he entered upon the track and continued his course towards the station. It was shown by the testimony, without contradiction, that many persons walked upon or between these tracks daily going to and coming from the station. No witness saw Johnson upon the track before he was killed, except the engineer and fireman. They testified: That they saw him walking along between the tracks, but nearer the side track than the main line, when they were 700 or 800 yards from him; that, if he had continued his course along near the side track, he would have been in no danger of being hurt; that, instead of doing this, when they reached a point 60 or 70 feet from him, he turned at an angle of about 45 degrees and walked upon the main track in front of the engine; that immediately the air brakes were applied to their full capacity, and the alarm whistle was sounded three or four times, but, in spite of all they could do, they could not save Johnson. The testimony was very conflicting as to whether or not the whistle was sounded for the station; several witnesses testifying on either side. The engineer and fireman testified, and were not contradicted, that the bell on the engine was started to ringing at a point several hundred yards south of Johnson, and that it continued to ring to the time Johnson was struck.

The facts of this case are not as strong for appellant here as were the facts in the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Redmon's Adm'x, 122 Ky. 385, 91 S. W. 722, for the appellee therein, and the court in that case decided that the railroad company was not responsible for the death of Redmon. Under the authority of that case and the cases of Parkerson, Adm'x, v. L. & N. R. R. Co. (Ky.) 80 S. W. 468, and Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Nipp's Adm'x, 125 Ky. 49, 100 S. W. 246, appellee owed Johnson no duty, except to save him from injury after discovering his peril, if they could do so by the use of ordinary care. The court instructed the jury upon this question as follows: "(1) The court instructs the jury that decedent, at the time he was struck, was a trespasser on the defendant's right of way and those in charge of the train owed him no duty until his peril was actually discovered by them, and if you believe that, after his peril was actually discovered, the defendant's employes used all reasonable means at their command to avoid injuring him, considering the time at their disposal, you should find for the defendant. (2) If you believe from the evidence in this case that, after the engineer in charge of defendant's engine became aware of the fact that decedent was on or so near the track on which said train was running as to render his position dangerous or perilous, he failed to use ordinary care to apprise decedent of the approach of the train and to avoid striking him, and that as a result thereof he was struck and killed, you should find for the plaintiff. On the other hand, unless you do believe from the evidence that the said engineer, after becoming aware of decedent's presence on or so near said track as to render his position dangerous or perilous, did fail to use ordinary care to apprise him of the approach of the train and to avoid striking him, you should find for the defendant; and, in determining the question as to whether said engineer did or not use ordinary care, you should consider the time in which he had to act, and all the circumstances of the situation." These instructions correctly state the law of the case.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CHICAGO BLDG. & MFG. CO. v. PETERSON. SAME v. BEAVEN. SAME v. MAHON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. April 30, 1909.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 78*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract was entered into between subscribers to a voluntary association and a manufacturing company, whereby the subscribers each agreed to subscribe to one share of stock, and the company agreed for a certain price, to be paid from the subscriptions, to erect a butter factory, the balance of the subscriptions to be delivered to a corporation which was to be formed by the subscribers, and provided that for any unpaid or deferred balance of subscription all delinquent subscribers should be jointly liable, that as soon as the corporation was formed, stock certificates should be issued to each paid-up stockholder, and that pursuant to the laws of his state, etc., each stockholder should be liable for the amount of stock set opposite his name, and no more. Nine subscribers to one share each, of the par value of $100, refused to pay their subscriptions. Held, that they were jointly and severally liable for the total amount due from them; the provision for limitation of liability to the amount of stock subscribed by each having reference solely to the rights and liabilities of stockholders in the corporation which was to be formed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 78*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—CONSTRUCTION.

As each subscriber could extinguish his liability by paying the amount of his subscription, there was no liability on the part of a single subscriber for the whole amount to be paid the building company; the liability of the subscribers being several, unless they elected to make it joint by becoming delinquent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 61*)—DECISION REVIEWABLE—COURT OF APPEALS—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

The liability of each of the nine delinquents being for the entire $900, the Court of Appeals had jurisdiction of appeals, in actions brought by them against the building company to have their subscriptions declared void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

4. CORPORATION (§ 77*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK.

Where a subscription paper, signed by subscribers to stock in an enterprise, consisted of one sheet of paper folded so as to make four pages, the first page containing the specifications of the building the other party to the contract proposed to erect; the second page containing the contract between the subscribers and the other party; the third page containing blank columns in which to insert the names of the subscribers, and the numbers of shares of stock subscribed for by each, presenting, at the top of the page over one column, the words "names of stock subscribers," over the next words "numbers of shares," and over the next "amount of stock subscription"; and the fourth page containing a diagram of the factory to be erected—held, that the paper embraced a single contract, the page containing the subscribers being their acceptance of the terms thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporation, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 83*) — STOCK SUBSCRIPTIONS—RIGHT OF SUBSCRIBER TO WITHDRAW.

Where numerous persons agreed with each other and with a building company that they would pay the amount of stock subscribed by them to establish a butter factory, and that when the plant was completed by the building company they would organize themselves into a corporation, none of them could, in the absence of fraud or other good cause, withdraw before the corporation was formed, and avoid payment of his subscription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 828-336; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 76*) — SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—VALIDITY—FAILURE TO READ BEFORE SIGNING.

That persons signing a written contract of subscription to stock failed to read or understand it before signing would not relieve them from liability thereon in the absence of fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by John F. Peterson, T. A. Beaven, and John R. Mahon against the Chicago Building & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff in each case, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Jno. McChord, for appellant. W. W. Spalding, H. W. Rives, and P. K. McElroy, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. These three appeals, involving the same questions of law, will be disposed of together.

In July, 1908, the appellant company, which was engaged in erecting creamery or butter factories, sent one of its agents to St. Marys, in Marion county, for the purpose of interesting the farmers of that community in establishing a factory. The agent was successful in securing 55 persons to subscribe for one share of stock each of the par value of $100. The subscription paper signed by all of the subscribers consisted of one sheet of paper, folded so as to make four pages. The first page contained the specifications of the building the manufacturing company proposed to erect; the second page contained the contract between the company and the subscribers; the third page contained blank columns in which to insert the names of the subscribers and the number of shares of stock subscribed for by each. At the top of this page there is printed over one column the words "names of stock subscribers," over the next, the words "number of shares," and over the next "amount of stock subscription." The fourth page contained a diagram of the factory. The contract on the second page reads in part as follows: "Witnesseth: That the first party hereto until full and final payment of this contract is a voluntary association of persons in and around the city of St. Marys, county of Marion, and state of Kentucky, and known as the St. Marys Creamery Association, and who will subsequently organize themselves into a going corporation, to permanently conduct the creamery business as contemplated herein. The second party hereto is the Chicago Building & Manufacturing Company, manufacturers and builders, doing a manufacturing and wholesale business solely from Chicago, Illinois. On the 6th day of January, A. D. 1908, the said parties execute the following contract, to wit: In consideration of the entire purchase price of forty-nine hundred and fifty ($4,950) dollars, which first party herein pledges itself to pay in cash or equivalent note, as hereinafter specified, second party and successors agree as follows: To devise, erect, equip and deliver, on land hereafter to be acquired, a butter factory, at or near St. Marys, Ky., to be delivered at any time within ninety days from date of final approval to said contract, unavoidable accidents and delays excepted. [Then follows a description of the factory to be erected.] First party and successors further agree as follows: On notice from second party to appoint a building committee, consisting of not more than five persons, with conclusive authority to represent first party from date of appointment, till final settlement and permanent organization of the future corporation. Within three days thereafter said committee, at expense of first party, shall procure and purchase in fee simple suitable level land with good legal title and to furnish thereon, in time for the builder, suitable water for direct connection with pump for the needs of said factory, and properly assign and describe said site to second party, to be held in trust for first party till full discharge of this contract agreement by first party. Said committee shall inspect work and material during construction and shall specify in writing to second party any defects therein, if any, at occurrence, to be remedied within a reasonable time. At date of delivery said committee shall meet with a representative of second party and together compare the details of said factory, and if it is in substantial accordance with the within contract and specifications, with the machinery and fixtures set up in a workmanlike manner, second party's discharge of this contract is complete and payment is due thereunder. * * * For any unpaid or deferred balance of subscription, all delinquent subscribers are jointly liable and first party agrees that any failure in any of its covenants may be construed as a joint and total breach of the within contract. * * * All remaining subscriptions or note balance, after said association's entire indebtedness to second party has been so paid, shall be duly assigned to the said corporation for a working capital. After payment and delivery has been made, as above, said association shall organize a co-operative society under state law, fixing aggregate amount of stock at not less than the amount subscribed hereto, represented by stock certificates for $100 each. Said certificates will then be issued to each paid-up stockholder, in proportion to his interest, it being especially agreed that there can be no default, withdrawal or transfer of subscription or stock until lawfully entered on the books of said future corporation by its regularly elected officers. Pursuant to the laws of his state and these conditions, it is agreed that each stockholder shall be liable for the amount of stock set opposite his or her name and no more."

On September 1, 1908, the manufacturing company executed the following additional obligation: "The Chicago Building & Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, Illinois, hereby agrees that it will carry out in full the conditions of its contract made July 6, 1908, with the subscribers to the St. Marys Creamery Association and guarantees that it will collect by suit or otherwise the subscription contract amounting to $5,500.00, and will turn over to said association through its duly authorized agent the surplus of $550.00 as a running fund, as soon as collection is made by said company or as soon as said manufacturing company has had reasonable time to coerce payment of said subscription list. Said manufacturing company guarantees the collection of said subscription list for the purpose of satisfying the cost of the creamery and said working fund."

It appears that 46 of the subscribers paid their subscriptions in full, and on the 21st day of September, 1908, a committee of 5, appointed by the subscribers to examine the factory that had just been completed by the company, certified in writing that it was finished according to the specifications and contract, and accepted the same. But, previous to this time, and on August 27, 1908, the appellees instituted separate actions against the appellant company, in which they asked to have their several subscriptions declared void, and that the company be required to erase and cancel their respective names from the subscription list, and be perpetually enjoined from asserting any claim against either of them on account of said subscription. They sought this relief upon the ground that the agent who secured the subscriptions practiced a fraud upon the subscribers by representing, as an inducement to obtain their subscriptions, that the company was going to erect a creamery at St. Marys, and organize the company to operate it, and that the stock would be $100 per share, and the cost of the plant $4,950, and that the company would guarantee dividends of 6 per cent. on the stock, and, further, that the president of the Marion National Bank had agreed to take two shares of stock, and to furnish to the creamery the milk of 20 cows. They averred that in subscribing they did not know they were signing any contract as individuals, but supposed they were obligating themselves to take stock to the amount of their subscription in the company that would be organized. When the case came on for trial, the company filed an answer and counterclaim, in which, after traversing the averments of the petition, and setting up the facts hereinbefore stated in reference to the completion of the creamery, and its acceptance by the subscribers, it asked judgment against each of the appellees for the amount of their respective subscriptions. A general demurrer to this pleading was sustained, and thereupon an amended answer, counterclaim, and cross-petition was filed. In this pleading it was averred that all of the subscribers had paid their subscriptions, except 9, and that each of these 9 had filed suits similar to the ones brought by these 3; that of the $4,900 received from the paying subscribers, it had retained $4,060, and had paid $555 to the creamery company, leaving $900 due to it as a balance on the construction price of the factory. It further averred that the paying subscribers had in October, 1908, organized a corporation under the laws of the state for the purpose of operating the creamery. It set up the stipulation in the contract providing that "For any unpaid or deferred balance of subscription, all delinquent subscribers are jointly liable and first party agrees that any failure in any of its covenants may be construed as a joint and total breach of the within contract," and asked that the 9 actions brought by the 9 delinquent subscribers be consolidated, and that it have judgment against each and all of them jointly and severally for the sum of $900. To this pleading a demurrer was sustained, and a judgment entered canceling each subscription, and enjoining the manufacturing company from asserting any claim against the subscribers on account of their several subscriptions.

The first question raised is, Has this court jurisdiction of the appeal? It is the contention of appellees that each subscriber was only liable for the amount of his subscription; and, as each subscription was only for $100, this court has not jurisdiction. On the other hand, the manufacturing company insists that each of the delinquent subscribers is jointly and severally liable for the total amount of delinquent subscription, and hence it was entitled to judgment against each of them jointly and severally for $900, and so this court has jurisdiction, and the power to review the judgment dismissing its answer, counterclaim, and cross-petition which sought judgment for this amount. In addition to this it is said that, as the actions by the appellees were not brought for the recovery of money or property, but for the purpose of having their subscriptions canceled, this court would have jurisdiction even though it be conceded that the amount in controversy in each case was only $100. In the view we have of the matter it does not seem necessary to pass upon the question whether this court would have jurisdiction if the only relief sought and granted was the cancellation of a subscription for $100. In our opinion, under the terms of the contract, each of the delinquent subscribers was liable, jointly and severally, for the total amount due by the delinquents. This seems to be the plain reading of the contract. Nor is there any conflict between the clause in the contract containing this condition and the clause stipulating, "Pursuant to the laws of his state and these conditions, it is agreed that each stockholder shall be liable for the amount of stock set opposite his or her name and no more." This last provision has reference to the rights and liabilities of the stockholders in the corporation it was contemplated and agreed in the contract should be created. Whereas the provision that "for any unpaid or deferred balance of subscription all delinquent subscribers are jointly liable" has reference to the liability of the subscribers in the voluntary association that was organized for the purpose of erecting the factory. Under this construction, which seems to be the reasonable one, both clauses may stand, and the contract as a whole remain a harmonious instrument.

In its inception, and when the contract in controversy was signed by the subscribers, it was merely a voluntary association; but it was contemplated, and so provided in the contract, that the members of this voluntary association "will subsequently organize themselves into a going corporation to permanently conduct the creamery business as contemplated herein." In the corporation to be organized the manufacturing company had no interest or concern. It was only interested in obtaining the requisite number of subscriptions to the voluntary association to guarantee the purchase price of the plant it proposed to erect. The whole paper must be construed as one contract, and the page containing the names of the subscribers be treated as their acceptance of the terms of the contract. We find nothing unconscionable or against public policy in this contract. The manufacturing company obligated itself to furnish for a specified sum a plant equipped according to the plans and specifications that were a part of the contract, and the subscribers bound themselves to pay for the stock they took in the association. They further agreed that, if any of them failed to pay when due the amount subscribed, each subscriber so in default would be jointly and severally liable for all delinquent subscriptions. In other words, each subscriber said, "I will either pay the amount I have subscribed, or if I fail to pay it, I will become responsible for all the others who fail to pay their subscriptions." Any subscriber could extinguish his liability by paying the amount of his subscription. It was only in the event that he failed to pay his subscription that his obligation to become responsible for the other delinquent subscriptions attached. So that there is no foundation in fact for the argument presented by counsel for appellees that each subscriber became liable for the whole amount they agreed to pay the manufacturing company. The person who first subscribed for one share of stock, as well as the person who last subscribed for a share, could relieve himself from any further liability by paying, when due, the amount subscribed. They did not become liable for any other unpaid or deferred subscription unless they were also delinquent. The clause covering this feature of the contract is plain. It reads: "For any unpaid or deferred balance of subscription, all delinquent subscribers are jointly liable." Except for this clause, which was evidently inserted for the purpose of inducing all of the subscribers to pay the amount of their subscription, no one of them would be liable for any more than the amount he subscribed. The liability of the subscribers was a several one, unless they elected to make it a joint one by becoming delinquent. The contracts construed in Davis v. Belford, 70 Mich. 120, 37 N. W. 919, Gibbons v. Grinsell, 79 Wis. 365, 48 N. W. 235, and Davis, etc., Co. v. Barber (C. C.) 51 Fed. 148, did not contain the joint liability clause we are considering.

The further argument is made that the appellees had the right, at any time before the voluntary association was converted into a corporation, to withdraw their subscriptions; and, as this action was instituted in August, 1908, and the corporation was not organized until October, 1908, it is said that appellees had the right to withdraw, and that after their withdrawal they could not be proceeded against on their subscriptions; that the remedy, if any, against them would be an action in damages. There is some authority supporting this view. Bryant's Pond Steam Mill Co. v. Felt, 87 Me. 234, 32 Atl. 888, 33 L. R. A. 593, 47 Am. St. Rep. 823; Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. D. 800, 50 N. W. 836, 16 L. R. A. 655, 33 Am. St. Rep. 783. It does not, however, seem necessary that we should express an opinion as to the right of a subscriber to stock in a proposed corporation to withdraw his subscription before the corporation is organized. That question is not before us on this record. The subscribers to the contract we are considering bound themselves to pay to the manufacturing company a certain sum in consideration of its agreement to erect and equip a factory according to the specifications agreed upon. Upon this state of facts we are of the opinion that, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or some other good reason that would authorize a cancellation of the subscription, the subscribers could not defeat the purpose of the association, or relieve themselves from liability to the company, simply by declaring that they intended to withdraw from the association. In Twin Creek & Colemansville Tp. R. Co. v. Lancaster, 79 Ky. 552, Lancaster and others subscribed stock in a corporation proposed to be organized for the purpose of constructing turnpike roads. After the company was organized, some of the subscribers declined to pay, and an action to recover the amount of their subscription was instituted against them. In the course of the opinion holding them liable, the court said: "The purpose of signing the subscription was to enable the subscribers to organize and form a corporation that would inure to the benefit of all. It was in fact a mutual agreement by which each subscriber pledged himself to pay a certain sum of money in order to perfect the organization and complete the enterprise. A subscriber or partner in an intended undertaking, subscribing an agreement to take measures to carry out the same, cannot discharge himself from liability, or repudiate the concern to which he may have pledged himself. This was not in fact an agreement to subscribe, but it was a subscription without any other condition than the organization of the company or corporation. * * * There was no other condition annexed. * * * The agreement in this case is not a mere voluntary donation by the appellees, but an agreement, in effect, to form an association which, when organized and the enterprise completed, will vest the parties with a right of property that will advance their private, as well as the public, interests; and in such a case we regard the doctrine as well settled that it is too late after the act of incorporation takes place, whether the work has or not been undertaken, to withdraw from the association." This case was followed in Bullock v. Falmouth, etc., Tp. R. Co., 85 Ky. 185, 3 S. W. 129, and Cadiz R. Co. v. Roach, 114 Ky. 984, 72 S. W. 280. And we see no difference in principle between the rule announced in those cases and the one we have applied in this. The parties to this contract agreed, not only with the manufacturing company, but with each other, that they would pay for the purpose of establishing the proposed enterprise the amount of stock subscribed, and further agreed that when the plant was completed they would organize themselves into a corporation. Thus a complete and binding contract was entered into by each of the subscribers, and neither, in the absence of fraud or other good cause, had the right to withdraw from the corporation, or fail to pay his subscription and thereby defeat the ends intended to be accomplished when the contract of subscription was entered into. Cross v. Pinckneyville, 17 Ill. 54; Hughes v. Antietam Mfg. Co., 84 Md. 316; Johnson v. Wabash R. Co., 16 Ind. 389; Gibbons v. Bente, 51 Minn. 499, 53 N. W. 756, 22 L. R. A. 80. The manufacturing company was only interested in the subscriptions to the extent of the contract price of $4,950. After this sum had been collected, the remainder of the subscriptions belonged to the voluntary subscribers, and was intended to be, as expressed in the contract, turned over to the corporation for a working capital. If one of the subscribers could withdraw, others could, of course, do the same, and the result would be that the purpose for which the association was formed would be defeated. It would be the merest child's play to permit persons to enter into voluntary agreements of this kind one day and repudiate them the next. It may be, as said by counsel for appellees, that if these subscribers had known the terms of the contract, they would not have subscribed to the enterprise, but the fact that they did not see proper to read or understand the contract is no reason why they should be released. Their failure to read it is another of the many illustrations that come before courts that persons entering into contracts read them after they have signed them, in place of before.

The judgment in each case is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrers to the pleadings filed by appellant and for other proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS v. IMPROVED BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS.

CORPORATIONS (§ 49*)—CORPORATE NAMES.

A corporation chartered under the name of "Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America," maintaining certain business institutions, clubhouses, a home for aged and invalid members, and engaged in conducting charities and supplying amusements for its members, who were all white people, was entitled to an injunction restraining a corporation, composed of colored people and organized for similar purposes, from using the name "Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World," and also from using complainant's badge, emblems, ritual, passwords, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 137; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

Bill for injunction by the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America against the Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World. A decree for complainant in the chancery court of Shelby county was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and defendant petitions for certiorari. Application refused.

J. N. Estes, for complainant. Thos. M. Scruggs and B. F. Booth, for defendant.

NEIL, J. The complainant alleged in its bill that it was a corporation chartered under the name of "Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America," and that its members were generally known over the United States as the "Elks"; that the defendant was subsequently chartered under the name of the "Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World"; that the similarity of the two names has not only produced confusion in the operations of the two bodies, but, in the nature of things, will continue to cause confusion, in the fact that mail intended for the one will be delivered to the other, that the membership of the one will be confounded in the public mind with the membership of the other, likewise the enterprises whereby money is raised for charitable purposes, such as baseball games, theatrical entertainments, etc., which require advertisement and public patronage; that thereby the complainant will be greatly depleted and deteriorated in its membership, which will cause large financial losses, since extensive revenues are derived from this source. It is shown in the bill that, while complainant is not technically engaged in business, it owns property worth $9,000,000, has an annual income of $4,000,000 and yearly dispenses in charity $500,000. It also appears from the bill that the complainant owns clubhouses in which its members are entertained; also that it maintains a home for its aged and invalid members, wherein they are cared for in comfort and happiness. It is alleged, as above indicated, that it conducts enterprises of a business nature from time to time for the purpose of raising money to expend in charity, not only upon its own members, but upon worthy objects outside of the order. It appears that the organization from a small beginning in 1868, has grown to a membership of more than 225,000 in the United States, composed only of white persons, citizens of the United States, within prescribed age limits. It was alleged in the bill that defendant had not only appropriated complainant's name in substance, but had also copied its ritual and its badge, the latter, being very distinctive, bearing an elk's head with antlers spread.

The bill was filed in the name of the complainant, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, through a committee appointed by the Grand Lodge, the governing body of the order, and was also joined in by Memphis Lodge, No. 27, likewise a corporation; this local body having a membership of more than 800.

There was a prayer for an injunction to prevent the use of the name "Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World"; also the use of complainant's badge, emblems, ritual, passwords, etc.

A demurrer was filed, making the point that the rights asserted in the bill were not property rights, and that the wrongs complained of were not such as a court of equity would protect by injunction. The demurrer was overruled, and thereupon the defendant filed its answer.

The answer admitted that the defendant was chartered and organized under the name charged in the bill, but denied that it was using the ritual, passwords, badges, or emblems of the complainant, or that there was any danger of the two orders being mistaken for each other, and relied particularly upon the fact that the members of defendant were colored people, while the members of complainant were white people.

Upon the hearing the chancellor sustained the bill and decreed a perpetual injunction. From this decree the defendant prayed an appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, where the decree was affirmed. The defendant has now filed a petition, asking that the cause be removed to this court by the writ of certiorari. In the petition the evidence is not referred to; but the case of complainant is put upon the allegations of the bill, and we shall so treat the case. However, we may add that the evidence sustains the substance of the bill, and also sustains the averment of the answer that the defendant order is composed of colored people.

We are of the opinion that the injunction was properly awarded and made perpetual.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

While the complainant was not engaged in business for profit, in the sense of commerce and trade, yet it employed certain business activities for the purpose of maintaining itself and to procure funds to carry out the purpose of its organization, and it maintained certain business institutions, its club-houses, and its home for aged and invalid members. The name it had acquired and appropriated had become very valuable, in the nature of a trade-name, by which it was accustomed to appeal to the public, and on the faith and reputation of which it was accustomed to obtain and receive from the public large sums of money. The name of the defendant is so similar that in the nature of things it will cause the one order to be mistaken for the other, and the enterprises of each to be confused with those of the other. The fact that the defendant's membership is composed of colored people will not materially change the result. In addition to the close similarity in the names, if a badge the same in appearance as that of complainant be worn by one of defendant's members, the inference is bound to be immediate in the public mind that the membership is the same. Few will take the trouble to inquire, or have the means of inquiring, whether such person is a member of complainant organization or of a different organization. This confusion of the two orders will, as shown in the record, result in great financial detriment to the complainant. The complainant first used the name, and gave to it the great financial, business, and social value, which is now attached to it, to say nothing of the fact that complainant is a prior corporation, which is entitled to have its corporate name protected. Under the facts stated, we think the complainants were entitled to the relief sought in the bill. Ladies' Good Samaritan Society of Nashville v. Nashville Ladies' Good Samaritan Society, 1 Tenn. Ch. 97; International Committee of Young Women's Christian Association v. Young Women's Christian Association of Chicago, 194 Ill. 194, 62 N. E. 551, 56 L. R. A. 838; Rickard v. Caton College Co., 88 Minn. 242, 92 N. W. 958; Merchants' Detective Ass'n v. Detective Agency, 25 Ill. App. 250; Nokes v. Mueller, 72 Ill. App. 431; International Soc. v. International Soc. (Sup.) 59 N. Y. Supp. 785; Woodward v. Lazar, 21 Cal. 449, 82 Am. Dec. 751; Marsh v. Billings, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 322, 54 Am. Dec. 723; Devlin v. Devlin, 69 N. Y. 212, 25 Am. The application for certiorari will therefore be refused.

KNAPP et al. v. SUPREME COMMANDERY, UNITED ORDER OF THE GOLDEN CROSS OF THE WORLD, et al.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. September Term, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 393*)—REGULATION—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

Courts of equity have jurisdiction to define and determine the extent and limitations of the powers of corporations, and declare contracts or other corporate actions, made or threatened by the corporation or its officers, in excess or violation of those powers, invalid, and to restrain and prohibit the performance of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1574, 1575; Dec. Dig. § 393.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 206*)—STOCKHOLDERS—RIGHT TO SUE.

Minority stockholders of a corporation may maintain suits to declare corporate action ultra vires and void after having first demanded action by the corporation and been refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 791-796; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

3. PROCESS (§ 87*)—PUBLICATION—JURISDICTION—BENEFICIARY ASSOCIATIONS.

In a suit by minority certificate holders in a Tennessee fraternal beneficiary association to declare illegal an attempted merger with another nonresident similar society, and for a return to the nonresident society of any funds or property received by the Tennessee association pursuant to such merger, jurisdiction of the latter association having been obtained by personal service and appearance, and the property having been impounded by injunction, the court acquired jurisdiction to determine the entire controversy, though the nonresident society was brought in only by constructive service by publication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 370*)—POWERS.

Corporations, being mere creatures of the Legislature and existing solely by virtue of the act of incorporation, can exercise no powers not expressly granted or necessarily implied from the powers expressly given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1511-1515; Dec. Dig. § 370.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 372*)—POWERS—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

All statutes under which corporate power is asserted must be construed in favor of the state from which the power emanated, and against the grant of power.

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 581*)—CONSOLIDATION—POWERS.

Corporations have no general power to consolidate or merge with another corporation, unless express power so to do is found in their charters or the statutes of the state which created them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2322-2329; Dec. Dig. § 581.*]

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 439*)—CONSOLIDATION—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Acts 1887, p. 329, c. 198, authorizing the lease and disposition of the property of a corporation, provided it is approved by a vote of a majority of the stock in a meeting of the stockholders held for that purpose after notice given, applies only to quasi public corporations, and does not embrace private corporations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1774; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 696*)—FRATERNAL BENEFICIARY ASSOCIATIONS—CONSOLIDATION.

Acts 1887, p. 329, c. 198, authorizing a corporation to lease or dispose of its property, if approved by a majority of "the stock" in a meeting of "the stockholders" held for that purpose after proper notice, did not authorize a fraternal beneficiary association, having neither stock nor stockholders, incorporated under Shannon's Code, § 2524, providing for the organization of such corporations for the general welfare of society, and not for individual profit, to consolidate with another similar association.

9. CORPORATIONS (§ 690*)—CONSOLIDATION—STATUTES.

Acts 1887, p. 329, c. 198, providing for the lease and disposition of the property of a corporation, does not authorize a consolidation and union of a domestic with a foreign corporation.

10. INSURANCE (§ 696*)—BENEFICIARY ASSOCIATIONS—MERGER.

A contract, in form and substance a merger of two beneficiary associations, by which one of them took over and absorbed the other, admitting the absorbed society's members to full membership without the medical examination required by the continuing society's by-laws, though some were ineligible on account of age, etc., which was ultra vires the power of the continuing association, could not be supported as a sale or lease of the merged association's franchise.

11. INSURANCE (§ 694*)—BENEFICIARY ASSOCIATIONS—MERGER—OBJECTIONS BY MEMBERS—RIGHT TO SUE.

Objecting members of a beneficiary association, having applied to the corporation's officers to sue to set aside an ultra vires merger with another association, could maintain a bill to have the merger declared void and to enjoin the corporation's officers and agents from doing any act in the furtherance thereof, and as incidental to such relief to have an account taken of the assets of the merged society, which have come into the hands of the continuing association, and have the same returned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 694.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Knox County; Joseph W. Sneed, Chancellor.

Bill by Charles Knapp and others against the Supreme Commandery, United Order of the Golden Cross of the World, and another. Decree for complainants, and the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Webb, McClung & Baker and H. T. Cooper, for appellant. Jourlmon, Welcker & Smith, for appellees.

SHIELDS, J. The complainant Charles Knapp and some 200 others, members of and holders of benefit certificates in Supreme Commandery, United Order of the Golden Cross of the World, a fraternal beneficiary association, filed the bill in this cause, November 6, 1906, in the chancery court of Knox county, against that association, which for brevity will be called the "Golden Cross," a corporation created and organized under the laws of Tennessee, and having its chief office and domicile in Knox county, Tenn., and the Supreme Council of the Home Circle, which for brevity will be called the "Home Circle," also a fraternal beneficiary association created and organized under the laws of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and having its chief office and domicile in that state, for the purpose of having a merger and union of the two corporations, which was then being attempted to be made by the executive officers and committees of the same, declared and decreed unauthorized by the charter of the Golden Cross and the laws of Tennessee, ultra vires, and void, to enjoin the Golden Cross and its officers from consummating and executing it, and to have all proper accounts stated and decrees pronounced necessary to place the two corporations in the condition and status in which they were before the attempted union and merger.

The defendant Golden Cross was served with process and made defense by answer. The Home Circle was served with constructive process by publication, as provided by the statutes of this state in suits brought against nonresidents, and, failing to make defense within the time required by the practice of the court, an order pro confesso was duly taken and entered against it. The chancellor, upon a hearing upon the pleadings, the order pro confesso entered against the Home Circle, and the proof offered by complainants and the Golden Cross, sustained the bill and granted the relief prayed. The Golden Cross perfected an appeal from that decree to this court, and assigns error.

The complainants, Charles Knapp and others, sue as members and holders of benefit certificates of the Golden Cross, in their own behalf, as well as that of all others in like case who may desire to unite with them as co-complainants.

The Golden Cross was incorporated July 7, 1876, under the provisions of section 2, c. 142, p. 234, of the Acts of the General Assembly of Tennessee of 1875, providing for the creation of corporations "for the general welfare and not for profit," as an insurance order based upon the principle of mutual assessment of its members, and is what is known to the laws of Tennessee as a "fraternal beneficiary association." When the merger and union complained of was attempted to be consummated in April, 1906, it had about 18,500 members, residing in various states of the Union, more than 5,000 of them being residents of Massachusetts, and was solvent, having in its treasury funds sufficient to meet the death claims of its members as they matured and were presented. It was a strong and prosperous association.

The Home Circle was incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts, and has its domicile and chief office in that state. It was an older, but weaker, association, having only about 1,900 members, chiefly residents of Massachusetts. It was unable to meet the death claims against it as they matured, and on that account was much involved in debt. In this condition, to relieve its embarrassment and that of its members, it sought a union with the Golden Cross.

The executive committees of the two associations, after conference and negotiation, on April 12, 1906, agreed upon a consolidation of the two corporations, the terms of which were reduced to writing and signed by the members of those committees. These terms need not be set out in full. They provided for a consolidation of the two associations, whereby the Golden Cross absorbed the Home Circle, accepting and admitting to membership in it, in a body and without medical examination, the entire 1,900 members of the Home Circle, conceding and according to certain officers of the Home Circle certain rank and privileges in the Golden Cross, and certain of the members rights and benefits which they had as members of the Home Circle, but could not have obtained if admitted as members of the Golden Cross in the usual way, received and took over all of the assets of the Home Circle, and assumed and agreed to discharge all its obligations. This contract, made by the executive committees of the two associations, is called therein a "merger" or "union," and is such in form and substance, and is so treated in the subsequent proceedings attempting to carry the same into effect.

A meeting of the members and holders of benefit certificates of the Golden Cross, to be held in the city of Boston June 21, 1906, was called by the officers of that association, notice of which was given to all the members by a circular letter, in which was set out in full the terms of the proposed merger, for the purpose of considering the agreement made, and approving or rejecting the same. The meeting was held, and the proposed merger approved, to take effect August 1, 1906; but in some financial matters it was not to be complete and effective until January 1, 1907. There were present in person and by proxy at this meeting 4,482 members, of which 3,464 voted in favor of the merger, and 1,018, among whom were the complainants, protested and voted against it. After this, July 21, 1906, Edward S. Kemper, a member of the Golden Cross, and one of those who opposed the proposed merger, brought his bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern Division of New York, against the two associations, for the purpose of enjoining the proposed union, for want of authority of the Golden Cross, under its charter and the laws of the state creating it, to consolidate with another corporation, and, further, if such power exists, that it had not been lawfully exercised; but, for want of jurisdiction by that court over the Golden Cross, his bill, on September 27, 1907, was dismissed.

Complainants, having first demanded of the Golden Cross that it bring a bill for the purpose of having the said merger and union declared void, and to enjoin the consummation of the same, which demand was peremptorily refused, on November 6, 1906, filed the bill in this cause and obtained a temporary injunction enjoining further action under the proposed consolidation; and such proceedings were had that the accounts of the two associations have been kept separate and distinct, so that the funds due them or their members can be ascertained and restored to them. No benefit certificates have been issued by the Golden Cross to the members of the Home Circle, admitted by the consolidation to membership in the former order, and the affairs of the two associations are in such condition that the respective rights and interests of all parties can be protected.

Complainants' contention is that the Golden Cross was and is wholly without power or authority, under its charter and the general laws of Tennessee, to make and enter into the merger and union attempted to be consummated with the Home Circle, and that its action in the premises is ultra vires and void, and that as members and holders of benefit certificates of the Golden Cross they have a right to maintain this bill in the courts of Tennessee to have it so declared, and the corporation and its officers enjoined from carrying it and any subsequent proceedings had by them thereunder into effect.

The validity of the merger is also challenged upon a number of other grounds; but, in the view we have taken of the case, it is not necessary that they be here stated. There is also much in the record in regard to the advantages and disadvantages which will accrue to the members of the Golden Cross from the proposed consolidation, which we have not stated, because these are all matters of policy for the officers and members of the two associations to consider, and with which courts have nothing to do.

The Golden Cross denies that the agreement, merger, and union made by it with the Home Circle was ultra vires and invalid. It insists that both of these corporations, the Golden Cross by the laws of Tennessee, and the Home Circle by those of Massachusetts, had full power and authority to merge and consolidate, and that, having done so in a proper manner, the merger is valid and binding upon all of their respective members.

Before considering the question thus made we will dispose of the one challenging the jurisdiction of the chancery court of Knox county to grant complainants the relief they seek, for want of proper parties before the court. This contention is predicated upon the insistence that the object of the bill is to cancel and annul a contract or agreement made by the two defendants, a proceeding in personam, to which both of the defendants are necessary parties, and must be brought before the court by personal service of process, and the constructive service by publication upon the Home Circle is insufficient to give the court jurisdiction over it, and bind it by any decree made in the cause.

The jurisdiction of the chancery court of Knox county of the subject-matter of the litigation cannot be controverted.

It is well settled that courts of equity have jurisdiction to define and determine the extent and limitations of the powers of corporations, and to declare contracts, or other corporate action, made or threatened by the corporation or its officers, in excess and violation of those powers, invalid, and to restrain and prohibit the performance of them. The right of stockholders in proper cases to maintain suits for these purposes is also well settled.

In a leading case upon this subject, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Wayne, speaking for the court, said:

"It is now no longer doubted, either in England or in the United States, that courts of equity, in both, have a jurisdiction over corporations, at the instance of one or more of their members, to apply preventive remedies by injunction, to restrain those who administer them from doing acts which would amount to a violation of charters, or to prevent any misapplication of their capitals or profits, which might result in lessening the dividends of stockholders, or the value of their shares, as either may be protected by the franchises of a corporation, if the acts intended to be done create what is in the law denominated a breach of trust; and the jurisdiction extends to inquire into, and to enjoin, as the case may require that to be done, proceedings by individuals, in whatever character they may profess to act, if the subject of complaint is an imputed violation of a corporate franchise or the denial of a right growing out of it, for which there is not an adequate remedy at law." Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331, 341, 15 L. Ed. 401.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his great work on Equity Jurisprudence, at section 1093, says:

"In a second class of cases, where the directors are not charged with any misapplication of the corporate property for their own benefit, nor with any breach of their fiduciary duty to the corporation, but, although purporting to act for the common welfare, they have adopted, or are about to adopt, some measure which is ultra vires or beyond the scope of their corporate powers, a suit may be prosecuted against them by stockholders to obtain the appropriate relief, either of rescission or of prevention. Under some circumstances even a single dissenting stockholder would not be bound by such an act, done by a unanimous board of directors, and approved by all the other stockholders except himself. The theory of this class of suits is that a stockholder has the right that the operations of the corporation should be kept by the directors within the powers conferred by its charter. Every measure which transcends those powers, although done in good faith, violates the rights which inhere in the ownership of the stock and puts the value of the stock itself at hazard. The suit may be brought by a single stockholder suing on his own account alone, or by a stockholder suing on behalf of all others who are similarly situated. The corporation is, of course, made a codefendant, and any other corporation or person who has joined in the ultra vires transaction may also be made a codefendant."

In Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, vol. 2, pp. 1668-1671, the doctrine is thus stated:

"In equity, therefore, a trust is created by implication in favor of the stockholders that the corporation will not so manage its business or affairs as to defeat the object for which it was created, and that it will use and apply its assets for the purpose of carrying out those objects, and not divert them to other purposes. Nothing, therefore, is now more surely settled in the law of corporations than the doctrine that any unauthorized act or contract by the directors or a majority of the stockholders of the corporation, which will destroy the existence of the corporation or render it unable to perform its functions, or any misapplication or diversion of assets to purposes not authorized by its charter, even though all other stockholders may consent, is a breach of trust towards a dissenting stockholder, against which he is entitled to relief in equity."

"To give a court jurisdiction to enjoin ultra vires acts upon the part of a corporation at the suit of a stockholder, it is not necessary that there shall be any intentional wrong or actual fraud upon the part of the officers or other stockholders. It is enough that the act is ultra vires. Nor need there be any loss to the corporation. The fact that an ultra vires act of business will be beneficial to the corporation, and cannot injure its stockholders, makes it none the less ultra vires, and is no answer to a suit by a dissenting stockholder to enjoin the same."

There can be no denial of the jurisdiction of that court over the Golden Cross and its property. The corporation was before it by personal service of process, and made defense by answer, and the property was impounded by injunction.

The contention of the defendant is solely that the complainants cannot maintain their bill for the relief sought, without having the Home Circle before the court by actual service of process or voluntary appearance. The cases of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 734, 24 L. Ed. 565, and others of the Supreme Court of the United States following it, and our own case of Paper Company v. Shyer, 108 Tenn. 444, 67 S. W. 856, 58 L. R. A. 173, are relied upon to sustain this contention. We do not think these cases are applicable to the one under consideration. They only hold that, where the proceeding is solely in personam, publication or other authorized form of substitute service is insufficient, and that where only such service is had a decree affecting the rights of a defendant, not otherwise brought before the court, is void for want of notice or due process of law. In the cases cited, judgments for debt without attachment of property, or in excess of the value of the property attached, were held to be void against nonresidents, made parties defendant by publication under state statutes and without voluntary appearance.

This is not a case of that character. Complainants bring this bill to have the powers and purposes of a corporation, the Golden Cross, chartered under the laws of Tennessee and domiciled in this state, declared, and an act done by it, claimed by them to be in excess of those powers and in violation of its charter and the laws of this state, declared void, and to restrain the corporation from a threatened and unauthorized use of its franchises and other personal property, presumed to be at its domicile, and within the jurisdiction and under the control of the court. It is brought to fix the status of a Tennessee corporation, a citizen of the state, and to protect property impounded by proper injunction from an unlawful and authorized appropriation. In cases of this kind all nonresidents of the state who are necessary parties can be brought before the court by substituted service of process and full relief decreed. They are not within the rule announced in Pennoyer v. Neff, supra, as therein expressly stated. It is there said:

"Except in cases affecting the personal status of the plaintiff, and cases in which that mode of service may be considered to have been assented to in advance, as hereinafter mentioned, the substituted service of process by publication, allowed by the law of Oregon, and by similar laws in other states, where actions are brought against nonresidents, is effectual only where, in connection with process against the person for commencing the action, the property in the state is brought under control of the court, and subjected to its disposition by process adapted to that purpose, or where the judgment is sought as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein; in other words, where the action is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. As stated by Cooley, in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations (page 405), for any other purpose than to subject the property of a nonresident to valid claims against him in the state, 'due process of law would require appearance or personal service before the defendant could be personally bound by any judgment rendered.'

"It is true that in a strict sense a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of the property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but in a large and more general sense the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclosing a mortgage, or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in the state they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned."

The same doctrine has been announced and followed in many other cases. Among them are Loaiza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 11, 24 Pac. 707, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 206; Dunham v. Dunham, 162 Ill. 610, 44 N. E. 841, 35 L. R. A. 79; Butler v. Washington, 45 La. Ann. 281, 12 South. 356, 19 L. R. A. 816; Peaslee v. Peaslee, 147 Mass. 180, 17 N. E. 506; Amy v. Amy, 12 Utah, 286, 42 Pac. 1121; State v. Duket, 90 Wis. 276, 68 N. W. 83, 31 L. R. A. 515, 48 Am. St. Rep. 930; Reed v. Reed, 52 Mich. 123, 17 N. W. 720, 50 Am. Rep. 251; Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 26 Sup. Ct. 525, 50 L. Ed. 867, 5 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1.

And it is now well-settled law that in cases involving the status of their citizens and proceedings in rem the several states may by statute provide for substituted or constructive service of process against nonresidents who may be interested, so as to bring them before their courts and bind them by decrees there pronounced. Jurisdiction thus obtained is continually exercised by the courts of all the states in suits brought to wind up and administer the affairs of insolvent corporations, to collect debts due from nonresidents where property of the debtor is within the state, and under the control of the court by attachment, or other equivalent process, and in divorce cases. There could not be a stronger case for the application of this rule than the one under consideration. The chief question involved is the extent and limits of the corporate power of a corporation created and organized in this state and under its laws.

Can it be said that the courts of the states are without jurisdiction to construe their own laws, and define and declare the powers of corporations created under them, determine whether acts which those corporations have done or are contemplating doing are within the powers granted, and restrain them from exceeding them and violating the law of their creation, merely because nonresidents of the state have made contracts with them, and especially where such contracts are illegal and void? This has never been held in any case brought to our attention, and we do not think it will be. It would deprive the several states of the control of their own corporate creatures, and violate their sovereignty. If the law was as insisted by defendant, the several states could not maintain in their own courts proceedings to forfeit the charters of corporations created under their laws, for violation of the provisions of the charter or the general laws of the state, where such corporations had contracted with a nonresident. This case not only involves the status—that is, the corporate powers—of a Tennessee corporation, but the court in which it was brought obtained jurisdiction and control of its personal property impounded by injunction, and thus it is within both exceptions recognized in the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, supra, and others following it.

Complainants do not seek any personal decree against the Home Circle. There is no attempt to compel that corporation to do anything, and as against it this is in no sense an action in personam. The gravamen of the bill is to determine the corporate powers of the Golden Cross, a domestic corporation, have a contract made by it, and claimed to be in excess of the powers granted it by its charter, declared ultra vires and void, to restrain it from disposing of its assets under such void contract, and to require it and its officers to return to the Home Circle such assets of that corporation as it has illegally and wrongfully received. We have no doubt of the jurisdiction of the courts of this state to entertain a bill for these purposes, and to bring before them, by publication under the statutes of this state providing for substituted process of this character against nonresidents, all parties residing in other states or countries who may be interested or affected by the ultra vires and void act complained of.

We now come to the determinative question in the case; that is, whether or not the Golden Cross could lawfully enter into the contract of merger and union with the Home Circle. We think it could not, and that the consolidation attempted was and is void.

Corporations are creatures of the legislative department of the government, and exist solely and alone by virtue of the act of incorporation. They can exercise no powers which are not expressly granted them, or are necessarily implied from the express powers given. Authority for all their acts must be found in their charters, or the general laws of the state of their creation. Where the charter or law is silent as to the power sought to be exercised, it does not exist; and wherever a grant of corporate power is claimed by a corporation it must clearly appear and will not be inferred or presumed.

All statutes under which a power is asserted must be favorably construed to the state from which the power emanated, and against the grant of it. These are well-established principles of the common law, and have been frequently applied by the court. Deadrick v. Wilson, 8 Baxt. 133; Memphis Gayoso Gas Company v. Williamson, 9 Heisk. 326; City of Memphis v. Memphis Gayoso Gas Co., 9 Heisk. 533; Elevator Co. v. Railroad Co., 85 Tenn. 703, 5 S. W. 52, 4 Am. St. Rep. 798; Miller v. Insurance Co., 92 Tenn. 176, 21 S. W. 39, 20 L. R. A. 765.

The law upon this subject is clearly and forcefully stated by Chief Justice Gray in Davis v. Old Colony Railroad Co., 131 Mass. 259, 41 Am. Rep. 221, and quoted with approval by this court in the case of Elevator Company v. Railroad Co., supra, in these words:

"A corporation has power to do such business only as it is authorized by its act of incorporation to do, and no other. It is not held out by the government, nor by the stockholders, as authorized to make contracts which are beyond the purposes and scope of its charter. It is not vested with all the capacities of a natural person, or of an ordinary partnership, but with such only as its charter confers. If it exceeds its charter powers, not only may the government take away its charter, but those who have subscribed to its stock may avoid any contract made by the corporation in clear excess of its powers. If it makes a contract manifestly beyond the powers conferred by its charter, and therefore unlawful, a court of chancery, on application by a stockholder, will restrain the corporation from carrying out the contract; and a court of common law will sustain no action on the contract against the corporation."

Corporations have no general power to consolidate or merge with another corporation unless the express authority to do so is found in their charters or the statutes of the states which created them, respectively. In Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Corporations, vol. 1, § 315, it is said:

"The consolidation of the funds of two incorporated companies, so as to form a single corporation, has, generally speaking, the effect of dissolving both the old corporations as distinct entities, and of creating a new corporation. This new corporation can no more be created without the sanction of the Legislature than could either of the original constituent corporations. Accordingly it is held in England that, in the absence of any special power for that purpose in their deeds of settlement, an amalgamation between two joint-stock companies is ultra vires and invalid, and that the obligations and liabilities arising out of such attempted amalgamation, and assumed by the directors of the purchasing company, cannot be enforced against the shareholders of such company."

In Clark & Marshall on Corporations, vol. 2, § 349, it is said:

"The consolidation of corporations is not within the objects of a corporation, in the absence of provisions therefor, and cannot be implied. It is well settled, therefore, that corporations cannot lawfully consolidate, however desirable and beneficial consolidation may be, unless the state has expressly authorized them to do so. 'Legislative authority is just as essential to a valid consolidation of existing corporations as it is to the creation of a corporation in the first instance. It follows that an agreement between two or more corporations to consolidate, in the absence of legislative authority, is ultra vires, and will not be enforced, even though it may have been partly performed.'

"An ultra vires agreement to consolidate is void, and cannot be enforced by the courts at the suit of either party, and it can make no difference that it has been partly performed." Id., p. 1057.

It is conceded on behalf of the defendants that there is not to be found in the charter of the Golden Cross any authority to consolidate with another corporation; but it is said that this power is given it by chapter 198, p. 329, of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1887. This statute is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Tennessee, that all corporations now or hereafter existing under the laws of this state, whether incorporated under special or general laws of the state, shall have the power, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, to lease and dispose of their property and franchises, or any part thereof, to any corporation of this or any other state engaged in or carrying on, or authorized by its charter to carry on in this or any other state, the same general business as is authorized by the charter of any such lessor corporation, and said corporations shall likewise have the power, and are hereby authorized to make, any contract for the use, enjoyment, and operation of their property and franchises, or any part thereof, with any other such corporation of this or any other state, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon between the contracting corporations; and such lessee corporation or corporations is authorized and empowered to carry out such leases and contracts: Provided, however, that any such leases or contracts, when made by or under the direction of the boards of directors of the contracting corporations, shall be authorized or approved by the vote of a majority, in amount of the stock of the lessor corporation present or represented at a regular or called meeting of the stockholders of said corporation: And provided further, that sixty days' notice of such meetings be given in a Memphis, Knoxville and Nashville daily newspaper of the time, place, and purposes of such meeting: And provided further, that where the lessee corporation is a corporation of this state, the authority or approval of its stockholders shall in like manner be obtained to the contract or lease: And provided further, that this act shall not be so construed as to authorize any corporation of this or any other state to lease or purchase any railroad and line that is a competitor for the same business with any line already owned or under control, by lease or otherwise, or two lines of railway that are competitors for the same business in this state."

This court had this statute before it in the case of Coal Creek Company v. Tennessee Coal Co., 106 Tenn. 651, 62 S. W. 162, and held that it did not embrace private corporations, but only quasi public corporations. We have again examined the question, and are satisfied with the soundness of that case, for the reasons therein stated, and without further discussion adhere to the construction there given the statute.

But, if it did embrace private corporations, it could not be held to apply to those of the character and class to which the Golden Cross belongs; that is, "corporations for the general welfare of society, and not for individual profit." The statute by its terms clearly contemplates corporations which have a capital stock, stockholders, and which may and do own property to be used and disposed of in carrying on and conducting some sort of business, in which earnings may be made for the individual profit of the stockholders. It provides for the lease and disposition of the property of the corporation, provided that the same be approved of by a vote of a majority of "the stock," in a meeting of "the stockholders" held for that purpose, of which notice as therein required shall be given.

Fraternal beneficiary associations, as known to the laws of Tennessee, have neither capital stock, stockholders, nor property to be used in business for individual profit. Those interested in such associations are not denominated "stockholders," but "members." They are so styled by the statute under which the Golden Cross was incorporated (chapter 142, p. 232, Acts 1875; Shannon's Code, § 2524), where, in referring to this class of corporations, it is provided: "The general welfare of society, not individual profit, is the object for which this charter is granted, and hence the members are not stockholders in the legal sense of the term, and no dividends or profits shall be divided among the members." They are also called and known as "members," and not "stockholders," in all the subsequent statutes enacted by the General Assembly for the purpose of regulating and controlling fraternal beneficiary associations, organized under the laws of this state, or of other states doing business in this state. We refer to chapter 19, p. 144, Acts 1897; chapter 113, p. 163, Acts 1901; and chapter 480, p. 1021, Acts 1905. They have no stock in the corporation, for the good reason that none can be subscribed or issued. These associations have no franchises and property, which are susceptible of lease or sale, so as to be used and operated by another corporation. The very nature of the corporation is a conclusive argument in support of this proposition. We cannot see, under any construction that can be placed upon the statute, how it could be made to apply to a corporation like that of the defendant, and we hold that it does not.

Nor does the statute authorize a consolidation and union of a domestic corporation with a foreign corporation. A lease of the property of one corporation to another, to be operated by it, is entirely a different thing from a merger or union of the two corporations. But it is unnecessary to construe the statute in this respect, as it does not embrace the defendant corporation, and therefore cannot be relied upon to support its action attacked in this case.

It is said for the defendant that it is held, in the case of Coal Creek Co. v. Tennessee Coal Company, supra, that private corporations have the power under the common law to sell and dispose of their property. This is true, and it is sound law; but it has no application to this case. The contract or agreement made by the Golden Cross with the Home Circle does not involve a sale or lease of its property or franchise. It has no property to sell or lease in that sense. The contract is in form and substance a merger of the two corporations, by which the Golden Cross takes over and absorbs the Home Circle, admitting its 1,900 members to full membership, without medical examination, as required by the by-laws of the former, although some of them were ineligible to such membership on account of age, secures to some of them certain rights which they would not be entitled to under those by-laws and the laws of Tennessee, if admitted as members of the Golden Cross in the usual way, and conceding some of the officers of the Home Circle certain rights and rank to which they were entitled as members of the Home Circle.

It is styled a "merger and union" of the two companies in the original agreement made by the executive committees of the two corporations and all subsequent proceedings had for the purpose of approving and carrying it into effect. It is so styled in the pleadings in this case, and in fact and legal effect is a consolidation of the two associations. It is, therefore, a contract which the Golden Cross had no authority, under its charter or the laws of Tennessee, to make, or, having made, to carry into effect.

The complainants have a right to maintain a bill in the courts of Tennessee to have it declared ultra vires and void, and to enjoin the defendant and its officers and agents from doing or performing any act in compliance with its stipulations and terms, and, as incidental to that relief, to have an account taken of any assets of the Home Circle which have come to the hands of the Golden Cross, the same ascertained and returned to it, or its proper representatives, in all things as ordered by the chancellor.

The decree of the chancellor is therefore affirmed, with cost.

WEST et al. v. BURKS.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 12, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1009*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding of the chancellor, supported by a preponderance of the evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3970-3978; Dec. Dig. § 1009.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 409*)—WANT OF ANSWER—WAIVER.

A defendant going to trial on his cross-complaint, without insisting on an answer, and treating the allegations thereof as having been made issues in the cause, waives the filing of an answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1376; Dec. Dig. § 409.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 170*)—VACATING JUDGMENT ON CONSTRUCTIVE SERVICE—REMEDY—STATUTES.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 6259, authorizing a defendant against whom a judgment has been rendered on constructive service to move within two years for a retrial of the cause, a defendant against whom a decree has been rendered on constructive service may move a retrial of the cause, but the decree will not be set aside until on the retrial it is found erroneous, and then the court will either confirm, modify, or set it aside.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1074*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS RULINGS.

The refusal to stay process for the enforcement of a decree rendered on constructive service until a retrial on the merits is had is not prejudicial, where on the final hearing the court properly refused to set aside the decree.

Appeal from Little River Chancery Court; Jas. D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Suit by J. B. Burks against Clarence West and another, in which defendants moved to set aside a decree rendered on constructive service of process. From an order refusing to set aside the decree originally rendered and confirming the same, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. T. Cowling, for appellants. J. B. Burks, pro se.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Plaintiff, J. B. Burks, instituted this action in the chancery court of Little River county against defendants, Clarence West and his wife, Ollie West, to foreclose a mortgage on real estate executed to him by the defendants. The defendants were nonresidents of the state, and were constructively summoned to appear in the action. A decree was rendered at the November term, 1906, foreclosing the mortgage and ordering the sale by a commissioner of the land described in the mortgage for the satisfaction of the debt secured. On a later day of the same term the defendants appeared and filed their motion to set aside the decree in accordance with the statute, and asked to be permitted to make a defense to the plaintiff's cause of action. They filed their answer and also a cross-complaint, setting up certain defenses and counterclaims against plaintiff; and at a subsequent term of the court a retrial of the cause was had before the chancellor, who refused to set aside the decree formerly rendered, and confirmed the same. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss in detail the evidence adduced at the trial. The testimony was conflicting, and we are of the opinion that it clearly preponderates in favor of the finding of the chancellor, and that his findings should not be disturbed.

It is contended on behalf of defendants that, as the plaintiff filed no answer to their cross-complaint, the same should have been taken as confessed, and a decree in their favor should have been rendered thereon. They went to trial on their cross-complaint without insisting on an answer, and treated the allegations thereof as having been made issues in the case. They therefore waived the filing of an answer to their cross-complaint. Pembroke v. Logan, 71 Ark. 364, 74 S. W. 297; Cribbs v. Walker, 74 Ark. 104, 85 S. W. 244.

During the pendency of defendant's motion for retrial of the case the commissioner proceeded with the sale of the land under the orders of the court, and sold it to the plaintiff. It is contended that the order of sale should have been set aside pending the hearing of the motion, and that the court erred in allowing the sale to stand. The statute provides that a defendant against whom a judgment has been rendered on constructive service may appear at any time within two years after the rendition thereof and move to have the cause retried; "and, security for the costs being given, such defendant or defendants shall be permitted to make defense, and thereupon the action shall be tried anew as to such defendant or defendants as if there had been no judgment, and upon the new trial the court may confirm, modify, or set aside the former judgment and may order the plaintiff in the action to restore to any such defendant or defendants any money of such defendant paid to them under such judgment, or any property of such defendants obtained by the plaintiff under it and yet remaining in his possession," etc. Section 6259, Kirby's Dig. This court in speaking of the remedy under this statute in Porter v. Hanson, 36 Ark. 591, said: "They [defendants] risk the costs, and are entitled to have the matter of merits determined on demurrer, or evidence after the doors are opened. They have no right, however, to have the former judgment meanwhile vacated on motion. It remains until the case is retried, to be then confirmed, modified, or set aside." The same rule was announced by this court in Pearson v. Vance, 85 Ark. 272, 107 S. W. 986. It follows from this that no part of the judgment or decree should be set aside, until, on the retrial of the case, it shall have been found to be erroneous, and then it is the duty of the court either to "confirm, modify, or set aside the former judgment." The court may sometimes in the interests of justice, where a motion by a nonresident defendant for retrial is made, stay process for the enforcement of the judgment until a retrial on the merits can be had. But in the present case the court was not asked to do this; and, even if it had been asked, no prejudice resulted, inasmuch as on the final hearing of the case the plaintiff prevailed, and the court refused to set aside the decree.

We find no error in the record, and the decree of the chancellor is affirmed.

CITY OF CONWAY v. WADDELL.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. March 22, 1909.)

1. HAWKERS AND PEDDLERS (§ 3*)—WHO ARE "PEDDLERS."

A "peddler," within Kirby's Dig. § 5438, authorizing cities and towns to license peddlers, is one who goes from place to place and from house to house carrying for sale and exposing to sale the goods, wares, and merchandise he carries. [Quoting Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5260.]

5. HAWKERS AND PEDDLERS (§ 4*)—TAXATION—MUNICIPAL RIGHTS.

Kirby's Dig. § 5488, authorizing cities and towns to license, tax, etc., hawkers and peddlers, authorizes a tax for revenue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Hawkers and Peddlers, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

6. HAWKERS AND PEDDLERS (§ 4*)—LICENSE ORDINANCES—REASONABLENESS.

A city ordinance imposing a license tax of $25 a day on hawkers and peddlers is void as exacting an unreasonable fee or tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Hawkers and Peddlers, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Faulkner County; Eugene Lankford, Judge.

Charles W. Waddell was convicted in the mayor's court for violating an ordinance of the City of Conway by peddling without a license, and the City appeals from a judgment of the circuit court on accused's appeal declaring the ordinance void. Affirmed.

Conway, a city of the second class, has the following ordinance:

"Ordinance No. 165.

"An ordinance, entitled, 'An ordinance to regulate and license street peddling and street exhibitions, and to provide punishment for the violation of the regulations contained therein.'

"Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Conway, Arkansas:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to sell, offer for sale, attempt to sell, peddle or attempt to peddle any goods, wares, merchandise, medicines or articles of any kind whatsoever, except meats, vegetables and farm produce, or to give any show, entertainment or exhibition of any kind for the purpose of advertising any goods, wares, merchandise, medicines or articles of any kind, on any of the streets, sidewalks, alleys, public squares or other public grounds, in the city of Conway, without first obtaining a license therefor from the city of Conway in the manner hereinafter set forth.

"Sec. 2. Any person desiring to obtain the license required by section 1 of this ordinance shall make application therefor to the recorder of the city of Conway, who shall issue such license upon the payment by such person of the following amounts for such license: * * * For license to sell, offer for sale, * * * goods, wares, merchandise or articles of any kind (except fresh meat, vegetables and farm produce) when no show, entertainment or exhibition is to be given in advertising said articles, * * * the sum of twenty-five dollars per day."

"Sec. 5. That any person who shall violate the provisions of section 1 of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof before the mayor or other proper officer, shall be fined in any sum not less than fifty nor more than one hundred dollars for each and every offense."

The appellee was convicted of a violation of this ordinance in the mayor's court. He was charged with the offense "of selling articles and books in a public place in the city of Conway without having a license therefor." He appealed to the circuit court. The circuit court held that the ordinance was void, and the city prosecutes this appeal.

R. W. Robins, for appellant.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). Section 5488 of Kirby's Digest gives cities or incorporated towns the power "to license, regulate, tax, or suppress hawkers, peddlers," etc. A "peddler" is one "who goes from place to place and from house to house carrying for sale, and exposing to sale, the goods, wares, and merchandise he carries." Commonwealth v. Farnum, 114 Mass. 287; In re Wilson, 8 Mackey, 341, 12 L. R. A. 624; 6 Words and Phrases, p. 5260, "Peddler," and cases cited. Appellee sold his own book, but he was a peddler within the meaning of this statute and ordinance. The words "peddler" and "hawker" in the statute and ordinance are used in the ordinary and common-law acceptance of the terms, and in the sense in which these words are used in our Constitution. Article 16, § 5. Under the statute it was within the power of the city to suppress peddling or to license it and to fix a license tax or fee for regulation and for revenue. The language of the ordinance nowhere indicates that it was the purpose of the city council to suppress peddling. Had such been the purpose of the council, it doubtless would have made it unlawful to peddle and made no provision for obtaining a license therefor. We do not feel warranted in saying from the language of the ordinance that the purpose of the council was to suppress peddling altogether. Peddling on the streets is not necessarily a nuisance in itself, and there is nothing in the ordinance to indicate that the council intended to treat it as such and to suppress it. On the contrary, the express language of sections 1 and 2 of the ordinance show that the intention of the council was to license it and to require the payment of a tax or fee for such license in the sum of $25 per day. There is no prohibition of the business, but an express permission to carry it on upon the conditions prescribed. The tax was manifestly both for the purpose of regulation and revenue. The title of the ordinance declares that it was for the purpose of license and regulation, but the council also had the power to tax for revenue. City of Little Rock v. Prather, 46 Ark. 478. Considered as an ordinance to license and to tax for regulation and also for revenue, it was void on its face. It is inconceivable that it would require the sum of $25 per day to reimburse the city for the expense of issuing the license and the efficient police surveillance of the business, and the amount is still unreasonable, when, in addition to the above, it is considered as a tax for the purpose of raising revenue for the city.

In City of Fayetteville v. Carter, 52 Ark. 301, 12 S. W. 573, 6 L. R. A. 509, Judge Battle, speaking for the court, said: "If the fee required is not plainly unreasonable, the courts ought not to interfere with the discretion exercised by the council in fixing it; and unless the contrary appears on the face of the ordinance requiring it, or is established by proper evidence, they should presume it to be reasonable." But here no presumption can be indulged. For the fee and tax of $25 per day for the privilege of carrying on the business of a peddler or hawker on the streets or other public places in the town of Conway, and the regulation and taxation thereof, is plainly excessive, and, as we have said, renders the ordinance for such purposes void on its face.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

1. EXEMPTIONS (§ 141*)—PROTECTION—ENJOINING SUITS IN OTHER STATES.

Where the debtor and creditor are residents of the same state, an attempt by the creditor to evade the exemption law of the state by bringing suit in a sister state may be enjoined by a chancery court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 168; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 214*)—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

The allegations of the complaint must be taken as true on a demurrer thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 525; Dec. Dig. § 214.*]

3. EXEMPTIONS (§ 147*)—RESTRAINING SUITS IN OTHER STATES—COMPLAINT.

A complaint which alleges that plaintiff and defendant are residents; that defendant had instituted a suit in a sister state to deprive plaintiff of his exemptions; that defendant was the assignee and owner of the claim sued on, and that he had assigned it to a fictitious person in the sister state, and brought suit thereon for the fraudulent purpose of depriving plaintiff of his exemptions; and which prays that defendant be restrained from prosecuting the action in the sister state—states a cause of action as against a demurrer.

4. PLEADING (§ 192*)—DEFECTS—REMEDY.

A defect in a pleading arising from its failure to contain a sufficiently definite statement of the cause of action relied on can only be reached by a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain, and not by a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 409; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 218*)—JUDGMENT ON DEMURRER—DAMAGES.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 6137, declaring that allegations of the amount of damages shall not be considered as true by a failure to controvert them, a court rendering a decree granting the relief prayed for on overruling a demurrer to the complaint cannot award damages without proof thereof.

Appeal from Pulaski Chancery Court; Jno. E. Martineau, Chancellor.

Suit by L. F. Strozler against W. L. Greer and another. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant W. L. Greer appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part.

W. T. Tucker, for appellant. Edwin W. Lindsey, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellee, L. F. Strozler, instituted this suit in the chancery court of Pulaski county against appellant, W. L. Greer, and against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company, to restrain appellant from prosecuting an action at law against him in the court of a justice of the peace in the state of Missouri wherein a writ of garnishment was issued and served on the railroad company. He alleged in his complaint that he was a resident of Pulaski county, Ark., and also set forth facts sufficient to entitle him to claim as exempt the wages due him by the railroad company which had been garnished in the action brought against him by appellant in Missouri, and alleged that the Missouri action was instituted for the purpose of depriving him of his opportunity to claim said exemptions. It is also alleged that appellant, Greer, had assigned the account upon which the action was based to a fictitious person, one C. M. Dart, in which name the action in Missouri was instituted. Appellee also set forth in his complaint that he had sustained damages by reason of the institution of the action in Missouri. Appellant Greer appeared and demurred to the complaint, which demurrer was overruled by the court, and final decree was then entered restraining said appellant from further prosecuting the action in Missouri; and the court also rendered a decree in favor of appellee and against appellant Greer for the sum of $38 damages. Greer appealed to this court.

It has been settled by decisions of this court that, when a debtor and creditor are residents of the same state, an attempt of the latter to evade the exemption laws of the state of their domicile by bringing suit in another state may be enjoined by a chancery court. Greer v. Cooke (Ark.) 113 S. W. 1000; Griffith v. Langsdale, 53 Ark. 71, 13 S. W. 733, 22 Am. St. Rep. 182. According to the allegations of the complaint, which must be taken as true, appellant and appellee were both residents of Pulaski county, Ark., and appellant had brought a suit in the state of Missouri in an attempt to evade the exemption laws of this state. It was therefore proper to restrain him from so doing.

It appears from the allegations of the complaint that the Missouri suit was based on an open account alleged to have been originally claimed against appellee by Franklin Bros. Company, a corporation engaged in the grocery business in the city of Little Rock, and that said company had become bankrupt and its assets turned over to a trustee in bankruptcy. The complaint alleges, however, that the appellee was not, in fact, indebted to Franklin Bros. Company in any sum. It is contended on behalf of appellant that the Franklin Bros. Company was a necessary party to the action, and that Greer as attorney or agent should not have been enjoined from prosecuting the action. The statements of the complaint are to some extent ambiguous in failing to make clear whether or not it was intended to allege that Greer was the owner of the account and had assigned it as such owner. We think, however, that the allegations of the complaint, when fairly construed, meant to allege that Greer was the assignee and owner of the account formerly claimed by Franklin Bros. Company, and had assigned it to a fictitious person in Missouri and brought suit thereon for the fraudulent purpose of depriving appellee of his exemptions. If a more definite statement had been desired, the defect should have been reached by a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain. The demurrer did not reach to that question.

We conclude, therefore, that the chancellor was right in restraining the further prosecution of the suit in Missouri. He erred, however, in rendering a decree for damages without proof. Kirby's Dig. § 6187; Greer v. Newbill (Ark.) 117 S. W. 531. The decree restraining the prosecution of the Missouri suit is affirmed; but that part of the decree which awards damages is reversed, and the cause remanded to the chancery court, with directions to ascertain the damages, if any, and render judgment for same.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 5, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 19*)—MOOT QUESTIONS.

Where defendant, whose lumber was attached under writs issued by a justice, sold it, before trial of the case on appeal to the circuit court, without obtaining an order releasing it, the issue as to the attachment became a moot question, which would not be considered by the Supreme Court on appeal, since though defendant was affected by the costs, such question could have been reached by motion to retax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 63-80; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 391*)—STAY OF SUIT.

An appeal and supersedeas not operating to vacate a judgment, but only to stay proceedings thereunder, where a petition in bankruptcy was not filed until more than four months after the rendition of judgment, and did not affect the same, the suit would not be stayed under Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 11a, 30 Stat. 549 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3426), since no benefit to the bankrupt's estate would result from a stay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Dec. Dig. § 391.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Miller County; J. M. Carter, Judge.

Consolidated actions by K. R. Blythe and others against J. B. Booker. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank S. Quinn, for appellant. Jno. N. Cook, for appellees.

HART, J. The appellees, K. R. Blythe, John Miller, J. W. Lummus, and Joe Miller, on the 30th day of October, 1907, instituted separate suits in a justice of the peace court in Miller county, Ark., against appellant, J. B. Booker, for wages due, and claiming a laborer's lien on lumber and ties at appellant's mill. On the same day the justice issued a writ of attachment in each case, and these writs were executed by attaching certain lumber and cross-ties in the lumber yard of appellant. On the day of trial the justice found in favor of appellees, both on the issue of the attachments and as to the amounts claimed to be due them; and judgment was entered accordingly. Appellant duly prosecuted an appeal to the circuit court, and executed appeal bonds according to the provisions of subdivision 3, § 4666, Kirby's Dig.

On a trial anew in the circuit court the cases were consolidated and tried together. Appellant admitted the indebtedness, and the jury found the issues on the attachment in favor of appellees. Judgment was accordingly entered by consent for the respective amounts of the indebtedness, and the attachments were sustained. Judgment was also rendered against the sureties on the appeal bonds. The case is here on appeal, and the only issue raised is as to the attachments.

The record does not disclose that the court ever made an order releasing the attached property, or in any other manner disposing of it; but it does show by appellant's own testimony that he sold all of the lumber attached. The attached property was sold by appellant before the trial in the circuit court, but the record does not show the exact time of the sale. Having disposed of the lumber before the date of the trial in the circuit court, without having procured an order releasing it, the issue as to the attachment is now a moot question, and will not be considered by the court. The appellant, having disposed of the attached property, can only be affected by the trivial amount of costs, and that could have been reached by motion to retax the costs, instead of by appeal. Stuckey v. Lindley, 84 Ark. 594, 106 S. W. 482.

Appellant has also filed a petition to stay this suit under section 11a, Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 549 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3426). The judgment in this case was rendered at the June term, 1908, of the Miller circuit court. An appeal was taken, and a supersedeas bond given, on the 10th day of July, 1908. The petition in bankruptcy was not filed until the 3d day of December, 1908, more than four months after the rendition of the judgment in the circuit court. The appeal and supersedeas did not have the effect of vacating the judgment, but only of staying proceedings thereunder. Miller v. Nuckolls, 76 Ark. 485, 89 S. W. 88, 113 Am. St. Rep. 101. Therefore no benefit to the bankrupt's estate can be derived by a stay of the proceedings, and the petition will be denied. Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699, 9 Sup. Ct. 725, 32 L. Ed. 1083; St. Louis World Pub. Co. v. Rialto Grain & Securities Co., 108 Mo. App. 479, 83 S. W. 781.

Judgment affirmed.

WILCOX et al. v. HEBERT.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 12, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—OBLIGATION OF MASTER—DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE MACHINERY.

A master must exercise ordinary care, in proportion to the dangers incurred, in selecting reasonably safe machinery, and in keeping the same in proper condition, but he is not an insurer of the safety of the machinery, and need not supply any particular kind, nor use any particular character, of safeguard against danger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 171, 172, 180, 184, 192; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—OBLIGATION OF MASTER—DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE MACHINERY.

The liability of a master for having furnished unsafe machinery, proximately causing injury to a servant, depends on the care a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised under similar circumstances, and a mere error of judgment in selecting a more dangerous kind of machinery than could have been provided, or in altering a machine so as to render it less safe, does not necessarily convict the master of actionable negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 171-174; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES—IGNORING EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injury to a servant operating a mangle by having her hand caught between the rollers, the evidence showed that the master had removed a guard rod, and had attached to the mangle a revolving feed apron, and the master proved that the guard rod could not be used on the machine with a feed apron attached, and that the alteration in the machine, even with the guard rod discarded, diminished the danger to the operator, an instruction that, if the master permitted the operation of the machine without the guard rod, and its absence caused the accident, he was liable was erroneous, as cutting off the master's effort to show that the mangle was reasonably safe, and that he had increased the safety by attaching the feed apron, and had not diminished it by removing the guard rod.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613, 616; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian County; Daniel Hon, Judge.

Action by Emma Hebert against W. H. Wilcox and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Read & McDonough, for appellants. Edwin Hiner and Ira D. Oglesby, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, C. J. Appellants operated a steam laundry in the city of Ft. Smith, Ark., and appellee, a girl between 14 and 15 years of age at the time of the occurrence which is the subject-matter of this action, was working for them. She sustained a physical injury while working for them, and sues to recover damages, alleging that their negligence caused the injury. She was engaged at work at an ironing machine called a "mangle," and, while feeding a garment into the mangle, one of her hands became caught between two rollers, and was badly crushed and burned. She alleged in her complaint that she was, at the time she received the injury, inexperienced in the operation of said machine, and ignorant of the dangers attending its use; that it was a dangerous machine to one inexperienced in its use, and was rendered more dangerous by the removal of a guard rod, which she alleged was placed on the machine by its manufacturers as an additional protection to persons while operating it. Negligence of appellants is alleged (1) in failing to instruct her as to the performance of her work so as to avoid injury, and to properly warn her of the danger attending the work; and (2) in removing the guard rod from the machine and permitting its use without the guard rod.

Appellee and another girl about the same age were working together feeding garments into the mangle. They stood on a platform in front of the mangle, and took the garments to be ironed from a basket which was attached to the front of the feed apron. The feed apron revolved toward the rollers of the machine, so as to carry the garments, when laid on it, between the rollers, a large heated iron roller and the small felt rollers which pressed the garments against the heated roller. In this way the garments were ironed. In feeding the garments into the machine it was not necessary for feeders to permit their hands to pass between the rollers, and the first of the felt rollers extended over somewhat in front of the iron roller, so as to serve as a warning, when touched, of the near approach to the heated roller. It was necessary, however, for the feeders to spread a garment out on the feed apron so that it would properly pass between the rollers, and to hold the end of the garment, after the other end started, between the rollers, so that it would pass through straight and smooth. Appellee and her companion were at the time of the injury ironing aprons, and she had one of the strings of the apron which she was ironing wrapped around her fingers, and was holding it by this string when she allowed her hand to be carried between the rollers. When her hand was extricated, it was found that the apron string was wrapped around three of her fingers, and her fingers were closed around the string. It is contended on behalf of appellants that, according to the undisputed evidence, appellee was fully instructed as to her duties, and warned of all the dangers attending the work, that according to her own evidence she was fully aware of the danger, and that the injury was caused by her own carelessness. On the other hand, it is contended by counsel for appellee that, according to the undisputed evidence, no instruction was given to her as to the proper way to do the work so as to avoid danger, and no warning of the danger given at all. It is unnecessary for us to attempt to decide which of these widely differing contentions is correct, as the case is to be reversed on other grounds hereinafter stated, and the evidence may be different in the next trial. The law is plain as to the duty of an employer to warn and instruct an inexperienced servant, and need not be stated now. The testimony establishes the fact that the machine in question had been in use about 17 years, and was originally made without a revolving feed apron, but with a guard rod in front of the first felt roll, so as to serve as a warning to the person feeding garments into the machine; that about 6 years before the injury appellants purchased and attached to the machine a revolving feed apron, which increased the space between the person feeding and the rollers, and that they then removed the guard rod, and operated the machine thereafter without it. Appellants adduced testimony tending to show that the guard rod could not be used on the machine with the feed apron attached, and that the alteration made in attaching the revolving apron even with the guard rod discarded, diminished the danger to the operator. And there was also evidence adduced by appellee that mangles are now manufactured with a revolving apron attached and with a guard roll, which is a different appliance from the guard rod.

The court, over the objection of appellants, gave the following instruction at the request of appellee: "(7) If the jury believe from the evidence that the machine at which plaintiff was at work was made with a guard roll—that is, when constructed and put up by the manufacturers, contained such rod or roll—that this guard rod was put on the machine for the protection of persons using it, and that it was a protection, and contributed to the safety of persons using it, that defendants permitted the machine to be operated without such guard roll, and that its absence from the machine at the time plaintiff was injured caused or contributed to the accident by which she was injured, then defendant would be liable, if the accident was caused by the absence of the guard roll, or would not have happened if the machine had been provided with same." This instruction was erroneous. In the first place it ignored the difference, which appellants' testimony tended to explain, between a guard roll and a guard rod, and used the two terms interchangeably. This confusion of terms should perhaps have been met by a specific objection. But the fatal objection to the instruction is that it made appellants insurers of the safety of the machine, and ignored their contention that it was less dangerous after attaching the feed apron and removing the guard rod than it was before. The instruction, in the face of testimony tending to show that the machine in its altered condition was safer than it was before the alteration was made, and that a guard rod could not be used with the revolving apron, told the jury, as a matter of law, that if the guard rod was a protection, and contributed to the safety of persons using the machine, and that its absence caused the injury, its removal constituted negligence, and rendered appellants responsible for the injury. Its effect was to tell the jury that, even though the appellants exercised the care of a prudent person in providing a machine reasonably safe for the use intended, yet if it turned out to be less safe on account of the removal of the guard rod, it constituted negligence to remove the guard rod. This is not the law. The master is only held to the exercise of ordinary care, proportionate to the danger to be incurred, in the selection of reasonably safe machinery and appliances, and in keeping them in proper condition. Harris Lumber Co. v. Morris, 80 Ark. 260, 96 S. W. 1067; Hough v. T. & P. Ry. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612; 1 Labatt on Master & Servant, §§ 14-16. He is not an insurer of the safety of the appliances furnished, and is not bound to supply any particular kind of machinery, nor to use any particular character of safeguard against danger. 1 Labatt on Master & Servant, § 35; Dynen v. Leach, 26 L. J. Exch. N. S. 221; Bohn v. C., R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 106 Mo. 429, 17 S. W. 580.

The question of his liability for damages on account of having furnished a piece of machinery which turns out to be unsafe, and which proves to be the proximate cause of an injury to the servant, must be tested by the question as to what care a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised under similar circumstances. A mere error of judgment in selecting a more dangerous kind of machine than could have been provided, or in altering a machine so as to render it less safe, does not necessarily convict the master of culpable conduct toward his servant, but it is a question for a jury to say whether or not it constitutes negligence. Stringham v. Hilton, 111 N. Y. 188, 18 N. E. 870, 1 L. R. A. 483; So. Pac. Co. v. Seley, 152 U. S. 145, 14 Sup. Ct. 530, 38 L. Ed. 391; Smith v. Ry. Co., 69 Mo. 32, 33 Am. Rep. 484; Grattis v. K. C. P. & G. Ry. Co., 153 Mo. 380, 55 S. W. 108, 48 L. R. A. 399, 77 Am. St. Rep. 721; Foley v. Pettie Mach. Works, 149 Mass. 294, 21 N. E. 304, 4 L. R. A. 51; Wood v. Heiges, 83 Md. 257, 34 Atl. 872. The error of the instruction was inherent, and it was not, and could not have been, cured by any other instruction. Its prejudicial effect is obvious, for it cut off appellants' effort to show that the mangle was reasonably safe for the intended use, and that they had increased the safety by attaching the feed apron, and had not diminished it by removing the guard rod.

For this error, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Pope Chancery Court; Jeremiah G. Wallace, Chancellor.

Action by A. F. Welch and others against C. H. Gregory and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. P. Strait, for appellants. Sellers & Sellers, R. B. Wilson, J. T. Bullock, and Brooks & Hays, for appellees.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. The question presented on this appeal is whether or not the seventh item of the last will of Hawkins Gregory devised an estate in remainder to the two persons therein named, which vested in them immediately on the death of the said testator. The seven items of the will are as follows:

"First. I give and bequeath to each one of my brothers and sisters, namely, Henderson, Robert, Hardin, Jones and Jedethum H. Gregory, Matilda Wooten and Elizabeth Davis, the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars in gold.

"Second. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Fannie A. Gregory, during her natural life, all my land. I also give to her all of my personal estate, except the sums specified in the first article. In the item of personal estate I include all of my notes and accounts.

"Third. I give to my wife's two daughters, Margarette and Georgia Griffin, my two three year old fillies, which they claim respectively.

"Fourth. I will and order that all my debts and funeral expenses be paid out of any currency that may be on hands.

"Fifth. I will that immediately after my death the sums bequeathed to my brothers and sisters be paid to them respectively on their receipting for same.

"Sixth. I hereby appoint Fannie A. Gregory and William Griffin to carry out the provisions of this will.

"Seventh. I will that after my wife's death all my land shall be given to her daughters, Margarette and Georgia Griffin."

It is contended that words sufficiently apt to express an intention of the testator to devise a vested estate in remainder were not used, and that the clause in question must be construed as "merely directory, and expressive of a desire only, that after the termination of the life estate given the widow, the land shall be given to Margarette and Georgia Griffin." It is the duty of courts to so construe a will as to give effect to the intention of the testator as expressed by the language used. Campbell v. Campbell, 18 Ark. 513; Cockrill v. Armstrong, 81 Ark. 580; Page on Wills, § 460. "The intent of the testator," said Chief Justice Marshall in Finlay v. King, 3 Pet. 346, 7 L. Ed. 701, "is the cardinal rule in the construction of wills; and, if that intent can be clearly perceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule of law, it must prevail." There is a presumption against partial intestacy. Page on Wills, § 466; Gardner on Wills, p. 369; Kenaday v. Sinott, 179 U. S. 606, 21 Sup. Ct. 233, 45 L. Ed. 339.

The law favors an early vesting of the estate, and courts will place that construction upon the language of the will which will result in vesting the estate created by the will at the earliest moment, and will not adopt a construction which results in the postponement of the vesting of title. "Where the time when the interest shall vest is in doubt because the testator has used words which may mean either of two dates, the earlier date is to be selected. This rule that the executory estate shall be construed to be vested rather than contingent, whenever the former construction is possible, is the result of that other very old rule of the common law that the fee shall never be in abeyance if it can possibly be avoided." 2 Underhill on Wills, § 861.

Tested by the rules of construction thus announced, we are clearly of the opinion that the language used by the testator was sufficient to vest an estate in remainder, after the expiration of the widow's life estate, in the two persons named in the seventh clause of the will. Unless this construction be placed on the language, the testator must be deemed to have died intestate as to the remainder interest in his lands, for the will contains no other provision with reference to the lands after the expiration of the widow's life estate, which is expressly devised to her in the second clause.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. LONG.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 19, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action against a telegraph company for mental anguish caused by the negligence of the telegraph company in sending a message to the wrong place, the burden is on plaintiff to show a cause of action.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action against a telegraph company for mental anguish caused by sending a telegram to the wrong place held insufficient to establish a cause of action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Logan County; Jephtha H. Evans, Judge.

Action by Mary Long and another against the Western Union Telegraph Company.

Judgment for the named plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Mechem & Mechem, for appellant. Mary Long, for appellee.

BATTLE, J. Mary Long and her father, C. L. Wright, brought this action against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover damages for mental pain and anguish suffered by them, alleging in their complaint: That on the 16th day of February, 1908 Charley Long, husband of the plaintiff Mary Long, died in Tulsa, Okl. That before his death he requested that his remains be taken to Caulksville to be buried. That Caulksville is a village in Logan county, Ark., and is about three-fourths of a mile from Ratcliffe, the nearest telegraph station. C. L. Wright lived in the vicinity of Caulksville, and had lived there for a number of years. That on said 16th day of February, 1908, the plaintiff Mary Long delivered to the defendant's agent at Tulsa, Okl., the following message for transmission, and paid the customary charges for the same, to wit:

"Tulsa, Okla., Feb. 16, 1908.

"C. L. Wright, Caulksville, Ark.

"Charley Long dead. Can he be buried there? He told me to ask you this. Answer quick.
Mary Long."

That the defendant carelessly and negligently sent said message to Paris, Ark., which was about nine miles from Caulksville, and that, by reason of such negligence, the plaintiff C. L. Wright failed to learn of the death of the said Charley Long in time to make arrangements for his burial, and Mary Long held the remains of her said husband expecting a reply to her message until the condition of the remains became such that she was forced to bury them in Tulsa, Okl. That, had said message been delivered promptly, the remains of Charley Long would have been taken to Caulksville for burial. That both of the plaintiffs suffered great mental pain and anguish by reason of the fact that the body of Charley Long was buried, contrary to his wish, in a foreign state and among strangers.

The defendant in its answer admits sending the message, but denies that it was negligent or that the plaintiffs suffered any mental pain or anguish by reason of negligence on its part.

Mary Long testified: That she was the widow of Charley Long. That the said Charley Long died in Tulsa, Okl., on the 16th day of February, 1908, which was Sunday.

That before the said Charley Long died he requested that his remains be taken to Caulksville, Ark., for burial. That, after the death of the said Charley Long, she delivered to the Western Union Telegraph Company's agent for transmission the message set out in her complaint. That on the next day, Monday, February 17th, she received the following message from her father:

"Ratliffe, Ark. Feb. 16th, 1908.

"Mary Long, Tulsa, Okla.

"No need to bring him here. Bury him there.
C. L. Wright."

That, after receiving said message from her father, she waited for another message from him, and that she held the body until Friday, and, receiving no other message, she buried the same in Tulsa. That her husband and she were both strangers in Tulsa. That she had sufficient funds to take the remains of her husband to Caulksville, but that she did not want to do so without the consent of her father. That there was nothing to have prevented her from taking the remains to Caulksville for burial, but the fact that she "hated to do anything like that without letting him [her father] know it."

On redirect examination she testified that she did not have sufficient funds to take the remains to Caulksville at the time her husband died, but that it was raised by friends, and it took two or three days to get it up.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of Mary Long for $300; and the defendant appealed.

The burden was upon the plaintiff to show a cause of action. There was no evidence to show that she was prevented from burying her husband at Caulksville. She had the means to do so. But she says that she did not wish to bury him there without the consent of her father. There was no evidence that she had any reason to believe that he would not consent. So there was no reasonable excuse for the failure to bury at Caulksville, and no cause of action against the telegraph company on account of mental anguish. Her own acts were the proximate cause of her mental anguish.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cleveland County; H. W. Wells, Judge.

Action by the Bray Clothing Company against N. A. McKinney. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Gibson, for appellant. Pitt Holmes, for appellee.

FRAUENTHAL, J. The plaintiff, the Bray Clothing Company, is a mercantile corporation located at Louisville, Ky., and the defendant is a merchant doing business at Rison, Ark. The plaintiff instituted this suit against defendant by filing an account with a justice of the peace for a balance, which it claimed that defendant owed it for goods sold and delivered to defendant. Upon the trial in the court of the justice of the peace a judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appealed to the circuit court; and on the trial de novo in that court a verdict was returned in favor of the defendant.

The plaintiff contends that on December 2, 1905, the defendant made an order for certain goods through its traveling salesman, but under the testimony it does not appear that a written order was made for the goods, so that it was only a verbal order given to the salesman. The plaintiff claims that it shipped a part of the goods to defendant on January 29, 1906, and that it shipped the balance on May 3d following. The controversy is over the amount of the goods that were shipped on January 29, 1906. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove that the plaintiff delivered to the common carrier at Louisville, Ky., a package of goods directed to the defendant at Rison, Ark., and in the package were goods amounting to $97.50, but made out in two bills, one of $66 and one of $31.50, and that they were made out in two bills because there was a difference in the amount of the cash discount allowed on the goods of the two accounts or bills. The evidence of the defendant tended to prove that the package arrived unbroken, and only contained goods amounting to $66. It is conceded that defendant has paid that amount, as well as the entire amount of the account for the shipment of May 3d. The defendant testified that the goods amounting to $66 and the goods covered by the shipment of May 3d were all the goods that he made the order for in December, and claimed that he did not make any order for the goods amounting to $31.50, and denied receiving same at any time.

Upon the trial of the case the court gave two instructions, but the appellant has failed to set them out in the abstract; and therefore the presumption is that these instructions were correct. Carpenter v. Hammer, 75 Ark. 348, 87 S. W. 646; Koch v. Kimberling, 55 Ark. 547, 18 S. W. 1040; May v. Dyer, 57 Ark. 441, 21 S. W. 1064; Mine La Motte L. & S. Co. v. Con. Ant. Coal Co., 85 Ark. 123, 107 S. W. 174.

It is contended by the plaintiff that it delivered to the common carrier at Louisville, Ky., a package containing goods amounting to $97.50 and duly addressed to the defendant at Rison, Ark., and that when said package arrived at Rison, even if it actually only contained goods amounting to $66, still the defendant would be liable for $97.50. It bases this contention upon the abstract principle of law that a delivery to the common carrier of goods directed as above is a delivery to the consignee, and therefore, if any loss occurs in transit, it is the loss of the consignee. State v. Carl, 43 Ark. 359, 51 Am. Rep. 565; Burton v. Baird, 44 Ark. 556; Hope Lumber Co. v. Foster, 53 Ark. 196, 13 S. W. 731. But this is not a correct presentation of the law as applied to the testimony of the defendant in this case. It is true that ordinarily the effect of any consignment is to vest the title in the consignee and to impose the risk on him. But this is only true when the goods are consigned in execution of a contract authorizing such shipment. Before a delivery to a carrier will constitute a delivery to the consignee so as to pass the title and make the consignee liable as for goods sold and delivered, the goods must correspond with the order in quantity and quality; and, in fact, with all the terms of the contract. A seller cannot send more goods than were ordered, and in such event claim a completed sale when same are delivered to the common carrier duly directed to the consignee. It is true that, after the arrival of such goods and inspection by the consignee, he may then accept them; but until then there would be no completed sale of the goods. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 1062; Tiedeman on Sales, § 68; 2 Mechem on Sales, § 746. In this case the defendant testified that all the goods which he ordered he received, that in the consignment of January 29th he received goods amounting to $66, and those goods, together with the goods received in May, are all the goods he ordered. Under that testimony, if plaintiff shipped any other goods in the package, the same were at the risk of the plaintiff. But the testimony of defendant tended to prove, further, that the package arrived unbroken, and that it only contained goods amounting to $66, and did not contain the goods for which the plaintiff is now suing. He testified that the goods were carefully checked out and placed in his store, and that the only account rendered at the time was for the goods amounting to $66, and that plaintiff never sent to him an account or statement for the goods amounting to $31.50 until the following September, and that it was not until then that his attention was called to such an alleged shipment. So that it became a controverted question of fact as to whether the goods now sued for were actually shipped in the package, or received by defendant, and also as to whether those goods were actually ordered by defendant so as to place the loss upon him in event they were lost in transit. These questions we presume were submitted to the jury upon proper instructions. They returned a verdict in favor of defendant, and there is sufficient evidence to sustain that verdict.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Clark Chancery Court; Jas. D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Action to quiet title by W. S. Morgan and W. H. Fagan against Dougald McMillan and William Gerig. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. S. Morgan and W. H. Fagan instituted this action in the chancery court of Clark county against Dougald McMillan and Wm. Gerig to cancel certain deeds as a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff Morgan in and to the following described lands, situated in Clark county, Ark., to wit: The S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, and S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 34, all in township 5 S., R. 22

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

W., containing 80 acres more or less. The plaintiff W. H. Fagan entered certain lands of the United States in Clark county, Ark., under the homestead act of 1862, and received a certificate of entry from the register of the United States land office at Camden, Ark. On the 3d day of February, 1883, a patent was issued to him by the United States, and in it the land was described as follows: The S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, and the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, and the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 34, township 5 S., R. 22 W., containing 160 acres. On the 24th day of December, 1881, Fagan conveyed by warranty deed to the plaintiff Morgan the land in controversy, together with 24 acres of adjoining land for the consideration of \$300 evidenced by two promissory notes of \$150 each, one payable to W. H. Fagan, and the other to J. E. Fagan, his brother. In the fall of 1883, Fagan says that he sold the east half of his homestead entry to T. T. Fendley. Fendley claims that Fagan sold him the whole of his homestead entry. In the fall of 1884, it was discovered that the lands upon which Fagan had made his improvements and had located his homestead were not the lands described in his patent, but were one mile west of the same. Both the lands described in the patent, and those upon which Fagan located his homestead, were public lands belonging to the United States. The lands described in the patent were back in the woods. They were hilly, had no improvements upon them, and were unfit for cultivation. When it was discovered that the lands upon which Fagan had made his improvements and had located his homestead did not correspond with the lands described in the patent, it was agreed that Morgan's notes should be returned to him, which was done, and that J. E. Fagan should keep \$22 which had been paid him on his note, and that the 24 acres should go back to W. H. Fagan. Morgan then left the land on which the homestead had been located and never returned to it, nor did he thereafter pay any taxes or otherwise assert any claim to the lands described in the patent and in the deed from W. H. Fagan to him. On the 31st day of October, 1902, W. H. Fagan and wife and T. T. Fendley and wife executed a quitclaim deed to the lands described in said patent to Dougald McMillan. The consideration paid to Fendley was \$20 and to Fagan \$5. It appears that the said lands described in the patent were assessed for taxes in 1885, one 80 in the name of W. H. Fagan, and the other in the name of T. T. Fendley. They were sold to the state for the taxes of 1885, and a redemption deed was executed to Dougald McMillan by the commissioner of state lands on the 13th day of November, 1902. Thereafter an undivided interest in the lands was conveyed to his codefendant, Wm. Gerig. Other facts appear in the opinion. The chancellor rendered a decree quieting the title of the plaintiff

Morgan in the lands in controversy, and the defendants have appealed.

McMillan & McMillan, for appellants. R. G. McDaniel and J. H. Crawford, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). In the cases of Chapman & Dewey L. Co. v. Bigelow, 77 Ark. 347, 92 S. W. 534, and St. Louis Refrigerator & Wooden Gutter Co. v. Thornton, 74 Ark. 883, 86 S. W. 852, it was held that, in actions to quiet title, the plaintiff must succeed, if at all, as in actions of ejectment, upon the strength of his own title, and cannot rely upon the weakness of that of his adversary. Tested by this rule, we are of the opinion that the appellee Morgan was not entitled to prevail in this suit, because he has no title to the lands in controversy. The evidence of both himself and of his grantor, Fagan, shows that he did not purchase them, but purchased a part of the lands upon which Fagan had made improvements and located his homestead. By mistake the lands in controversy were described in the certificate of homestead entry issued to Fagan. The same mistake was subsequently made in the deed from Fagan to Morgan, and in the patent from the United States to Fagan. When the deed from Fagan to Morgan was executed, Morgan did not take possession of the lands in controversy, but did take possession of the lands upon which Fagan resided, and which he claimed as his homestead, and made improvements upon them. Both he and Fagan testify that the lands so occupied by him, and not the lands in controversy, were the lands he intended to purchase. When the mistake in description was discovered in 1884, Morgan left the lands on which he resided, and the notes which he had given for the purchase money were returned to him, and the possession of the 24 acres (the land described in the deed of Fagan to him with the land in controversy) was restored to Fagan. We think the undisputed evidence shows that Morgan never intended to purchase, and that Fagan never intended to sell, the lands in controversy. The evidence also shows that the execution of the deed, too, was a mutual mistake, and that the contract was rescinded as soon as the mistake was discovered. The record shows that the lands in controversy are wild and unimproved, and that Morgan has never paid taxes on them, or in any manner attempted to assert title to them since his rescission of his contract with Fagan and abandonment of whatever interest he had acquired under the deed from him. It necessarily follows from this conclusion as to the facts under the rule above announced that Morgan has no title to the lands, and that his complaint should have been dismissed for want of equity.

This brings us to a consideration of the interest, if any, of the appellee Fagan. Fagan says that he cannot read and write, that he did not understand that he was conveying to McMillan the lands in controversy, that in 1883 he had conveyed to Fendley 80 acres of his homestead entry, and that the deed to the same had been lost. He further says that he thought he was only making another deed to this land, and did not know that he was conveying the land in controversy. In this he is flatly contradicted by Fendley and by H. J. Runyan, who took the acknowledgment to the deed. Runyan testified that Fagan on two different occasions before signing the deed talked with him about the propriety of executing it, and also talked with other friends about it. He said: "My recollection is that W. H. Fagan made two trips to Amity and talked with me at two different times before he decided to sign and acknowledge the deed conveying the above land to D. McMillan. I know that he talked with other parties, who were his friends, and he talked with J. B. Boyd, who was a notary public here at that time, as to whether it would be improper for him to give a quitclaim deed to this land; he having given a prior deed to it to Thos. T. Fendley. I am quite positive that W. H. Fagan knew at the time that he signed the deed and at the time I took his acknowledgment that it conveyed the land described in said deed. He took several days before signing the deed. My recollection is it took about a week or 10 days." Fendley testified that Fagan understood what land he was conveying, and stated that it lay in the hills and was not worth anything to any one. The other testimony in the case shows that the land was wild and unimproved, that it was not fit for cultivation on account of being in the hills, and was only valuable for the timber that was on it, and that at the time the deed was made to McMillan there was no market for the timber because the land was so remote from a railroad that it was not practicable to use it. After McMillan's purchase, a railroad was constructed near it, and this fact gave the timber a market value. Up to the time of McMillan's purchase, Fagan had not thought it of sufficient value to pay taxes on it, or to redeem it from tax sale, nor had any one else considered it of sufficient value to buy it at a sale for taxes. Moreover, Fagan testified: "I have no interest to the land in controversy in this action other than to see that W. S. Morgan should get the land under the deed which I made him." We think at the time of McMillan's purchase the land had no value except a speculative one, and that he is an innocent purchaser for value. Counsel for appellees contend that the deeds and tax receipts recited in the decree as being a part of the evidence upon which the case was heard bear no file marks, and therefore are no part of the transcript. The complaint alleges that the homestead patent from the United States to W. H. Fagan was executed. The deeds from Fagan to Morgan and from Fagan to McMillan are made exhibits to the complaint, and in that way become part of the record. American Freehold Land Mtg. Co. v. McManus, 68 Ark. 263, 58 S. W. 250.

The undisputed evidence shows that no taxes were paid by appellees on the land after 1884. Hence the contention of appellee in this respect is upon an immaterial matter, and it is not necessary for us to determine it.

It is ordered that the decree be reversed, and that the cause be remanded, with directions to dismiss the complaint for want of equity.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Calhoun County; Geo. W. Hays, Judge.

Action by W. F. McKnight against A. G. Brown & Co. and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for a new trial, unless plaintiff consents to remit part of the judgment, in which event judgment is affirmed.

Instruction No. 3 requested by defendant, which was given as modified by the part italicized is as follows:

"You are instructed that, under the contract between the parties herein, if dirt which should have been deposited in the dump was, with the consent of the engineer in charge, wasted and not placed in the roadbed with the understanding that dirt would be hauled from borrow pits and take its place without charge, this agreement would be binding on the parties, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for hauling such dirt, provided you find this from a preponderance of the evidence, but the burden is on the defendants to show that this agreement was made by the plaintiff."

Thos. S. Bugbee and Geo. B. Pugh, for appellants. J. S. McKnight (Thornton & Thornton, of counsel), for appellee.

FRAUENTHAL, J. The plaintiff, W. F. McKnight, instituted this suit to recover from the defendants A. G. Brown & Co. a judgment for a balance which he claimed was due to him for work done in the construction of a railroad owned and built by the defendant the Rock Island, Arkansas & Louisiana Railroad Company, and to have such judgment declared a lien upon said railroad. A. G. Brown & Co. had entered into a contract with the said railroad company by which they had agreed to build and construct its railroad according to certain specifications, and these contractors thereafter entered into a written agreement with plaintiff by which they employed him to construct three miles of said railroad in Calhoun county. The written contract provided that plaintiff should do said work in compliance with said specifications and named the prices per cubic yard for earth, loose rock, and solid rock which he should remove, and the price per station of 100 feet square for clearing and grubbing. The plaintiff claimed: That in pursuance of said contract he did the following work: Cleared and grubbed 169.8 stations of right of way, of the value of $1,638; removed 42,025 cubic yards of earth, of the value of $5,463.25; and removed 7,720 cubic yards of loose rock, of the value of $2,161.60—making a total value of labor performed amounting to $9,322.85. That he had been paid thereon the sum of $7,638.85, leaving due to him the sum of $1,684. The defendants claimed: That the following is all the work and labor that was done by plaintiff: Cleared and grubbed 161.6 stations of right of way, $1,616; removed 30,025 cubic yards of earth, of value of $3,903.25; removed 7,720 cubic yards of loose rock, of value of $2,161.60; and other items of work amounting to $130.19—making a total of $7,811.04. That defendants had paid thereon the sum of $7,739.81, leaving a balance of $71.23 due to plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for "$71.23 plus $428.77, aggregating $500."

Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff in his testimony admitted that he had been paid $7,739.81. The only questions therefore that are involved in this case are: (1) The amount of earth that was removed by plaintiff, and for which he should receive payment under the terms of the contract; and, (2) the number of stations of right of way which he cleared and grubbed under the terms of the contract. These are greatly questions of fact, but they also involve a construction of the terms of the contract which apply to the above two kinds of work. The written contract between plaintiff and Brown & Co. specifically provides that the work should be done in compliance with the specifications of the Rock Island, Arkansas & Louisiana Railroad for the construction of said railroad, and therefore the terms of those specifications became a part of that contract.

1. By the contract it is provided that plaintiff should receive 13 cents per cubic yard for earth removed; but neither the contract nor the specifications state anything further, so, to make more definite the places from which the earth was to be moved or the exact character of the removal: As a matter of fact, in the execution of the work, the earth was moved from two different character of places. It was removed from cuts made in the bed of the railroad, which are called "excavations." The earth from these excavations would be hauled to points in the roadbed that had to be filled, in order to make the dump for the roadbed. Earth was also removed from borrow pits and ditches along and at some distance from the sides of the roadbed, which was hauled to the roadbed to make the dump. The specifications provided that "material from all excavations must be deposited in embankments, except where otherwise directed by the engineer in charge," and they also provided that earth or other material from the excavations could be "wasted" by permission of said engineer; that is to say, that by permission of the engineer the earth from excavations would not have to be deposited in embankments. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tends to prove that he removed from the borrow pits and ditches and hauled and put in the dump of railroad bed 10,100 cubic yards of earth for which he has received no payment, and for which the defendant refused to make any allowance of credit to plaintiff. The defendants contend: That the specifications provided: "Hauling Material. The price per cubic yard shall include hauling material a distance of not exceeding five hundred feet, and for that necessarily hauled a greater distance, whether from cuts or borrow pits, an additional price per cubic yard for each one hundred feet hauled after the first five hundred feet will be paid." That by this provision, which became a part of the contract, the price of 13 cents per cubic yard not only covered the cost of the work and labor of excavating the earth, but also covered the cost of hauling the earth for a distance of 500 feet, and on that account the haul of the earth for that distance was sometimes denominated the "free haul." So that it is claimed by defendants that for the price of 13 cents per cubic yard the plaintiff had agreed to take the earth from the excavations and then haul it a distance of 500 feet and there deposit same in the embankment or dump of railroad bed. The defendants contended that the plaintiff "wasted" the material taken from excavations by not hauling same, as above provided, and depositing same in embankments; and instead of taking the material from the excavations and putting same in dump, the plaintiff removed the earth from the borrow pits and put that in the dump; and that he should not be paid therefor, for the reason that the material taken from excavations and "wasted" would have equaled the amount of earth that plaintiff removed from borrow pits and ditches and put in the dump, and for which therefore plaintiff was not allowed any estimate and pay. But the testimony of the plaintiff tended to prove that, soon after he began to "waste" earth from excavations, the engineer in charge and plaintiff, after some negotiations, came to an agreement by which the plaintiff was permitted to "waste" the earth from the excavations on account of the great cost in making the "free haul," in comparison with the price paid to plaintiff for moving the earth; and plaintiff further testified that it was then understood and agreed that he was to receive payment for the earth thus removed from borrow pits and ditches and placed in dump as provided for by the contract. By the terms of the specifications the engineer was authorized to permit the plaintiff to "waste" the earth taken from the excavations, and to deposit same in places other than in the embankments. The plaintiff was entitled to 13 cents per cubic yard for earth removed from borrow pits, and the earth thus removed from borrow pits should not be set off against the earth taken from excavations and "wasted," if the engineer gave that permission. The plaintiff testified that the engineer gave that permission. This was controverted by the engineer; but that was a question of fact to be determined by the jury, and there was sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict in favor of plaintiff upon that issue.

2. It is contended by the plaintiff that he is entitled to $1,698 for having cleared and grubbed 169.8 stations of right of way, and that he was only paid $1,616 thereon. The defendants contend that the plaintiff only cleared and grubbed 161.6 stations of right of way, that in the entire distance there were 169.8 stations, but that 8.2 stations were covered only with weeds and grass and were not therefore actually cleared and grubbed within the terms of the contract. The specifications provided in terms for what constituted clearing and grubbing, and further stipulated that: "Removing weeds, grass and all like growth will not be considered clearing and must be done without charge." Upon the trial of the case the defendant asked, amongst others, for the giving of the following instruction: "You are instructed that under the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants A. G. Brown & Co. the plaintiff is not entitled to recover for removing weeds, grass, and such like growth under the agreement of the said A. G. Brown & Co. to pay for grubbing and clearing." Under the terms of the contract, we are of the opinion that said instruction should have been given, but the only prejudice that the refusal by the court to give the above instruction could have worked against defendants was to permit the jury to allow the plaintiff to recover for removing weeds and grass. Now the total number of stations that defendants claim were covered with weeds and grass amounted to 8.2 stations, and, at the contract price of $10 per station, amount to $82. The defendants concede that plaintiff was entitled to payment for the clearing and grubbing of all other stations claimed by him. So that by disallowing the above sum of $82 all prejudice growing out of the refusal of the above instruction will be removed.

The defendants also contend that the court erred in modifying instruction No. 3 asked for by defendants; but we are of the opinion that the court was correct in making the modification.

There is quite a sharp conflict in the evidence in this case, and while in some particulars the evidence on the part of the defendants seems more definite and satisfactory, nevertheless the questions of fact were within the province of the jury to determine, and we cannot say that there is not sufficient evidence to sustain their finding.

If the plaintiff will within 15 days remit from the amount of the judgment herein the sum of $82, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed; otherwise the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. v. WALLACE et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 12, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 177*)—TRANSPORTATION BEYOND CARRIER'S LINE—LIABILITY FOR INJURY.

Independent of statute a carrier is not bound to assume responsibility for the transportation of property safely and promptly beyond its own road; but where a carrier contracts to transport and deliver property beyond its own line, thereby continuing the liability which it assumes at the beginning of the carriage throughout the transit to the point of delivery, it renders itself liable for any loss, injury, or delay on the line of the connecting carrier, though under the traffic agreement the initial carrier's trains, while on the connecting line, may be under the control of the connecting carrier's servants, the connecting carrier in such case becoming the agent of the initial carrier, and its employees and agents become those of the initial carrier, for whose negligence it is liable to the owner of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 775-803; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 150*)—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE.

A carrier cannot contract for exemption from liability for its own negligence or the negligence of its servants, though not inhibited from making such exemption by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 654-659; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 104*) — TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT — NEGLIGENCE — DELAY FROM WRECK.

The derailment and wreck of a train causing delay in transportation of property by a carrier is prima facie evidence of the carrier's negligence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Green County; Frank Smith, Judge.

Consolidated actions by W. A. Wallace and others against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff in each action, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On April 1, 1908, the plaintiff W. A. Wallace delivered to the defendant, a common carrier of goods, a car load of cattle at Paragould, in the state of Arkansas, to be transported to and delivered at the National Stockyards in East St. Louis, in the state of Illinois. The plaintiff alleged that the cattle were greatly damaged by reason of the unnecessary and negligent delay on the part of the defendant in the transportation and delivery of the cattle, and he instituted this suit to recover said damages. On the same day the plaintiffs I. H. Wood and A. D. Grayson delivered to defendant two car loads of hogs at Paragould, Ark., to be transported to and delivered at the National Stockyards in East St. Louis, Ill. And the plaintiff I. H. Wood on the same day delivered to the defendant at Paragould, Ark., one car load of cattle to be transported and delivered to the same place. The last-named parties instituted separate and independent suits against the defendant, alleging that the said hogs and cattle were greatly damaged by reason of the unnecessary and negligent delay on the part of the defendant in the transportation and delivery thereof, and in their respective complaints asked for the recovery of their respective damages. The defendant filed separate answers to the complaints in these three suits. In its answers the defendant admitted that it had received and accepted the shipments, and had agreed to transport the same from Paragould, Ark., to the National Stockyards in East St. Louis, Ill. But it alleged that a portion of the route or railroad track over which the shipments were to be carried lay in the state of Illinois, and was not owned by defendant, but that such portion of the track was owned by the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company, and that it had an arrangement or contract with said last-named railway company by which it used said track and ran and operated its trains over the same. It alleged that the transportation of said shipments was delayed by reason of the derailment and wreck of a train on that portion of the track and route, and that, inasmuch as the said portion of the track or line was under the supervision of the trainmaster and servants of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railroad Company, the negligence by which the shipments were delayed was not caused by the defendant or by its agents and servants, and it further alleged that, at the time it undertook and agreed to transport the cattle and hogs, the several plaintiffs entered into contracts, whereby it was agreed upon valuable consideration that the defendant should not be liable for any loss or damage arising from derailment of trains or collision of trains or delay in the delivery of the cattle and hogs not arising from the negligence of defendant.

Upon the motion of the defendant, the three cases were consolidated and were tried by the court sitting as a jury. In the trial there was an agreed statement of facts by the parties, by which it was agreed that the several plaintiffs sustained damages in the sum of $50 per car to the cattle and hogs by reason of the delay in the transportation of same; that the delay occurred and was occasioned by the derailment of a train or wreck on that portion of the track or line of railroad in the state of Illinois which was owned by the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railroad Company, and which was under the supervision and direction of the trainmaster and train dispatcher of the latter railway company; that all the damages accruing to the plaintiffs resulted from that delay, that the defendant had an arrangement or contract with the latter railway company by which it operated its own trains and cars over that portion of the route, and used that portion of the line of railroad in conjunction with said latter named railway company. Each shipment was made under a contract by which the defendant agreed to transport and carry the same from Paragould, Ark., to said above point in East St. Louis, Ill.; and the contract also contained the following provision, made upon a valuable consideration: "It is stipulated that the live stock covered by this contract is not to be transported within any specified time, nor delivered at destination at any particular hour, not in season for any particular market, and that the parties of the first part are exempted from liability for loss or damage arising from derailment or collision, or other accidents or causes not arising from negligence of the first party." The defendant asked the following declaration of law, which was refused: "The court declares the law to be that where a carrier undertakes to transport and deliver live stock to a foreign market, and in the transportation of the stock it has to transport them part of the distance over a leased line of road used in conjunction with the owner of the line, and on the account of the wreck on the leased line without the fault or negligence of the carrier the delivery has been delayed 10 hours, the carrier is not liable for the damages resulting from such delay."

The court found in favor of the plaintiffs for the respective amounts of damages as agreed on, and rendered judgments accordingly; and from these judgments the defendant now prosecutes this appeal.

S. H. West and J. C. Hawthorne, for appellant. Huddleston & Taylor, for appellees.

FRAUENTHAL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The liability of the defendant in this case is determined by the contract of carriage which it made with the plaintiffs, and the arrangements which it had for using and running its own trains over that portion of the route on which the delay occurred that caused the damage. By the common law, and independent of any statutory provision or regulation, a common carrier is not bound to assume responsibility for the transportation of property safely and without unnecessary delay beyond the terminus of its own road, and after the property has been turned over to a connecting carrier. But, independent of any statutory liability, a carrier may accept and contract to transport and deliver property beyond the terminus of its own line, so that the liability which it assumes at the beginning of the carriage will continue throughout the transit to the point of delivery, and thereby render itself liable for any loss, injury, or delay on the line of another carrier over which a part of the transportation is carried. And, when such contract is made, the subsidiary carrier becomes the agent of the contracting carrier, and the employes and agents of such owner of the connecting line become his servants and employes for whose negligence and default he becomes liable to the owner of the property. The carrier can thus bind himself to carry to any destination; and, if it is necessary in order to make the carriage that the goods be transported over the line of another, he assumes the responsibility of the employment of all subsidiary carriers and agents, and is liable for their defaults. 1 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 226; 6 Cyc. 481; Railway v. Woodward, 164 Ind. 360, 72 N. E. 558, 73 N. E. 810; Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Rd. Co. v. Washington, 74 Ark. 9, 85 S. W. 406, 69 L. R. A. 65, 109 Am. St. Rep. 61; Little Rock & Hot Springs Western Rd. Co. v. Record, 74 Ark. 125, 85 S. W. 421, 109 Am. St. Rep. 67. In this case the defendant admits in its answer that it accepted the property and agreed to transport same from Paragould, Ark., to East St. Louis, Ill., and there deliver the same. It thereby entered into a contract whereby it bound itself to carry the goods over the entire route, and it did not concern the plaintiffs as to what agencies or lines it employed to effect the carriage. In making the transportation to the destination it secured running power for its own trains over the line of another railroad company for a portion of the route. That did not absolve it from liability, although the damage occurred on the portion of the line which was owned and managed by the other railroad company. It employed the agency of such other road, and is liable for its defaults, whether it had any direct control over it or not. As is said in 1 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 240: "If the contract clearly provides for through carriage or the facts and circumstances disclose an undertaking to transport the goods to their ultimate destination, all subsidiary carriers employed in the transportation will become the agents of the contracting carrier to effect the performance of the contract, and he can no more stipulate for exemption from liability for the negligent acts or omissions of such agent than he can stipulate for exemption from liability for his own." Murray v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., 66 Conn. 512, 304 Atl. 506, 32 L. R. A. 539; Railway v. Martin, 59 Kan. 473, 53 Pac. 461; 2 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 915; Eureka Springs Railroad Co. v. Timmons, 51 Ark. 459, 11 S. W. 690.

It is contended by defendant that by the contract it was not liable for loss or damage arising from derailment or other accident or causes not arising from its own negligence. The defendant could not contract for exemption from liability growing out of its own negligence or the negligence of its servants, even though not inhibited from making such exemption by any statutory provision or regulation. Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627; 1 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 450; 6 Cyc. 387; Taylor v. L. R., M. R. & T. R. Co., 39 Ark. 148; L. R., M. R. & T. Ry. Co. v. Talbot, 39 Ark.

523; St. L., I. M. & Sou. R. Co. v. Lesser, 46 Ark. 236. When the defendant runs its trains over a portion of the road of another company pursuant to an agreement that its trains while on such road should be under the control and direction of the servants of the lessor company, it constituted the employes of such company its own agents and servants over such portion of the road, and became liable for their negligence by which the property carried by the defendant became damaged. In the above case of Murray v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., 66 Conn. 512, 34 Atl. 506, 32 L. R. A. 539, it was held that, if one railroad company runs its trains over a portion of the road of another company pursuant to a contract providing that its trains while on such portion of the line should be under the control and direction of the servants of the lessor company, such servants became the agents of the lessee company, and it will be liable for any injury to a passenger carried by it caused on said portion of the route by the negligent act of such servants as though they were its own employes. And this applies equally to the carriage of goods.

Now, the derailment of the train and the wreck, by which the transportation of this property was so delayed that it caused the damage, made out a prima facie case of negligence against the defendant which has not been overcome. Railway Co. v. Mitchell, 57 Ark. 418, 21 S. W. 883; St. L., I. M. & Sou. R. Co. v. Sandiage, 85 Ark. 589, 109 S. W. 551. It follows, therefore, that the lower court was not in error in refusing the instruction asked by the defendant, and that its finding herein is sustained by the evidence and its judgment by the law. The rights of the plaintiffs in this case are determined by the common-law liability of the defendant under the contract which it entered into herein for a through transportation and carriage of the property to the point of destination; and they are not dependent upon the provisions of the act of Congress commonly known as the "Hepburn Act," approved June 29, 1906 (chapter 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 892]), amendatory of the interstate commerce act approved February 4, 1887 (chapter 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3154]), and it is not necessary, therefore, in this case to pass upon the provisions of that act.

It is urged by the defendant that the state court has no jurisdiction over this cause of action because the shipment was an interstate shipment. We do not think that there is any merit in this contention. We presume that it bases this contention on the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate commerce" approved February 4, 1887, as amended by what is commonly known as the "Hepburn Act," approved June 29, 1906. But, as before stated, the cause of action in this case is not necessarily founded upon the rights created or given by that act. The question of the liability of the initial carrier for the negligence of the connecting carrier is not involved in this case; and it is not necessary, therefore, in this case, to pass upon the question as to whether the state courts have jurisdiction to enforce such rights.

The judgments are therefore affirmed.

HUGHES BROS. v. REDUS.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 12, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 230*)—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTOR—IMPEACHING DEED.

In an action for possession of land, claimed by defendant under a deed to him, evidence of statements of the alleged grantor to the effect that the alleged grantor had not executed a deed to defendant, but had allowed him to have the use of the property as long as the grantor lived, which were alleged to have been made long after the time that defendant claimed that he had purchased the land, and long after the time that he claimed the deed had been executed, and in defendant's absence, when he was in the sole possession of the property, claiming it as owner, was inadmissible to impeach the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 837; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 230*)—DECLARATIONS—STATEMENTS SHOWING CHARACTER OF POSSESSION OF LAND.

When a person is in possession of land, his acts and declarations are admissible to show the character and extent of his possession and claim; but, after he has sold the land, and given possession to another, his declarations as to his claims thereto, made in the purchaser's absence, are only self-serving, and therefore inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 835-851; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—INNOCENT PURCHASER—NOTICE—ACTUAL POSSESSION.

Actual and visible possession of land by a person claiming to be the owner thereof is notice to all the world of his title; and the fact that he has not recorded his deed would not make one who had purchased the land of the heirs of the former grantor, without notice of the deed, an innocent purchaser.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Craighead County; Frank Smith, Judge.

Action by Hughes Bros. against James Redus. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. G. Taylor, for appellant.

FRAUENTHAL, J. The plaintiff, Hughes Bros., a corporation, instituted this ejectment suit against the defendant, James Redus, for the possession and recovery of a house and lot in the city of Jonesboro, Ark. Both parties deraigned their title to the property from a common source. The plaintiff claimed that Mattie I. Hughes was the owner of the lot at the time of her death, in February, 1906, and that her heirs conveyed the property to plaintiff on June 4, 1906. The defendant claimed that Mattie I. Hughes sold the lot to him in 1886, and that on the 13th day of March, 1887, she executed to him a deed therefor; that in 1887 he inclosed the lot and built a house thereon, and continuously since then has been in the possession of the property under the claim of ownership by virtue of his said purchase and deed, and he claimed to have paid the taxes on the land continuously since 1887. The deed from Mattie I. Hughes to defendant had never been recorded; but, on the trial of the cause, the alleged original deed was introduced in evidence, and there was a great deal of testimony pro and con as to the execution and authenticity of the deed. The plaintiff claimed that Mattie I. Hughes placed defendant in possession of the lot under a verbal agreement that he could retain possession as long as she lived. There was a trial of the cause by a jury, which returned a verdict for the defendant, and from the judgment given thereon the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

There are two assignments of error of the lower court urged here by appellant. It is urged that the lower court erred in refusing to permit the introduction of certain statements alleged to have been made by Mattie I. Hughes. The alleged statements were made long after the time that defendant claimed that he had bought the lot, and long after the time that he claimed the deed had been executed to him, and at the time they were made the defendant was in the sole possession of the property, and was claiming to be the owner thereof, and they were made in the absence of the defendant. These alleged statements of Mattie I. Hughes were, in effect, that the defendant was to have the use of the property as long as they lived, and that she had not executed a deed to him. This testimony was not competent. The statements made by a grantor in a deed to impeach the deed are not admissible if made in the absence of the grantee. Hargus v. Hayes, 83 Ark. 186, 103 S. W. 163. When a party is in the possession of land, the acts and declarations of such party are admissible in order to show the character and extent of such party's possession and claim. Seawell v. Young, 77 Ark. 309, 91 S. W. 544. But after the alleged sale, and after the party has turned over the possession of the property, such declarations are only self-serving, and are therefore inadmissible. It has been uniformly held by this court that the declarations of a vendor made subsequent to the sale, and in the vendee's absence, cannot be admitted to impeach the validity of the sale; and the title of the purchaser cannot be impaired, or in any wise affected, by such declarations and statements. Gullett v. Lamberton, 6 Ark. 109; Humphries v. McCraw, 9 Ark. 91; Finn v. Hempstead, 24 Ark. 111; Smith v. Hamlet, 43 Ark. 320; Crow v. Watkins, 48 Ark. 169, 2 S. W. 659; 16 Cyc. 988.

It is urged that the lower court erred in refusing to give instructions, on behalf of the plaintiff, which, in substance, stated that, if the deed to defendant was not acknowledged in manner prescribed by law, or if the deed was never recorded, then plaintiff was an innocent purchaser, and could not be affected by it. But, at the time that the plaintiff claims that it purchased the property, the defendant was in the actual and open possession of it, claiming to be the owner thereof. Actual possession of the lot by defendant was notice to the plaintiff, and all the world, of his title. It was not necessary for defendant to place his deed on record to give plaintiff notice of his title. When plaintiff purchased the lot, the defendant was in possession of it, and the law imputed to the plaintiff, under such circumstances, notice of whatever right, title, or equity the defendant had in the property. Plaintiff could not in such event be an innocent purchaser of the property. No statements made by the vendor at such time should have been relied on by it; and, under the law, it ought not to have been, and could not be, misled thereby. Because the defendant was in the actual and visible possession of the property when plaintiff purchased, if it did not seek the defendant to learn the nature of his claim and title, the law makes the plaintiff take notice of that title. Hamilton v. Fowlkes, 16 Ark. 340; Shinn v. Taylor, 28 Ark. 523; Rockafellow v. Oliver, 41 Ark. 169; Atkinson v. Ward, 47 Ark. 533, 2 S. W. 77; Strauss v. White, 66 Ark. 167, 51 S. W. 64; Thalheimer v. Lockert, 76 Ark. 25, 88 S. W. 591; Sproull v. Miles, 82 Ark. 455, 102 S. W. 204.

The court, therefore, did not err in refusing to give the instructions asked by plaintiff.

The verdict of the jury was amply sustained by the evidence. The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Garland County; W. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by Henry Troll, public administrator of Don C. Thatcher, deceased, against P. J. McCarthy and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action by Henry Troll, public administrator in charge of the estate of Don C. Thatcher, deceased, of St. Louis, Mo., upon a judgment which, it was alleged, one William C. Richardson, who was then public administrator of the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, and who, as such administrator, was in charge of the estate of said Don C. Thatcher, deceased, had recovered against the said P. J. McCarthy and Nellie McCarthy, on the 7th day of May, 1900, in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, within and for the state of Missouri. The judgment was for the sum of $8,000. The defendants demurred to the complaint because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also filed an answer denying the allegations of the complaint. Subsequently they filed an amendment to their answer, in which they denied that plaintiff had the legal right or authority to prosecute this suit. There was a trial by jury, and a verdict for $8,000, with 6 per cent. interest from May 12, 1900. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and the defendants have duly prosecuted an appeal. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Wood & Henderson, for appellants.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). In the case of Hallum v. Dickinson, 47 Ark. 120, 14 S. W. 477, it was held that: "To maintain an action on a judgment against a plea of nul tiel record, a certified copy of the judgment is not sufficient, but all the pleadings and proceedings on which the judgment is founded, and to which as matter of record it necessarily refers, must be produced." See, also, Hall v. Roulston, 70 Ark. 343, 68 S. W. 24; Swing v. St. Louis Refrigerator & Wooden Gutter Co., 78 Ark. 246, 98 S. W. 978, 115 Am. St. Rep. 38. Counsel for appellants contend that this requirement was not complied with in the present case. This action was commenced on the 4th day of January, 1908, and a copy of the judgment sued on duly certified by the clerk of the court in which it was rendered, and his certificate, duly authenticated by the judge of said court, was filed with the complaint as an exhibit, and was introduced in evidence in the case. Copies of the complaint, summons, with the return showing service, and the answer of the defendants, P. J. and Nellie McCarthy, separately certified by the clerk and authenticated by the judge of said court, were also introduced in evidence.

Counsel for appellants contends that there was no evidence to show that the complaint and judgment were parts of the same action, and that therefore the complaint and judgment, being authenticated by separate certificates of exemplification bearing different dates, were insufficient proof to sustain the judgment now in question. The record shows that all the proceedings were, in a case in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, within and for the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, styled "William C. Richardson, Public Administrator in Charge of the Estate of Don C. Thatcher, Deceased, v. William H. Stevenson, J. Brooks Johnson, Albert Thatcher, Thatcher Restaurant Company, a corporation, Edward Ketchum, Patrick J. McCarthy and Nellie McCarthy, Howard Realty Company." The record also shows that the complaint in that case was filed May 25, 1898, and summons was issued on it the same day. A part of the return on the summons is as follows: "I further executed this writ in the city of St. Louis this 25th day of May, 1898, by delivering a copy of the writ as furnished by the clerk to Patrick J. McCarthy, a defendant herein. Henry Troll, Sheriff, by Wm. D. McManus, Deputy"—and also, "I further executed this writ in the city of St.

Louis on this 25th day of May, 1898, by delivering a copy of the writ as furnished by the clerk to Nellie McCarthy a defendant herein. Henry Troll, Sheriff, by Wm. D. McManus, Deputy." It also shows that the answer of Patrick J. and Nellie McCarthy was filed on October 15, 1898, and that the judgment was entered of record on May 7, 1900.

Wm. D. McManus, a deputy sheriff, testified that the signature attached to the return was his signature, and that, while he had no personal recollection of having made the service, he would not have made such return if he had not delivered a copy to the said defendants personally. Paul Reiss testified that he was acquainted with Patrick J. McCarthy, and that, as his attorney, he prepared and caused to be filed the answer above referred to; that he was employed as such attorney by said Patrick J. McCarthy for himself, and for his wife, Nellie McCarthy. The deposition of Patrick J. McCarthy, taken in the case above referred to, in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, in which he testified that he was one of the defendants to the suit was read in evidence. L. Frank Artoffy testified that he was a lawyer, and lived in St. Louis, Mo.; that he was the attorney who brought the suit in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, which resulted in the judgment sued on; that he became acquainted with Patrick J. McCarthy in that litigation, and that the Patrick J. McCarthy, the defendant herein, is the identical person who testified in that case, and that in July, 1900, he came to Hot Springs and talked with McCarthy about the judgment, which had been recovered against him; that McCarthy said he did not have anything, and that nothing could be made out of him. The complaint showed that it was a suit in replevin. The prayer was for a return of the property and $5,000 damages for its detention; and, in case a delivery of the property could not be had, judgment in the sum of $10,000, the value thereof, was asked. This was sufficient to show that the judgment sued on was rendered in the action in which the complaint, answer, and the summons introduced in evidence were filed, and also to identify appellants as the defendants in the action in which the judgment sued on was rendered.

Under the laws of the state of Missouri, a public administrator is elected in each county in the state, and in the city of St. Louis. His term of office is four years. Rev. St. Mo. (1889) § 296. An order of said circuit court of the city of St. Louis, duly certified by the clerk and authenticated by the judge, was made on the 10th day of December, 1907, showing that Henry Troll, then public administrator of said city of St. Louis, was substituted as plaintiff in the place of said William C. Richardson. The court had the power to make the order of substitution upon the discharge of Richardson, and the order itself is conclusive upon us that it was made upon a proper showing. "Where a representative has recovered a judgment in an action brought by him in his representative capacity in the jurisdiction of his appointment, he may sue thereon in his own name in another jurisdiction without taking out ancillary letters of administration." 18 Cyc. p. 1239, and cases cited.

Finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

BENTON et ux. v. CITY OF ST. LOUIS.
(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
March 31, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 819*)—ACTIONS FOR DEATH—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for the death of a child drowned in a hole near a defective sidewalk, evidence held to show the city's negligence in maintaining the sidewalk, and that the negligence was the proximate cause of the death, if the sidewalk was in a public street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 819.*]

2. DOWER (§ 47*)—LAND SUBJECT TO—LAND DEDICATED TO PUBLIC USE.

If the fee of land held by a husband passed during his lifetime to a city for public use as a street either by prescription, by express dedication by deed or by acts in pais coupled with acceptance, or by condemnation, the wife's inchoate right of dower was extinguished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 755*) — STREETS—LIABILITY FOR DEFECTS.

If a strip of land was a public city street, the fact that people of the neighborhood or abutters built a sidewalk along the side of it, and from time to time repaired it without ordinance of the city or order from its officers, and constructed a manhole over a sink hole on the land at private expense and turned local drainage into it, would not relieve the city from liability for defects in the street or the sidewalk, or for a dangerous condition arising from a combination of the defects and the unguarded sink hole, since a city owns its streets as a trustee for the public, and is primarily bound to keep them free from defects caused by itself or by third persons, if it has notice of such third persons' acts in time to repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1587, 1589, 1590; Dec. Dig. § 755.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 759*) — STREETS—LIABILITY FOR DEFECTS.

While the existence of sewer or water mains, a curb line established, or paving are evidence which may conclusively show acceptance of a dedication of the ground for street purposes, their absence or presence does not affect the city's liability for defects in the premises, if they are shown to be a public street, the city being liable for defects negligently allowed to exist whether the street is improved or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1595-1600; Dec. Dig. § 759.*]

5. DEDICATION (§ 44*) — EVIDENCE — LAND DEDICATED AS STREET.

Evidence held to show that a strip of land 50 feet wide, including a strip upon which a defective sidewalk and sink hole were situated, was dedicated to a city for a public street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

6. DEDICATION (§ 31*)—NECESSITY FOR ACCEPTANCE.

Mere dedication is not enough to constitute a street a public street, so as to impose on a city the duty to keep it clear of defects, nuisances, and obstructions caused by the acts of third persons or by the city itself, but there must be an acceptance of the dedication by the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 64, 65; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

7. DEDICATION (§ 35*)—ACCEPTANCE.

An acceptance of a dedicated street may be either express or implied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

8. DEDICATION (§ 45*)—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY—ACCEPTANCE.

Whether the dedication of land for a street was accepted by a city, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 762*) — STREETS—ACQUIESCENCE IN PUBLIC USE.

Where street lamps and poles of public service corporations had been in existence for a long time on a strip of land claimed to be embraced in a public street, the city will be held to have acquiesced in such public use of the strip, whether they were so placed in strict accordance with city charter regulations or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1605-1611; Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 818*)—DEFECTS IN STREETS—ACTION FOR DEATH—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—SUBSEQUENT REPAIRS.

In an action against a city for the death of a child caused by a defect in a street, where there was an issue as to whether the locus was in a public street, evidence that the city, in the August or September after the death in May, had made repairs at the place of accident, was competent as tending to show that the city recognized the locus as being in a public street, the remoteness of the repairs going to the weight and not the competency of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1737; Dec. Dig. § 818.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; O. Orrick Bishop, Judge.

Death action by H. W. Benton and wife against the City of St. Louis. Plaintiffs took a nonsuit, and, their motion to have it set aside being denied, they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Carter, Collins & Jones, for appellants.
Chas. W. Bates and Chas. P. Williams, for respondent.

LAMM, P. J. Plaintiffs, father and mother of George Benton, an infant between 6 and 7 years, sue for the wrongful death of George, drowned May 4, 1906, at a place in defendant city known as "Bruno Avenue," laying their damages at $5,000. At the close of their evidence, defendant asks an instruction in the nature of a demurrer. The trial judge signifies his intention to give it. Thereupon plaintiffs request permission to take a nonsuit with leave. Permission going, they take a nonsuit. In due time they move to set it aside, and (their motion denied) they appeal.

The petition charges that Bruno avenue is a public street of defendant; that a duty lay upon defendant to keep it in safe condition; that at a certain point in said avenue there was for a long time a "sink hole, surrounded with a large excavation, ditch, or hole" about 5 feet deep and 12 feet in diameter, and coming up flush with the edge of the north sidewalk on said avenue; that there was no rail on the sidewalk at the point, and the boards of the walk were loose and insecure; that such dangerous and defective conditions were well known to defendant, or could have become known to it by the exercise of ordinary care in time to have made repairs before the death of George, but that it failed and neglected to put the street and sidewalk in safe condition, and that such negligence caused George's death; that in walking upon the sidewalk in said street at said point in the afternoon of May 4, 1906, he stepped or fell from the sidewalk into said excavation and was drowned—the excavation being then filled with water up even with the surface of the sidewalk and water in said street. The answer was a general denial. There is (among minor questions raised) a main proposition in the case in a sharp issue on the question of fact of a street or no street at the locus. Facts vital to the disposition of material questions made on appeal will appear in connection with their determination.

1. If the sidewalk was on a public street, there can be no doubt but what the charge of negligence was well made out, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the death of George. It was an old, narrow, wooden sidewalk, the worse for wear and decay, built of boards nailed crosswise on stringers, and, at the point in hand, rested elevated on wooden posts several feet high. The boards were loose, the sidewalk tipped south towards a hole running under it, and thence out in the street. This hole was a large and deep affair. The combination of hole, tipped sidewalk, and loose boards shown by the evidence presents an inflamed case of a negligently maintained and dangerous pitfall to adult or child. Not only so, but for a long time, in not unusual rains, the hole filled with water gathered by surface gutters and drainage, and this water arose even with the walk. There had been a heavy but not unusual rainfall on May 4th. The water gathered in the hole caused the sidewalk to float; that is, it (as a whole) seemed not fastened and anchored down securely. George was of such tender age that contributory negligence could not be imputed to him as a matter of law. In fact, there is no plea of contributory negligence, and none that his parents were guilty of negligence in allowing him to be on the street at the time. It seems they had but moved into the neighborhood, and knew nothing of the bad sidewalk or of the hole, or of storm water usually accumulating there; nor did the child. A little bit before he was drowned, George had been seen busying himself placing planks, some distance away up street, for footmen to cross Bruno avenue dryshod. He had on rubber boots and a striped cap. He was next seen making his way on the sidewalk towards this hole—this, a very few minutes before the alarm was given. No human eye saw him drown. But a neighbor woman saw him going toward the spot immediately before. She had but turned to her household duties, and, hearing a cry (a death cry, obviously), hurried out doors. On investigation, his cap was seen floating on the hole of water, and his body was presently fished out by hooking a pole into one of his rubber boots. Some witnesses describe the sidewalk as "wobbly" and "rickety" right close where his body lay. In this condition of proof the jury could reasonably infer that the defects in the sidewalk hard by the treacherous pool caused him to slip or step off and drown. There was proof, too, that these defects were of long standing, so that the city could not claim it had neither actual nor constructive notice in time to remedy them. Hence the demurrer cannot be upheld on the theory that plaintiffs made no case on the facts, if it be once further determined that the issue of fact of street or no street at the locus should have been put to the jury.

2. Plaintiffs' theory of the case is that the sidewalk is on a public street; contra, defendant insists it was on private ground, and hence the city owed no duty to keep it safe. Such controversy (assuming facts already stated) seeks additional facts, viz.: Bruno avenue runs east and west in the west part of the city. McCausland avenue, a public street, crosses it (with a slight jog) east of the locus. Blendon place, another street, comes into it from the north a little ways west of the locus. With a jog, Blendon place then runs on south. At an early date, not disclosed, the land in that region seems to have been platted into blocks of irregular dimensions, and ways were left open between them. At a time, not disclosed by the evidence, but many years ago, a street was dedicated by deed and called "Bruno Avenue." The whole region was then an outlying country district, apparently. Bruno avenue, as dedicated by deed, was 30 feet wide. Ten feet off the south side of this deeded street was, many years ago, inclosed by the abutting proprietors by a permanent fence, as a part of their grounds, and this fence has ever since been maintained to the exclusion of the public. A city plat or survey shows that a strip of ground 20 feet wide lying north of and adjacent to the 30-foot street, so dedicated, is marked as a "private road." When this plat was made is dark, but the paper private road antedates the oral evidence in the case, which, in turn, covers a period of 15 or 20 years next before the trial. Hard by and north of the private road is a strip of ground 10 feet wide, marked on the same city map or plat with the name "George W. Campbell." In point of fact, however, these three strips so severally designated on paper as "private road," as "Bruno Avenue," and as "George W. Campbell" (barring said 10 feet on the south taken into a private inclosure), make on the earth's surface a strip of ground 50 feet wide inclosed for 15 or 20 years on the north and south by such permanent fences as commonly earmark a public road, and the whole strip is known in the neighborhood as "Bruno Avenue." The record is dark as to whether the said 10 feet on the south was vacated by legal steps. It is dark as to whether the original Bruno avenue was ever widened by legal steps on the north by taking in the private road and the Campbell strip. The next parallel streets, north and south of Bruno, are, severally, say 600 feet away. The distance from McCausland avenue to Blendon place is, say, 600 feet, but (while the abstract is not clear) it is not our understanding that Bruno avenue ends at McCausland on the east and Blendon place on the west. It crosses said streets and runs on. On the north side of Bruno at the locus are a church, some residences, and some inclosed grounds. On the south side of said 600-foot section of Bruno is probably a residence and some lots used for gardening. On the south side of Bruno there never was a sidewalk. On the north side there has been for 15 or 20 years a straight sidewalk, one section of it laid in cinders and another with boards and stringers. This sidewalk, as we grasp it, is on a straight line with that on the north side of Bruno east of McCausland. From photographs presented here we infer that the neighborhood north of Bruno is quite thickly settled. There is no testimony showing that the sidewalk in question was built by the city or by its order. There is testimony to the contrary, to the effect that when originally put down, as said, 15 years or more ago, it was voluntarily laid by the abutting property owners or by the neighborhood, and wholly on the Campbell strip of 10 feet. There is no testimony that the sidewalk itself was ever repaired by the city or by its order. To the contrary, there is evidence that some repairs were voluntarily put on by neighborhood subscription and individual effort. There is no testimony that any curb line was ever established on Bruno, or that the city sewer or water system is extended along the street. In the center of the 50-foot strip is a roadway for vehicles, 20 or 30 feet wide. This roadway the city practically admits is a public street. It is partly on the old private road, and partly on Bruno avenue as originally dedicated by deed. The city has graded it, repaired it, and claims it as a street; whether by condemnation, by prescription, or by dedication and acceptance is not shown, nor is it material. On Bruno avenue, a little ways from Blendon place, is a hole called a "sink hole." The neighbors once used it for drainage purposes, and probably do so now. Into this sink hole drain pipes run, crossing under the sidewalk. A manhole was there constructed long ago by private enterprise to serve some purpose of rustic and rural drainage. At spells the water, eating into the roadway from the sinkhole, enlarged the hole, and from time to time city teams and employes hauled in filling and repaired the roadway at the hole and elsewhere. The record shows that weeds and some small bushes were at times allowed to grow about this hole. At times a temporary barricade of some sort protected travelers in vehicles on the roadway from getting into the hole, and photographs presented to us show that the traveling public are somewhat protected and warned by a rude stone curbing running south of the hole and next to the roadway for a short distance, and, further, that there is a rude gutter made of flagging leading from the hole a little ways and draining it off on the side of the street. At times, covered by the oral evidence, the hole was of such dimensions that the traveled way referred to bended from the center of the 50-foot strip to the south, and returned to its central course when the hole was passed. At the corners of McCausland and Bruno and Blendon place and Bruno the usual city signs are put up on posts, naming the streets crossing there, and indicating the 50-foot strip as "Bruno Avenue." These signs have been there for many years. At intervals Bruno avenue was temporarily closed by barricades for repairs, and on these was the usual sign used in the city indicating that the street was, for the nonce, put out of use because of its bad condition. On Bruno avenue close to the locus is a street lamp, maintained by the city for years, just at the south edge of the sidewalk and on the 10-foot Campbell strip. One or more lamps of a similar nature are maintained on the same strip by the city between McCausland and Blendon place. It seems from the evidence that there fell a time in the history of St. Louis (mysteriously and by way of metaphor) referred to as the "moon yet" period. Before that period, electricity was used to light the ways of that town in the suburbs. During the electricity, as over against the "moon yet," period, the city maintained an arc light at the corner of Blendon place and Bruno, and we infer that poles sustaining the wires were on the 10-foot strip. On this same strip, under permits granted by the city, are telephone and lighting poles erected by public service corporations.

It seems that many years ago George W. Campbell owned quite a tract of land in that region; that he is dead, but when he died is not shown; that he left a widow—whether she is dead or alive is not shown; and it appears that long ago he parted with all his holdings, barring, maybe, the 10-foot strip on which the sidewalk is laid. One of the minor contentions of the city is that dower in the widow of George W. Campbell would seem to be outstanding, and that this fact interferes with a prescriptive right of way in the city or public, or with a right of way arising from dedication. There was testimony tending to show that the fence long maintained along the north side of the sidewalk as a visible boundary of Bruno was in line with the north line of Bruno as continued east of McCausland. We infer that this extension was also known as "Bruno Avenue," and that it ran east with a uniform width of 50 feet. There was testimony that the sidewalk in question had long been used by pedestrians in that neighborhood; that many people passed to and fro over it daily for many years, and that there was nothing during all that time to indicate to any one coming afoot on Bruno avenue from McCausland or Blendon place that the walk was not a public walk for footmen as part of the street.

The foregoing is sufficient of the record to pass upon the issue of law raised by the demurrer as to whether the sidewalk, or, what amounts to the same thing, the 10-foot Campbell strip, was part of a public street. On that record, we observe:

(a) The suggestion that dower is outstanding in the widow of George W. Campbell in the 10-foot strip deals only with the surface of things. The case really turns on another question, viz.: Is that strip a component part of a public street? If it be, then, under the reasoning of Venable v. R. R., 112 Mo. 103, 20 S. W. 493, 18 L. R. A. 68, and Chouteau v. R. R., 122 Mo. 375, 22 S. W. 458, 30 S. W. 299, we must hold that such widow has no dower in a public way. Chrisman v. Linderman, 202 Mo., loc. cit. 615, 100 S. W. 1090, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1205, 119 Am. St. Rep. 822; Baker v. R. R., 122 Mo. 396, 30 S. W. 301. In the Venable Case it was decided that a widow had no dower in a strip conveyed by her husband during coverture to a railroad company for a right of way. In Chouteau v. R. R., it was held, in effect, that a widow was not endowable in land dedicated to public use as a railroad right of way. The argument runs on the theory that the land was subject to the sovereign right of eminent domain; that a widow was not endowed of land condemned for public use under statutes regulating the exercise of eminent domain; therefore, if the land was subjected to public use by a conveyance, instead of by condemnation under the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the same result follows.

The proposition that a widow is not endowed in land impressed with an easement for public use accords with the general law. In 14 Cyc. 930, the doctrine is announced as follows: "Where land is dedicated by the owner to a public use, as for a street, highway, or market place, such dedication divests the wife's right of dower. And where a quasi public corporation, such as a railroad company, having authority to acquire lands for public use and hold the same in fee, takes lands by grant from the owner for a right of way or other public purpose, the wife's right of dower is effectually barred." As to dower, we can conceive of no difference in principle whether the public use arises by prescription, by dedication through a deed or acts in pais coupled with acceptance, or by condemnation. In each instance the husband during his lifetime held the fee, and, the fee in each instance passing to the public for its use, the inchoate right of dower is extinguished. We pass from the question of dower outstanding in Campbell's widow, deeming it of no significance on the merits.

(b) If Bruno avenue from side to side and end to end is a public street, then the mere fact that the people of the neighborhood, or the abutters, or both together, built the sidewalk originally along its north side and from time to time repaired it without ordinance of the city or order from its officers, and the further fact that the local drainage was conducted by pipes into the sink hole by the neighbors, and that a manhole was constructed there at private expense, each, or all combined, cannot relieve defendant city from liability for defects in its street or a sidewalk laid thereon, or from a dangerous condition arising from a combination of said defects and the unguarded sink hole adjacent to the sidewalk. Wiggin v. St. Louis, 135 Mo. 558, 37 S. W. 528. This, because: A city owns and controls its streets as a trustee for the public. It, therefore, stands charged by the law with the primary and bounded duty of keeping them free from nuisances, defects, and obstructions caused by itself or by third parties if it (in the latter instance) had actual or constructive notice thereof in time to abate the nuisance, remove the obstruction, or repair the defect. It cannot shirk that duty, or shift it over to, or halve it with, others. So much is clear law in Missouri. Welsh v. City of St. Louis, 73 Mo. 71; Oliver v. City of Kansas, 69 Mo., loc. cit. 83; Carrington v. St. Louis, 89 Mo. 208, 1 S. W. 240, 58 Am. Rep. 108; Russell v. Columbia, 74 Mo. 480, 41 Am. Rep. 325; Beaudeau v. Cape Girardeau, 71 Mo., loc. cit. 395 et seq., and cases cited; Streeter v. Breckenridge, 23 Mo. App., loc. cit. 250; Hill v. Sedalla, 64 Mo. App., loc. cit. 501 et seq.

(c) The case is put to us by respondent's learned counsel somewhat as if the absence of sewer or water mains, or a curb line established, or paving, guttering, etc., had something to do with the city's liability. Such indicia of a highly finished street in a great city may conclusively show acceptance of a dedication of the ground for street purposes, but they have not a whit to do with liability for defects, if once the fact of the existence of a public highway is determined. Otherwise we would have to write the law this way for the little and that way for the big, one way for villages with no paved streets, no water or sewer mains, and no curb line established, and another way for cities where such things exist. A city like the humble village or country town may leave its streets as dirt roads, and yet be liable for defects negligently allowed to exist in them. Warren v. Independence, 153 Mo., loc. cit. 599, 56 S. W. 227; Dinsmore v. St. Louis, 192 Mo. 255, 91 S. W. 95; Conner v. Nevada, 188 Mo. 148, 86 S. W. 256, 107 Am. St. Rep. 314; Meiners v. St. Louis, 130 Mo. 274, 32 S. W. 637.

(d) The foregoing subsidiary questions put at rest, we face the main proposition of the case, viz.: Was Bruno avenue, at the locus, a public street 50 feet wide? In considering that question, it may be assumed that the street was not condemned for public use by legal proceedings. So, while a question of the existence of a street by prescription is in the case, yet it would be unprofitable to consider it, because the question of dedication seems uppermost and controlling.

Speaking to that question in the light of the facts, there ought to be no doubt that the animus dedicandi existed; that is, that the abutters intended to dedicate the street for public use from side to side 50 feet wide. This conclusion, we think, reasonably follows from facts established by proof. For example, permanent fences, long maintained on either side, earmark a public street. Again, the fact that these fences are practically in line with the north and south fences of the continuation of Bruno avenue adds strength to that idea.

In the next place, the practical abandonment of the whole 50-foot strip for many years by the abutting property owners and their failure to impress upon the strip the usual earmarks of private use and ownership, like possession, alienation, cultivation, etc., lend force to the conclusion by leading up to it. Especially so when such abandonment seems related and responsive to the public need of a street at that point because of the distance away of parallel streets and the number of people to be accommodated by a thoroughfare there. That Bruno avenue as now existing is an aggregation of various strips of land, which smaller strips at an early time bore different designations on maps and plats and possibly were turned out to the public on different dates, somewhat complicates the matter, but can have no adverse bearing on the issue of the dedication of the whole strip; for if each component part was dedicated, then the blanket of dedication covers the whole. But mere dedication is not enough to constitute the street a public street in the eye of the law. There must be an acceptance of the dedication by the public before the dedicated grant becomes a street such as raises the municipal duty to keep it clear of defects, nuisances, and obstructions caused by the acts of third parties or by the city itself. It seems clear law that where a street is a mere paper one, as distinguished from a street in fact, then the common sense of it is that a municipality is not charged with the duty of clearing it of obstructions and dangerous defects resulting from the laws of nature or the acts of man. Hence we need not bother with the refinements of the law in that behalf because this case is not such case.

So, there is conflict of doctrine as to whether a city must put its traveled streets from side to side and from end to end in condition for reasonable safety for travel by night as well as by day. It is maintained on one hand, and denied on the other, that a city can leave portions of its de facto streets in a "state of nature," without liability for damage from defects. We need not enter into that inviting field of speculation and canvass the authorities pro and con on the proposition, because this case is not such case. The student in jurisprudence may find phases of that question considered in the Ely Case, 181 Mo. 723, 81 S. W. 168; in the Tritz Case, 84 Mo. 632; in Golins v. Moberly, 127 Mo. 116, 29 S. W. 985; in Walker v. City of Kansas, 99 Mo. 647, 12 S. W. 894; in Roe v. City of Kansas, 100 Mo. 190, 13 S. W. 404, where the doctrine of the Tritz Case is repudiated; in Baldwin v. Springfield, 141 Mo. 205, 42 S. W. 717; in Meiners v. City of St. Louis, 130 Mo. 274, 32 S. W. 637; in Johnson v. St. Joseph, 96 Mo. App. 663, 71 S. W. 106; in Brown v. Glasgow, 57 Mo. 156; and in many other cases.

Attending now to the fact of acceptance of the dedication, we think it clear that a case was made for the jury. An acceptance of a dedicated street may be either express or implied. It may be conceded to respondent that no express acceptance is shown, but we think an implied one was made out.

Judge Elliott, in his excellent work on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) says: "An implied acceptance arises in cases where the public authorities have done acts recognizing the existence of the highway, and treating it as one of the public ways of the locality. Where control of a way is assumed by the authorities representing the public corporation, an acceptance will be implied. * * * One of the principal indications of acceptance is that of improving or repairing the road or street. In one case it was held that digging a public well in the way was evidence of acceptance, and we have no doubt of the soundness of this decision; for no matter what the particular act is, if it be one which could only be rightfully done upon a highway, it should be regarded as evidence of acceptance. * * *" Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) §§ 151-153.

Continuing, that author says (Id. section 154): "There has been much diversity of opinion as to whether user by the public will amount to an implied acceptance and cast the burden of maintenance upon the local government. Professor Greenleaf says: 'It does not follow, however, that because there is a dedication of a public way by the owner of the soil, and the public use it, the town, or county, or parish is bound to repair. To bind the corporate body to this extent, it is said that there must be some evidence of acquiescence or adoption by the corporation itself, such as having actually repaired it, or erected lights or guideposts thereon, or having assigned it to the surveyor of highways for his supervision, or the like.' This statement, it is noticeable, is a very careful and guarded one, and is indicative of the doubt in the mind of the writer. In another treatise (Angell, Highways, § 159) appears language more clearly exhibiting the uncertain state of the law. This uncertainty is removed by the later authorities, and it may now be considered as the prevailing opinion that an acceptance may be implied from a general and long-continued use by the public as of right. The later decisions upon this subject will, when analyzed, be found to be well bedded in principle. The 'town, county, or parish,' using Professor Greenleaf's terms, is represented by the town, county, or parish officers, but the officers are not the corporation. The municipal corporation consists of the inhabitants and not the officers; the officers are, in truth, nothing more than the agents of the corporation. The inhabitants, therefore, stand to the officers as principals, and if the principals have, by their conduct, accepted the dedication, it is of no great importance that the agents have taken no action in the matter. The inhabitants of a locality having by long-continued use treated the way as a public one, they make it such without the intervention of those who derive their authority from them. Creating towns, cities, and other public corporations is 'but the investing the people of the locality with the government thereof,' and they may themselves exercise the powers of government of highways quite as effectually by continued use as by any other method. Of course, user cannot constitute a way a public one in cases where the incorporating act requires an acceptance by some officer or body expressly designated. * * *

We have liberally borrowed from Judge Elliott's text, because he well formulates the general law under this head, and the doctrine announced agrees with the general trend of the decisions of this court and other appellate tribunals in this state. It is needless to lengthen this opinion by excerpts from opinions in those cases, citing a few of them will do, viz.: Meiners v. St. Louis, 130 Mo. 274, 32 S. W. 637; Baldwin v. Springfield, 141 Mo. 205, 42 S. W. 717; Hunter v. Weston, 111 Mo. 176, 19 S. W. 1098, 17 L. R. A. 633; Maus v. Springfield, 101 Mo. 613, 14 S. W. 630, 20 Am. St. Rep. 634; Beaudan v. Cape Girardeau, 71 Mo. 392; Rose v. St. Charles, 49 Mo. 509; Becker v. St. Charles, 37 Mo. 13; Heitz v. St. Louis, 110 Mo. 618, 19 S.

W. 735; Golden v. Clinton, 54 Mo. App. 100; Garnett v. Slater, 56 Mo. App. 207; Hill v. Sedalia, 64 Mo. App. 494; Johnson v. St. Joseph, 96 Mo. App. 663, 71 S. W. 106.

In determining the fact of acceptance of a dedication for street purposes, it must be borne steadily in mind that the roadway proper primarily is for wheeled vehicles and horsemen, whereas the sidewalk is that portion of the street intended for the use of footmen and which they are invited to use under the due guards of the law. In this case the long public user as of public right, the location and maintenance of street lamps on the Campbell strip and the poles of public service corporations, the barricading of the whole street when out of repair, and the employment of the usual city signs on such barricade, the maintenance of street signs at the corner of the street, and other acts in pais, show such condition of things as would permit the jury to draw the conclusion of acceptance. The fact that there was no sidewalk or other provision for footmen except the sidewalk in question occupying the usual place of a sidewalk, and the further fact that there was nothing to indicate to a passer-by that the sidewalk was not for public use or on public ground, coupled with other facts shown, tend to estop the city from denying its acceptance of the Campbell strip as part of the street. Such facts amount to an invitation held out to the public to use the sidewalk as of public right.

Some confusion exists in the record as to whether the proper officers in charge of the proper departments of city government permitted the use of the Campbell strip for street lamps and the poles for public service corporations. If these poles and lamps had been erected but a short time, it might be proper to go into these questions on this appeal. But they existed there for a long time, and, whether put there in strict accordance with the red-tape and minutiae of detail of city charter regulations or not, the city must be held to have acquiesced in such public use of the strip.

We are cited by learned counsel for respondent to the Ruppenthal Case, 190 Mo. 218, 88 S. W. 612, as direct authority in favor of sustaining the demurrer. Because of the strong reliance put on that case, we have re-examined it with anxious care. The Ruppenthal Case is somewhat grounded on the Ely Case, 181 Mo. 723, 81 S. W. 168, but the law in the Ely Case must be read in the light of the facts of that case, and those facts do not accord with the facts in the Ruppenthal Case.

In the Ely Case there was a roadway graded down on the western side of an 80-foot street. There was an ordinance requiring the street to be partially graded. When this was done, it was cut down so that the eastern side of the street was elevated several feet above the graded wagon road and "left as nature had made it." There never was any sidewalk on the street, and nothing to designate a way for footmen except a foot-worn path made by pedestrians on this elevated portion of the street on the eastern side. Weeds grew on both sides of this path, and storm water washed a gully across it. Into that gully Ely fell on a dark night. The question in the case was whether it was the city's duty to make a sidewalk, or, failing to make one, was it responsible for the condition of the path? The conclusion reached was adverse to the plaintiff. (See, in this connection, Conner v. Nevada, 188 Mo. 148, 86 S. W. 256, 107 Am. St. Rep. 314, written by the same learned brother.)

In the Ruppenthal Case the facts were these: There was a granitoid sidewalk laid by abutting property owners on a public street. This sidewalk had been there for a long time (eight years, the syllabus says), and it was not constructed by order of the city. At the end of the granitoid walk there was a drain pipe put in by some abutting property owner long before, which pipe did not extend for the width of the sidewalk by 18 inches at either end. Commencing from that pipe, and continuing in line with the granitoid, there was what is denominated a "dirt pathway" as wide as the pipe was long, i. e., 8 feet narrower than the granitoid walk. This pathway was used by pedestrians who came on the street and traveled the granitoid walk to its end. The storm water, rushing through this pipe, cut away the dirt at the end of this walk next to the granitoid and made a dangerous hole there. Plaintiff, in the nighttime, passed along this granitoid walk. He had lived in the neighborhood for seven years, but knew nothing of this hole, and, reaching the end of the walk, fell into the hole and was hurt. The street dealt with in the Ruppenthal Case was 80 feet in width, the macadamized roadway 50. Outside of the macadamized part, the street had not been graded, and the city seems to have elected to pay no attention to it. Weeds grew on the unimproved sides and the roadway was higher than those sides. Along those unimproved sides were natural water drains.

Based on the theory that the city had not taken possession of the 15-foot strip on each side of the macadamized roadway for the purposes of a street and had done nothing to improve it, but had left it in "a state of nature," we held, first, that the city was not liable as a matter of law for the dangerous hole made by the flowing of water through the drain pipe where the dirt pathway connected with the granitoid, and, second, that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as defeated recovery.

I agreed to that opinion when handed down, but am now satisfied it is out of line with general principles of law declared over and over again by this court. My conclusion, by way of amends, is that my agreeing to that case can be best told in the dispatch sent his government by Sir Charles Napier (was it not?) when in India. Having been forbidden to take Scinde, he took it, and announced his action in one word: "Peccavi." I am sorry I agreed to it. There was no "state of nature" in the Ruppenthal Case. There was a public street, and the city had allowed the works of man to change the works of nature by marring the street and making it dangerous where foot travel was invited. The existence of that granitoid walk on a public street was an unmistakable invitation to foot travelers to use it. The existence of that pitfall at the end of that granitoid walk in the line of travel, ostensibly provided for footmen, was a defect in a public street, and the city, barring Ruppenthal's contributory negligence, was liable in damages for injuries received at that pitfall.

We will not follow the Ruppenthal Case, but will overrule it, except its holding on the question of contributory negligence.

We conclude it was error to give the instruction in the nature of a demurrer.

8. As the case must go back for another trial, it is well to pass on a ruling on evidence. There being an issue of street or no street, subsequent repairs made by the city are competent as tending to show that the city recognized the locus as a public street. Brennan v. St. Louis, 92 Mo., loc. cit. 488, 2 S. W. 481, and cases cited; Bailey v. Kansas City, 189 Mo., loc. cit. 510, 87 S. W. 1182; City of Jeffersonville v. McHenry, 22 Ind. App., loc. cit. 12, 53 N. E. 183; Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) § 865.

Having put in some evidence of prior repairs, plaintiff tendered evidence of subsequent repairs made in the August or September, after George was drowned in May. The court excluded the evidence, and committed error in doing so. The only justification offered for this ruling is that the repairs were too remote, but the remoteness merely affects the force of the evidence, not its competency. It was not so remote that it could be said as a matter of law to have no bearing at all.

Other rulings on the exclusion of testimony are either sufficiently covered by the opinion on the main propositions, or will not likely arise on a rehearing, and may therefore be put aside.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to be proceeded with in accordance with this opinion. All concur.

VAN PELT et al. v. PARRY.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1
March 31, 1909.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 108*)—SALE OF LAND—LAND DEDICATED TO SEAT OF JUSTICE.

Rev. St. 1855, c. 44, relating to the organization of counties, authorized, by section 6, the commissioners appointed to select a seat of justice for the court to purchase or receive a donation of land. Section 8 provided that the title to the land so acquired should vest in the county, and the place be the permanent seat of justice thereof. The act also provided that lots necessary for sites for county buildings should be reserved from sale. Chapter 45, relating to the removal of seats of justice, made it exceedingly difficult to remove county seats. Held that, though chapter 44 did not specifically provide for establishing a seat of justice upon lands owned by the county prior to the location, the power was assumed to exist, and where a county seat was located on swamp lands vested in the county by the state, and the land platted into town lots which were sold, the town became a permanent seat of justice, and a conveyance by the county of a tract of land, including the town site, as swamp land to a person with full notice, would not pass the unconveyed town lots, county buildings, streets, etc., of the county seat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—OFFICIAL ACTS—COUNTY OFFICERS.

As to ancient official acts of county officers, it will be presumed that they performed the duty imposed on them as the law contemplated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 104*)—ACQUIRING PROPERTY.

Where one holding land as an entryman conveyed it to a county for a county seat which was established, and it subsequently appeared that his entry was void because the land was swamp land and as such belonged to the county, and the county conveyed to him as purchaser of swamp land a tract embracing the county seat town, a subsequent deed by the purchaser to the county of the land previously conveyed by him to the county as entryman, excepting parcels which he had subsequently acquired, executed to take the place of his former deed which had been destroyed, was a confirmation of the appropriation to the public purpose of the land by his former deed, and in effect was an admission that it did not pass to him by the county's conveyance to him, unless in trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

4. DOWER (§ 12*)—ESTATES SUBJECT TO DOWER.

Where a person who, with full notice that swamp land had been permanently dedicated as a county seat, took a deed to it from the county, thus acquiring at most only a seisin to the use of the county, his widow was not entitled to dower therein, under Rev. St. 1859, §§ 2933, 2956 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 1690, 1704), giving a widow dower in real property of which he or anybody to his use was seised of an estate of inheritance during coverture with her, though he may not have been in actual possession, and though he may have held it as joint tenant, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 178*)—ANCIENT TRANSACTIONS.

In an action to establish interests in land, involving ancient transactions, the primary evidence of which has been lost, where secondary evidence is necessary to establish lost records, deed, plats, to reconstruct for judicial purposes facts and a situation dimmed by time, rules of evidence will be much relaxed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Hugh Dabbs, Judge.

Action by Charles Van Pelt and others, minors, by Charles Van Pelt, their guardian and curator, against Nancy C. Parry. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wright Bros. and Jas. T. Blair, for appellant. Cole, Burnett & Moore, for respondents.

LAMM, P. J. This suit was brought under section 650, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 687), to try, define, and adjudge title to a part of lot 3 in block 13 of the city of Lamar (original town), said part being 15 by 120 feet, set forth by metes and bounds. The petition alleges that Charles Van Pelt has a life estate under the will of Mary E. Van Pelt, deceased; that the two minors, Robert and Stanley, own the reversion, to wit, a fee simple subject to the life estate of Charles; and that the defendant, Nancy, claims an interest or estate in the premises adverse to plaintiffs, although without right or title to do so. By her amended answer Nancy denies the allegations in the petition, and states her claim to be that she was married to one Joseph C. Parry in 1862; that during the existence of that marriage Joseph was seised of a fee-simple estate in the land; that she had never released her right of dower; that Joseph died in 1902, and that she is entitled to dower as his widow. The cause went to the Jasper circuit court on change of venue. In that court plaintiffs filed an amended reply traversing the allegations of the answer; averring that the Joseph C. Parry mentioned therein was twice married; that his first wife was Josephine, who died prior to 1862; that in the month of December, 1856, he and his then wife, Josephine, executed a good and sufficient deed conveying all the right, title, and interest in and to said lot and other land to Barton county, Mo., as a "county site" and for county seat purposes; and that for 10 years and more immediately subsequent to the date of said deed, and at all times since said date, said county and its grantees, under whom plaintiffs hold, were in open, actual, adverse, exclusive, continuous, and notorious possession of the lot in controversy under a claim of ownership, and that said Joseph, after the execution of said deed, never had title or was seised or was in possession, or made any claim thereto. The issue being whether Nancy has dower in the locus, the court rendered judgment against her, and she appeals.

The case in some phases is singular. The original town of Lamar, the county seat of Barton county, is located on what the record calls the "Parry forty" and the "Peters ten," i. e., on 50 acres of land designated in that way. The lot in question is part of the "Parry forty," described as the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 30, township 32, range 30. In 1855 Barton county was established by an act of the Legislature, commissioners were named to locate its county seat, and the new county was added to the Thirteenth judicial circuit. Said commissioners were required to meet at "the dwelling house of George E. Ward." They met at the designated place and located the county seat, selecting the site as the Parry 40 and the Peters 10. Thereupon early in 1857 a town, named "Lamar," was surveyed and platted with streets, alleys, and a public square, all under the auspices of the county authorities in establishing a county seat—witness an order of the county court recorded in the recorder's office and fortunately preserved from the wreck of that period:

"It is ordered by the county court of Barton county that Allen Petty, the commissioner of county seat of Barton county, proceed to lay off said seat of justice, commencing with a square of 400 feet extent each way, with streets around said square of 80 feet width, crossing at right angles and extending through the whole extent of the town. Then to lay off blocks of 400 feet front and 160 feet back, and lay off said blocks into lots with 80 feet front and 160 feet back. Then proceed to lay off another tier of blocks similar in every respect to the former. The last-named tier of blocks to be separated from the first by alleys 14 feet width, running at right angles and extending through the whole length of the town. Then proceed to lay off another tier of blocks to be separated on the rear of said second tier by streets of 50 feet width, running at right angles through the whole extent of the said blocks to be divided into four lots each. Then proceed to lay off another tier of blocks similar in extent to said blocks to be separated from the next succeeding blocks by alleys 14 feet in width. Then proceed to lay off another tier of blocks similar in extent to be divided into two lots each, the last-named blocks to be separated from the next succeeding blocks by alleys 14 feet in width. Then proceed to lay off another tier of blocks similar in extent to be divided into two lots each, the last-named blocks to be separated on the rear by streets of 50 feet width, running at right angles and extending the whole length of the town. It is further ordered by said court that said commissioner advertise and sell said lots on the second day of February, A. D. 1857, and that he sell the same on a credit of twelve months, the purchaser giving bond with approved security. It is ordered that no front lot on the public square shall be sold for less than $25.00.

"I, Branch T. Morgan, clerk of the county court of Barton county, certify the above to be a true copy of an order passed by the county court of Barton county as the same remains among the records of said court. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto signed my name and affixed the seal of said court.

"Done at office this 1st day of January, 1857.

"[L. S.] Branch T. Morgan, Clerk."

Courts were presently opened and regularly held in Lamar until the Civil War, the official machinery of the new county was set running, and the county offices were located there.

It seems that Joseph C. Parry in December, 1856, met with said commissioners, and, being then the apparent owner of said 40 as entryman, joined with his then wife, Josephine, in a conveyance of it to Barton county for a seat of justice; that the deed purported to convey an indefeasible estate in fee simple absolute, and was put of record; and that, after the town was surveyed and the land platted, the county commenced selling lots, and a town grew up there before the Civil War. The record shows that Lamar was in the track of irregular marauding and warlike maneuvering on the border during that war, the county was harried by both sides, and the town was devastated. Many of its houses were burned, its inhabitants (save 200 or so) were scattered to the four winds, its temporary courthouse on a lot adjoining the locus and its permanent one built on the square went up in smoke and flame, and the records of the county were mutilated, lost, or destroyed through the vicissitudes of that war. The Parry deed has never been seen since the war. If recorded, the record perished. The same may be said of the official survey and plat of the town. However, some fragmentary records exist; for example, assessment lists and books for the years 1859-60-61. Some mutilated records have been deciphered and recorded, and were put in evidence. A few old citizens are spared who remember somewhat faintly these ancient transactions, and plaintiffs sought to supply the lost deed and record data as best they could by them. Of the company assembled at the home of George E. Ward when the commissioners met, located the county seat, and examined and accepted the deed from Parry, one is alive. The rest are dead. The survivor testified, in effect, that the deed was made by Joseph and his then wife, Josephine, and delivered. The assessment lists aforesaid show that in 1859-60-61, lots in Lamar were assessed by their platted number and proper block, and in the names of a great many owners, indicating that the records accessible to the then assessors showed deeds had been made and the lots had passed to purchasers, and that the town was a de facto town. An ancient map was put in evidence, shown to have been long used by county officers for taxing purposes, and by conveyancers and the business public generally, though not official. This map showed Lamar laid out with a public square, with named streets, lots, and blocks, in the form designated by the foregoing order of the county court, requiring it to be surveyed and platted, and this map has been universally accepted as accurate.

It seems, when the war ended, the former inhabitants of Lamar in part returned to their homes, and the town, taking on new life, has grown to be a flourishing city. It has been the county seat of Barton county ever since 1857.

Prior to making this deed, if it was made, Parry had in 1856 entered the whole northwest quarter of said section 30 on a land warrant. He never received a patent from the government. Some time after the war it was discovered that the tract was not subject to entry, and his entry was canceled by United States government officials, as in conflict with the act of Congress in 1850, relating to swamp lands; said northwest quarter being part of the swamp lands granted to the state of Missouri by that act. After the cancellation of Parry's entry which was in 1867, as we understand it, the record shows that he and the county court assumed to deal with said northwest quarter on the theory it was swamp land. Accordingly, in that year, on the theory he had paid to the county $1.25 per acre for said northwest quarter, Parry received a deed from Barton county and a patent from the state of Missouri to said northwest quarter, which deed and patent, under the general description of the land conveyed, included the entire original county seat, then for 10 years gone having a situs and a name as such county seat. We have no concern with any of the northwest quarter except the county seat land. If these conveyances are held valid and operative as to the Parry 40, ignoring everything done from 1857 to that date, then Joseph thereby became the owner of all the unconveyed lots and blocks in the platted town of Lamar, with its streets, alleys, its public square, and the courthouse and jail of Barton county, in a job lot (lock, stock, and barrel) at $1.25 per acre.

Some time after this he (then married to Nancy) executed the following deed, in which Nancy did not join:

"Whereas, I, Joseph C. Parry, did on the first day of December, 1856, convey to Barton county, state of Missouri, the following described real estate for a seat of justice for said county, to wit: The southwest quarter of the northwest quarter and the west half of the west half of the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 30, township 32, range 30, which said deed of conveyance was duly deposited in the recorder's office of said county on or about the 1st day of December, 1856, for record; and, whereas, said deed has since been lost or destroyed, together with the record thereof. Now, therefore, know all men by these presents, that I, Joseph C. Parry, in consideration of the premises and the sum of one dollar to me in hand paid, for the purpose of supplying the record of said deed, do by these presents remise, release and forever convey unto the county of Barton and state of Missouri, and to her assigns, the real estate above described. To have and to hold the same, with all the rights and privileges, immunities and appurtenances thereunto belonging unto said county of Barton, expressly excepting and reserving from this conveyance any and all town lots or parcels of real estate to which I may have acquired title since the execution of the deed first aforesaid by purchase from the seat of justice of said county or his assigns. Witness my hand and seal this 1st day of March, A. D. 1869.

"Revenue stamp 50 cents.

"Joseph C. Parry. [Seal.]"

From that date to his death, in 1902, Joseph C. Parry lived in and about Lamar, and at no time questioned the validity of his original conveyance as confirmed by the last one, or laid any claim whatever to any land within the limits of the original town of Lamar, except such as he afterwards acquired to certain lots through mesne conveyances from the county. The fact is that after the original location of the county seat in 1856 he never by act or word laid claim to the 40 acres platted as the town site of Lamar, other than by taking a deed from the county and a patent from the state in 1867, and by his said subsequent confirmatory deed back.

Defendant's right to dower, if any, is based on the proposition that she was married to Joseph in 1862; that he became seized, during coverture, of the whole northwest quarter of section 30, to wit, in 1867; that, coverture and seisin uniting, she became endowed; and that, not having released her dower and Joseph dying, she has an interest as dowress.

Plaintiffs deraign title through a conveyance from the county in 1869 to one W., and through him by mesne conveyances to their testator. They insist that the title, if any, acquired by Joseph in 1867 to the Parry 40 inured at once to the benefit of the county under its former grant from him in 1856 for county seat purposes. Moreover, they question the power of the county to convey to Joseph C. Parry the site of the county seat as swamp land in 1867. Further, they argue that there was no seisin in Joseph after his marriage to Nancy, hence she could not be endowed. And, finally, they say that, the land having been dedicated to public purposes by Joseph, that dedication discharged it of Nancy's dower.

In our opinion Nancy O. Parry is not entitled to dower in the Parry 40. This, because:

1. It is well to settle some things at the start. For example:

(a) As we grasp the position of respondent's counsel, they do not controvert the proposition that Parry, as original entryman on his land warrant, got no title legal or equitable; nor the proposition that his entry was properly canceled by the United States government. The doctrine of such cases as Prior v. Lambeth, 78 Mo. 538, therefore, has no application to the case at bar.

(b) Moreover, respondent's counsel by unmistakable inference concede that the legal title to the whole northwest quarter (barring lots theretofore sold), including, as of course, the Parry 40, was in the county of Barton in 1867. This concession renders it wholly unnecessary to consider the various United States statutes confirmatory of the prior well-known swamp land act of 1850 (Act Sept. 28, 1850, c. 84, 9 U. S. Stat. 519 et seq.), whereby the United States granted to the several states the swamp lands within their respective borders. Nor need we review the various acts of the General Assembly of Missouri in the 50's and 60's whereby title to swamp lands, granted to Missouri under the federal act of 1850, was vested absolutely in the various counties of Missouri within which they lie. The inquiring mind of the student of statutory law, curious to trace the evolution of swamp land enactments, may find them reviewed and discussed in many cases; for example, in Cramer v. Keller, 98 Mo. 279, 11 S. W. 734, and Simpson v. Stoddard County, 173 Mo. 421, 73 S. W. 700.

(c) No question is made on the form of the deed from Barton county to Parry in 1867. We need not, therefore, inquire whether it was properly executed by the proper official. The case proceeds on the theory that the title to swamp lands could pass (under ordinary circumstances) from the county by its deed to a purchaser, and that the county under the existing statutes could convey. Irregularities in such deeds seem largely obviated by a confirmatory and curative act. Laws 1868, p. 67; Barton Co. v. Walser, 47 Mo. 189.

(d) With the foregoing propositions at rest, we come to a main proposition which is of use as a postulate to reason from, viz.: It must be assumed for the purposes of the case that the question (once vexed) whether county courts in dealing with swamp lands dealt with them strictly in a trust capacity, with fixed limitations on their powers and under a trust which ran with the lands, is no longer an open one since the case of Simpson v. Stoddard Co., supra. That case was in banc. It was decided by a divided court, but it is the last authoritative utterance on the question in hand. It is there held that, under the acts of 1855 and 1857 and other acts of the General Assembly, the absolute title to swamp lands was vested in the respective counties, divested of all trusts, and the county court of such county was authorized to dispose of them as it might think conducive to the interests of said county. That case further held, in effect, that estoppel might be invoked against a county to prevent it from questioning its disposition of such lands, and the doctrines of ratification and laches might be applied in exceptional cases where facts warranted an application. We do not understand that case to say that a county can sell swamp land as such and divert the proceeds (if any) to anything but school fund purposes, and nothing we say here must be construed that way.

2. Assuming that Simpson v. Stoddard County announces good doctrine as summarized under paragraph "d" aforesaid, can that doctrine be applied to the facts in this case, and does it determine it? We think so. This, because: Barton county was organized under chapter 44, Rev. St. 1835, entitled "An act to provide for the organization of counties hereafter established." A close reading of that chapter shows that it does not specifically provide for establishing a "seat of justice" upon lands owned by the county in its own right prior to the location of its seat of justice, but we conclude such power is assumed to exist. By section 6 of that act the commissioners appointed "to select a seat of justice for such county" were authorized to purchase or receive a donation of such parcels of land and town lots, including the place selected as a seat of justice, for such county, as they may think proper, not exceeding 160 acres (if purchased), and not less than 50 acres in any case. By section 7 there is a provision safeguarding the county as to the title of the land deeded by the vendor or donor for a seat of justice. By section 8 it is ordained that "the title of the land so conveyed shall vest in such county, and the place selected shall be the permanent seat of justice thereof. By section 9 it is directed that if the land be purchased, then the county court shall order the purchase money to be paid out of the first proceeds of the sale of lots to be laid out on such lands. Section 11 directs that the county court appoint a competent person "as a commissioner of the seat of justice of such new county." Sections 13 and 14 provide a complete scheme for laying off a town at the place selected as the permanent seat of justice "into lots, squares, avenues, streets, lanes and alleys, in such manner and under such regulations" as the county court shall prescribe. Lots and squares of ground necessary to erect county buildings shall be reserved from sale by the county court, and the scheme contemplates that the residue of the lots shall be sold as lots and deeds made. By section 21 it is ordained that: "The money arising from the sale of lots, after paying all the expenses accruing in the selection of the seat of justice, in laying out the town and selling lots, shall be applied, first, to paying for the land purchased (if any) and the residue shall be set apart, as a specific fund, for the purpose of erecting county buildings, and shall be applied to no other purpose, until all the county buildings, required by law to be erected, shall be fully completed and paid for." Other sections of the act provide for setting up the machinery of the newly fledged county and putting its courts and offices in running order.

The next chapter of the Revised Statutes of 1855 (chapter 45) relates to the "Removal of Seats of Justice." We are not concerned with its provisions further than to point out that the idea of permanency is dominant, and that the statutes make it exceedingly difficult to remove county seats, and have safeguarded the subject-matter in many ways, the controlling thought being that when a seat of justice is once established it is established for all time, unless removed strictly according to written law.

All must agree that the law is related to reason. There are encomiums on the law to the effect that it is the perfection of reason. What reason could be given for the proposition that county seat commissioners, through the acquiescence of the county court or its ratification, could not locate a seat of justice and lay out a town upon land that already belonged to the county? Observe, that when, under the statute, land was donated or purchased the sole effect of that donation or purchase was to invest the county with title. Here the county already had land and title, i. e., all it needed for a seat of justice. Keeping that fact well in mind, we conclude that a statute which authorizes land to be bought or begged by way of gift, for a seat of justice, must be held, in reason, to assume by way of necessary implication that, if there is no necessity of buying or acquiring land as a gift (as in this case), the seat of justice may be rightly located on land it already owns. Otherwise, we would come to the most lame and impotent conclusion that a county must buy or beg when it had the wherewithal ready at hand to avoid doing either. No individual in his sober senses, moving on right lines, would act that way, and we shall not presume that the statutes of this state intended a county should act otherwise than with common sense.

It matters little either to law or justice that the commissioners in 1856 may have believed, and that the county court of Barton county then may have been of the opinion, that the Parry 40 was not swamp land, and that the county got title through Parry's original deed in 1856. The thing done is the substance and heart of the matter, not what was believed, and the thing done in this instance was to locate a county seat upon the county's own land in 1856. To these ancient official acts the presumption is applied that officials charged with a duty performed that duty by tracking the law and doing what the law either commanded or contemplated they should do. (See authorities cited by respondent's counsel.)

Here, then was a permanent appropriation and disposition of the land for the purpose of establishing a permanent seat of justice, and that visible, actual, palpable appropriation for that important public purpose, coupled with acts in pais in platting the land into lots and blocks, streets, alleys, lanes, avenues, public squares, etc., and dealing with the property by making sales of lots to build up a county town, made Lamar a permanent seat of justice to all intents and purposes, and effectually for all time took the Parry 40 out of the salable list of swamp lands as such. It was no longer swamp land, but land appropriated for county seat ends, i. e., county seat land. Barton county, having irrevocably devoted it to county seat purposes, could not turn about in after years and trade or sell it as mere swamp land to a purchaser having full notice that it had been devoted to a seat of justice and that such purpose was alive, on foot, and being carried out. Its power to deal with it as swamp land was functus officio, we think. Parry's deed of confirmation in 1869, in legal effect, is a solemn recognition by him of a prior, subsisting, irrevocable, and dominant appropriation of the land and its proceeds to a public purpose distinct from swamp land and swamp land funds. In legal effect, it is equivalent to his admission that the fee-simple estate did not pass by the 1867 conveyances to him as to the Parry 40, and that he was merely seised to the use of the county in a trust relation, if at all.

If Parry did not have title, and if his deed in 1856 was not operative to convey title, yet that deed was good for something. It, at least, showed his participation in the establishment of the seat of justice—a participation also shown allunde. It at least contributed any rights he thought he had as entryman to the establishment of the seat of justice, and removed any then apparent cloud from the title. His deed of confirmation in 1869 tends to the same end, and in terms related back to his former deed. Crowder v. Searcy, 103 Mo. 97, 15 S. W. 346; Brawford v. Wolfe, 103 Mo., loc. cit. 399 et seq., 15 S. W. 426.

We conclude that Joseph O. Parry (taking with full notice, as he did), if seised at all under his swamp land deed and patent of 1867, was seised to the use of Barton county under the aforesaid permanent appropriation of the Parry 40 made 10 years before; and that such seisin, if any, could not support dower under sections 2933 and 2956, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 1690, 1704), because he was not seised of an "estate of inheritance" during coverture with Nancy, as required by those sections.

It is insisted that, the land having been dedicated to public use, Parry's wife could not be endowed under the doctrine of the Venable Case, 112 Mo. 103, 20 S. W. 493, 18 L. R. A. 68; the Chouteau Case, 122 Mo. 375, 22 S. W. 458, 30 S. W. 299; the Baker Case, 122 Mo. 396, 30 S. W. 301; the Chrisman Case, 202 Mo. 606, 100 S. W. 1090, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1205, 119 Am. St. Rep. 822. See, also, Benton v. City of St. Louis (just decided, and not yet officially reported) 118 S. W. 418. The doctrine of those cases might well apply to the public square and the streets and alleys and the jail lot, etc., but we need not inquire whether it would apply to the lots and blocks in Lamar. That question is reserved.

3. In their briefs counsel discuss interesting questions on the legal effect of the narrations in Parry's deed of 1869; for instance, whether his wife, Nancy, is bound by the narration made in that deed to the effect that a former deed was executed by him in 1856 for county seat purposes which had been lost or destroyed. Further, whether, assuming his 1856 deed was a warranty, the title acquired under the patent from the state and county deed of 1867 inured to the benefit of the county under the 1856 deed. In the view we take of the case, such questions are somewhat afield, the case being disposed of on other grounds.

Counsel discuss with force and acumen many questions relating to the admissibility of evidence. As to those it may be said that the situation and transactions developed at the trial by the oral evidence and fragmentary records introduced were ancient ones. The primary evidence being lost, secondary evidence was allowed to establish lost records, deeds, surveys, plats, and to reconstruct for judicial purposes facts and a situation dimmed by time. It is a commonplace of the law that the rules of evidence are much relaxed under such conditions. We shall not incur the opinion by citing authorities to the point. They will be found in the briefs of counsel. We have examined the assignments of error in this regard, and find none materially affecting the merits of the case. It was well tried.

This court has been liberal in allowing dower. Chrisman v. Linderman, 202 Mo. 606, 100 S. W. 1090, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1205, 119 Am. St. Rep. 822, and cases cited. It has never stood on dry and lifeless technicalities in endowing widows; but we can find no substantial merit in Mrs. Parry's claim for dower in the lot in question. Accordingly, the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered. All concur.

MORRIS v. PARRY.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
March 31, 1909.)

LOST INSTRUMENTS (§ 3*)—ESTABLISHMENT—EQUITY.

Equity will not establish a lost or destroyed deed as a link in a chain of title, where, if established, it would convey no estate, but merely tend to show that the grantor thereby removed an apparent claim he had as entryman on the land, which entry was afterwards canceled by the United States government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lost Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bates County; Chas. E. Denton, Judge.

Bill by Joseph Morris against Nancy C. Parry. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Timmonds, for appellant. Wright Bros. and Jas. T. Blair, for respondent.

LAMM, P. J. Whatever may be the legal conclusions pleaded and in the coloring matter injected into the bill, this is clearly a suit in equity to establish a lost or destroyed deed, and nothing more. Brought in Barton county, it went to the Bates circuit court on defendant's application for a change of venue. There it was tried as in equity, and the chancellor took time to consider. The final disposition, final, is shown by an excerpt from the judgment, viz.: "The court doth therefore order and adjudge that the plaintiff take nothing by his bill, and that the defendant have and recover of the plaintiff her costs here laid out and expended, and have execution therefor." From that judgment plaintiff appeals.

In view of the disposition to be made of the case, the petition and answer are useful to understand the subject-matter of the litigation.

The petition follows:

"Action to Establish Deed.

"Plaintiff, Joseph Morris, respectfully represents to the court that he is the owner and in possession of the following described real estate, situate in the county of Barton, and state of Missouri, to wit: Ten (10) feet off of the east end of sixty (60) feet off of the south end of lot one (1), in block twelve (12), of the original town, now city, of Lamar, Mo.

"That on or about the 1st day of December, 1856, one Joseph C. Parry, now deceased, by deed of conveyance containing covenants of warranty in the ordinary form, conveyed to Barton county, Mo., for county seat purposes of said county, the following described real estate, situate in said county, to wit: The southwest quarter (¼) of the northwest quarter (¼), and the west half (½) of the west half (½) of the southeast quarter (¼) of the northwest quarter (¼), of section thirty (30), township thirty-two (32), of range thirty (30), consisting of 50 acres.

"That the tract of land above described, and by said Joseph C. Parry conveyed to Barton county by said deed of conveyance containing covenants of warranty as aforesaid, was, on the — day of —, 1867, duly selected as the permanent county seat, and the town of Lamar was duly laid off on said tract of land into lots, blocks, squares, streets, and alleys, and a plat of said town was duly made and approved.

"That the parcel of land above described as belonging to this plaintiff is a part of the land so conveyed by said Joseph C. Parry and platted as aforesaid, upon which the town of Lamar was duly laid off.

"That, on the — day of December, 1856, the said deed of conveyance from said Joseph C. Parry was filed for record and duly recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of said county, and then became an important link in the chain of conveyances, and a part of the record title of said tract of land from which said county seat had been located as aforesaid, and the town lots platted thereupon, and became, and was, and now is, one of the evidences of plaintiff's title to the premises first above described.

"That, at the time of the execution of the said deed by the said Joseph C. Parry, his then wife, Josephine Parry, joined with him in said deed, and, in due form of law, released the dower interest therein. That since said date said Josephine Parry departed this life.

"That, during and by reason of the late War of Rebellion, said deed of conveyance from said Joseph C. Parry and his then wife, Josephine Parry, and also the record thereof, together with the plat of said town and the record thereof, as well as nearly all the public records of said county, were lost or destroyed by the ravages of war, and the destruction of the public courthouse, in which said records were kept, the contents thereof being destroyed by fire.

"That, long subsequent to the execution, delivery, and recording of said deed of conveyance from the said Joseph C. Parry, and the loss and destruction of the same, and the records thereof, the said Joseph C. Parry married the defendant, Nancy C. Parry, and she is the surviving wife of the said Joseph C. Parry.

"That after the destruction of said deed, and the records thereof, and the marriage of said Joseph C. Parry to the defendant, Nancy C. Parry, he (the said Joseph C. Parry) made, executed, and delivered a deed, conveying all his right, title, and interest in and to said real estate so conveyed to Barton county for county seat purposes, to wit, on the — day of —, 18—, but the said Nancy C. Parry failed to join in said last-named conveyance.

"That, by reason of the loss and destruction of said first deed, and the record thereof, plaintiff's record title to the parcel of land first above described, as well as the record title to all the town lots located on the said 50-acre tract of land above described, and so conveyed by said Joseph C. Parry and his then wife, Josephine Parry, to Barton county for county seat purposes, is defective, and, by reason of said defect, the defendant, Nancy C. Parry, now wrongfully seeks to take advantage of plaintiff, and all others owning town lots located as aforesaid, and wrongfully asserts that she has dower interest in all of said lands, including the parcel owned by this plaintiff as aforesaid, and the said wrongful assertion of said interest by the defendant, Nancy C. Parry, coupled with the fact that said deed, and the record thereof, was executed by the said Joseph C. Parry and his then wife, Josephine Parry, to Barton county, Mo., has created a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, to his great injury and detriment; that the establishment of said deed so made by Joseph C. Parry and his then wife, Josephine Parry, will remove such cloud and prove by the records a clear and merchantable record title to said tract of land so owned and in his possession at this time.

"Wherefore, the plaintiff prays the court to hear and make record of such evidence as plaintiff may produce touching or concerning his interest in and to the parcel of land aforesaid, and that, upon the final hearing of this petition, a decree be made and entered of record, establishing such first deed of conveyance from Joseph C. Parry and his then wife, Josephine C. Parry, to Barton county, and that the plaintiff be adjudged and seised of an estate in fee simple in and to the tract of land as above described, and that this defendant be forever barred from setting up any claim or interest in and to said real estate, and that plaintiff's actual title, whether record or otherwise, be fully and completely established, and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet, just, and proper."

The trial answer follows:

"Now comes the defendant in the above-entitled cause, and, first having obtained leave of court, for her second amended answer to the petition of the plaintiff herein, denies each and every allegation therein contained, except such as are hereinafter admitted.

"And, further answering, defendant admits: That defendant and Joseph C. Parry intermarried with each other on the — day of —, 1862, and that said Joseph C. Parry died on the 21st day of July, 1902; that she never at any time, with her husband or otherwise, executed a deed to the 10-foot strip of land mentioned in the petition; that she asserts that she has dower in the parcel of land described in the petition, but denies that said assertion and claim are or were wrongfully made.

"And defendant, further answering, avers and says that plaintiff has a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law; and, further, defendant says that there is now pending in this court a suit wherein the defendant in this suit is plaintiff and the plaintiff in this suit is defendant, and wherein the existence of the pretended deed mentioned in plaintiff's petition herein is put in issue, and wherein the defendant here is suing for her dower; and defendant states that said suit was pending before the institution of this suit by plaintiff.

"And, further answering, defendant says that plaintiff and his grantors have been guilty of laches in the institution of this suit, by reason of delaying their action for 35 years; that by reason of said delay defendant will be greatly prejudiced if plaintiff's suit is entertained by this court."

The trial took substantially the same course as that of Van Pelt et al. v. Parry (just decided by this division, and not yet officially reported) 118 S. W. 425, and the record here is substantially the same as there, mutatis mutandis.

The lost deed sought to be re-established in this suit is the identical one from Joseph C. Parry and Josephine, his then wife, dated in December, 1856, held in judgment in the Van Pelt Case. In the case at bar, as in that, defendant relied on the same patent from the state in 1867, and deed from Barton county in the same year purporting to convey to Joseph C. Parry the land theretofore appropriated and devoted by Barton county to county seat purposes. She claims dower under those conveyances on the theory that her husband, Joseph, became thereby seised of an estate of inheritance. The facts relating to the appropriation of that land in 1856 and 1857 to county seat purposes being substantially the same on this record as disclosed in that, that case must control this, and this should be read with that. We held there, in effect, that Parry's 1856 deed (lost or found) conveyed no legal or equitable title. We held, furthermore, that Barton county owned the land, and that, having permanently appropriated it for county seat purposes, it, by that appropriation, ceased to be swamp land, and that Parry's subsequent patent from the state, and deed from the county in 1867 purporting to convey it to him as swamp land, vested no estate of inheritance in him on which Nancy C. Parry could be endowed, but that Joseph, if seised at all under those deeds, was seised merely to the use of Barton county. In this case plaintiff holds under a deed from Barton county to Charles R. Logan and Nathan Bray in 1869 and mesne conveyances.

We cannot see how the establishment of the lost deed in any way affects plaintiff's title. At most, that deed would merely tend to show that Parry participated in the locating of the county seat by removing an apparent claim he had as entryman, which entry was afterwards canceled by the United States government. When established, the deed would be no muniment of title, and in point of law it conveyed no estate. What reasons may have influenced the chancellor below to dismiss the bill, we need not consider, but under the ruling in the Van Pelt Case the result reached was right; for equity does not require useless things to be done, and ought not to do them.

This view makes assignments of error on rulings on the admission and exclusion of evidence merely academic, and the case itself a moot case. It is disclosed by the record that there is a suit pending between the present parties for the assignment of dower to Nancy in the locus. That suit, when disposed of as ruled in the Van Pelt Case, will settle the rights of the parties in the subject-matter of this litigation, if the record is the same as this on the merits.

Let the judgment be affirmed. All concur.

COLLINS et al. v. HARRELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. July 8, 1908.)

1. JURY (§ 14*)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY—EQUITABLE ISSUES.

Where an interplea and answer in partition stated a cause of action for specific performance, a jury trial was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*) — CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE — PAROL CONTRACT — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a court of equity is called upon to establish and enforce a parol contract to convey real estate, the proof of the contract must be clear and convincing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 392-395; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 28*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—CERTAINTY—NECESSITY.

A contract must be definite and specific in order to be specifically enforced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 28*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—CERTAINTY.

A statement that, if a child would stay with the party making it, he would see that she had plenty, give her clothing and educate her, and her assent thereto, falls far short of such a promise to convey to her a particular tract of land as can be specifically enforced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 62, 64; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1009*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—FINDINGS OF CHANCELLOR.

Though in an equity case the Supreme Court may examine and weigh the evidence, it will defer largely to the judgment of the chancellor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3970; Dec. Dig. § 1009.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 64*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE.

A statement, in a general conversation, that the party making it had made up his mind to give a child a particular tract of land if she would stay with him, does not amount to a contract to convey, capable of being specifically enforced, but is no more than a declaration of an intention subject to change or abandonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 195; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 313*)—DECLARATIONS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Evidence of declarations of a decedent, though admissible, does not amount to direct proof of the facts claimed to have been admitted by the declarations, and, when unsupported by other evidence, is entitled to but little weight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1166, 1167; Dec. Dig. § 313.*]

8. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 42*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—ORAL CONTRACT—PART PERFORMANCE.

Part performance of a parol contract to convey real estate must be unequivocal and referable alone to the contract to warrant specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 124; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

9. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action to compel specific performance of an alleged parol contract by a decedent to convey to a child a particular farm if she would stay with him, held not to establish the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 392; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

10. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action to compel specific performance of an alleged parol contract by a decedent to convey real estate, held to show that decedent only contemplated deeding the real estate in question to plaintiff as a voluntary gift, prompted by affection for her, and not because of any contract obligating him to do so.

Woodson, J., dissenting.

In Banc. Appeal from Circuit Court, Schuyler County; Nat. M. Shelton, Judge.

Action by Thomas F. Collins and another against Iowa Harrell and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry C. Taylor and C. C. Fogle, for appellants. Payne & Sowers and Higbee & Mills, for respondents.

GANTT, J. This is a suit to partition 152 acres of land in Schuyler county and 80 acres of land in Macon county, Mo. The suit was brought in Schuyler county circuit court. The plaintiffs and the defendants are the collateral kindred of Caleb Collins, who died intestate without widow or issue, in Davis county, Iowa, on August 11, 1905, in which last-mentioned county he owned at the time of his death about 500 acres of land. At the trial the defendants Albert Collins, Ira Collins, James Collins, Edward Collins, and Sarah Gibson filed a joint answer disclaiming any interest in the land in suit. Iowa Harrell, a minor, on motion of her guardian, was made a defendant and filed a separate answer claiming title to the 152 acres of land in Schuyler county, and known in the record as the "Queen City farm," by virtue of an alleged oral contract entered into by and between her and Caleb Collins in his lifetime in the summer of 1898, when she was less than nine years old, to the effect that if she, the said defendant, would live with him, the said Caleb Collins, stay with him, and comfort him until his death, he would give, transfer, and convey to her all of the said Schuyler county land above described in consideration therefor; that she accepted said proposition on the part of Caleb Collins and contracted and agreed with the said Caleb Collins to live with him, to stay with him, and comfort him until his death, and, in pursuance of said agreement, she did live with him and stay and comfort the said Caleb Collins from the time the said agreement was entered into until his death, and fully performed the said agreement on her part; that the said Caleb Collins died August 11, 1905, by reason of which said contract and the performance thereof by the defendant the said real estate situated in Schuyler county, Mo., was owned absolutely by this defendant; that the said Caleb Collins failed and neglected to keep his part of said contract prior to his death, and failed to convey, transfer, or deed said land to this defendant; and that the plaintiffs herein and the other defendants have no interest in said land. Wherefore she prayed the court for a decree declaring her to be the absolute owner of said real estate and to divest all the title and interest of the plaintiffs and the other defendants in and to said tract of land in Schuyler county, Mo. Thomas R. Hollingsworth, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, prayed the court to strictly protect his interest. The plaintiffs, in reply to the answer of Iowa Harrell, denied all of the allegations therein, and for further reply stated that the alleged pretended promise and contract of the said Caleb Collins pleaded in said defendant's answer to give, transfer, and convey the said land to the said defendant, if ever made, was not in writing, signed by Caleb Collins.

The case was tried at the November term, 1905, without the intervention of a jury, though the defendant and interpleader, Iowa Harrell, demanded a jury. As her interplea and answer stated a cause in equity for the specific performance of an alleged contract, the issue was not triable before a jury, and the court properly refused a jury. To sustain her claim to the land in question, the defendant introduced her mother, Mrs.

Maggie Harrell, who testified that she was 46 years old, and that the defendant Iowa was her only child. The witness was married in March, 1878. Iowa Harrell was born in 1889. Caleb Collins married the sister of the witness, and the witness lived with Mr. and Mrs. Collins until witness was married in 1878. Dr. Harrell died in 1890. After the death of her husband, the witness and the defendant Iowa went to the home of the deceased, Caleb Collins, where they continued to reside as members of the family until the death of Mrs. Collins in 1898, save and except a portion of that time witness was away settling up her husband's business. In April, 1902, after Mrs. Collins' death, the witness bought a small hotel at Leroy, Kan., took her goods and moved there, taking the defendant Iowa with her for the purpose of giving her a better education and getting her into better society. Witness was for a time a stenographer in a lawyer's office, but her health failed, and she and her daughter returned to the Collins' home in Iowa, where they made their home until the latter's death in 1905. During all of this period Caleb Collins gave them a home, clothed and gave them half of the produce, and cared for them and sent Iowa to school and paid their medical bills. Caleb Collins became greatly attached to Iowa, and on frequent occasions remarked that he intended doing something for her, and on several occasions stated that he intended to give her the Queen City farm. Mrs. Collins died August 24, 1898, and it was on this day that the alleged contract upon which defendant claims the land in suit was entered into. At that time she was less than nine years old. From that day until Caleb Collins' death, some seven years later, Mrs. Harrell made her home with him, except the short time she resided in Kansas. She could recall but four conversations with him wherein he mentioned giving Iowa the Queen City farm. The first of these conversations occurred on the day of her sister's funeral in the yard of Mr. Collins' residence. She and her brother Zeke and his wife and Caleb Collins were standing in the yard talking. Iowa was playing with her cousins. Thereupon the witness, Mrs. Harrell, said to Iowa, "We will get our things and go home with brother Zeke and make our home." Mr. Collins said, "No." Iowa was in the yard, and he went up to her and said, "You are not going to leave me now in my bereavement and leave me here alone," and he began to cry, and the little girl sympathized with him. She ran to him and put her hands in his hands, and he said: "No, Iowa, stay with me, and I will school and educate you and give you all your clothes. You live with me, and I will see that you have plenty." And then Iowa put her hands in his and said, "I am going to stay with Uncle," and then the two went off in the house together. On cross-examination she gave this version of that conversation, speaking of Mr. Collins: "Cale said: 'You are not going to leave me now when I am in so much trouble. She is all I have got.'" On redirect examination she stated it in this way, "Cale said, if Babe stayed with him until he died, he had made up his mind to give her the Queen City farm."

Mrs. Ezekiel Dooley, the wife of Mrs. Harrell's brother, detailed this conversation in this way: "I remember Mr. Collins came up and said to her, she was not going to leave him, and commenced to cry. The little girl went up to him and took him by the hands, and he said: 'Babe, you are not going to leave me? You are all I have got now.' He talked on, and said, if she would stay, he would always see that she had a home, and he would school her. That is about all." The second conversation occurred about six months later. She stated that he went on doing for her. She stayed there with him, and he said that he had made up his mind to give her the Queen City farm; that she was to stay with him and take care of him until the last, or as long as he lived. On cross-examination, she restated it in these words: "Cale said 'I have made up my mind to give Babe the Queen City farm.' We were talking about the home place that we lived on in Iowa, and the two farms that he owned, and he said he had concluded to give her the Queen City farm. He thought it would be better, on account of the wood being there, than the one we lived on." The following question was propounded to the witness: "Q. Now what, if any, condition did he couple with giving her the Queen City farm? What did he say she would have to do after that? A. She would have to stay with him as long as he lived." When asked what Iowa said, she answered: "She said she would do it. She never gave a word of inclination that she wanted to leave him." The next conversation occurred on one occasion when Ezekiel Dooley was visiting at Mr. Collins'. It was during the World's Fair at St. Louis. Zeke's daughter was with him. This conversation was in the presence of the witness Mrs. Harrell, Iowa, and Ezekiel. She said: "Iowa wanted to go to school in St. Louis and stay with Ezekiel. Cale said to her, 'You know you agreed to stay with me if I would give you the Queen City farm,' and Iowa said, 'Yes,' and told him she wanted to go, but she would stay with him for that." On cross-examination she stated this conversation thus: "Zeke was in the east room with Cale, and witness went in to listen. Cale said to Iowa: 'Babe, I cannot do without you. Stay with me and go to school at Stiles another year. You know you promised to stay with me if I would give you the Queen City farm.' And she said, 'Yes.' Q. Cale said: 'I cannot do without you, Babe. I promised to give you the he heard Caleb talk about the Queen City farm. Collins said to him: "Jim, I want to see Sam Carruthers to see about making a deed. I told them I promised Iowa the Queen City farm, and I want to make a deed to it so that they cannot beat her out of it." This conversation occurred in February, 1903. He spoke about building a house on this land, wanted to fix it up for Iowa. On cross-examination this witness stated that he also had a suit then pending in the district court of Davis county, Iowa, in which he claimed that Caleb Collins had made him an oral gift of a farm of 172 acres to him, known as the "Savannah farm," and that he expected on the trial of that case to have Mrs. Maggie Harrell and Iowa Harrell as witnesses for him.

John W. Cooksey testified that Caleb Collins said to him in 1904: "I am going to fix her so she won't have to work when I am gone." That he was going to deed her the Queen City farm.

Mrs. Stella Dooley testified that she was Zeke Dooley's wife, and that she heard Caleb Collins say he was going to give Iowa this Queen City farm and fix up a house on it for her. "Q. Did he say how he was going to give it to her. A. No, sir. Q. Did he say anything about deeding it to her. A. No, sir." She also testified to the conversation in the yard on the day of Mrs. Collins' funeral. She heard him say to Iowa, she was not going to leave him, and commenced crying, and he talked on and said, if she would stay, he would always see that she had a home, and he would school her. That was about all. He did not say he had given her the farm, but said he was going to do it. Iowa was not present at this conversation.

D. B. Burchette testified that he lived at Bloomfield, Iowa, and had been sheriff four years. Knew Mr. Collins in his lifetime, and was intimate with him. Had a talk with him about the Queen City farm. He talked about this young lady. Said she was the sweetest child he ever knew. She could not be any closer to him if he had been her father. He was proud of her. Said she had a lady's head on her shoulders, and he was going to school her and make a lady of her so that anybody would be proud of her. When she was in Kansas, he spoke of going out there to make his home with them. "I was at his house, and he spoke of a couple of land buyers having come from Missouri to buy the Queen City farm, and said he thought it would make Iowa more money for him to sell that farm and invest it in Iowa lands, but he said, 'Recently Missouri land is enhancing in value, and I am not sure but that it will come up to ours here.'" He went to see Mr. Collins twice while he was sick. The first time he just dropped in, and Mr. Collins said: "I knew Bern would run in here. I knew he would come to see me." He was rather emotional, and tears ran down from his eyes. "He made me promise to come back. I went back, and I took him some wine. I think I took a bottle of Old Quaker liquor. At the request of one of the Collinses, I asked him if his business was in the condition in which he wished it to be. One of them asked me to do this, said I could do it better than anyone else, so I said to Mr. Collins: 'Cale, we do not think you are going to die, or anything worse is going to happen, but we cannot always tell what might occur, and the boys wanted me to ask you if your business was in the condition in which you desired it to be.' And he said: 'No, it is not. I want to make a deed to Iowa to a piece of land, and I want to make a will.' He said he had told Sam Carruthers what he wanted to have him make, and he wanted to have him make a will the next time he came out. I think he said he had written him. I won't be sure he had written him in regard to it, or whether he told me he told him about it. I told him 'I am going right to Bloomfield and will send Carruthers right down if you say so,' and he said: 'I am too weak, sick, and nervous to-day. If he was here, I do not know as I could sign my own name. I am awfully weak. But hold yourself in readiness so if I don't get any better—Ira told me I would be much better to-morrow. If I do not, I will phone you to have Carruthers come down.'" The witness told him he would deliver the message. The next time he heard from him he was dead. It was Jim Collins who requested him to see Caleb Collins in regard to fixing his estate.

On the part of plaintiffs, the evidence tended to show that in a suit for the partition of the lands of Caleb Collins in the district court of Davis county, Iowa, among his heirs at law, the witness James Collins had pleaded that he was the owner of and entitled to a tract of the said lands, amounting to 172 acres, by reason of a sale of said tract to him by Caleb Collins for services rendered said Caleb Collins by said James Collins, and that said Caleb Collins had not conveyed the same to him, and he prayed for a decree of specific performance thereof, which cause was then pending in said court. Plaintiffs also offered in evidence the record of a suit by Ezekiel Dooley v. Caleb Collins to quiet the title to certain lands as against a certain mortgage executed by Obadiah Dooley to Caleb Collins and a decree accordingly. Hybarger, a witness for plaintiffs, testified: That he was in the real estate business in Centerville, Iowa, and had been since 1893. That in 1902 he accompanied W. A. Burkhardt and E. A. Duckworth to the residence of Caleb Collins. That he and Duckworth went into the house, and witness inquired of Caleb Collins if the Queen City farm was for sale, and his price. Collins said he had not put it on the market; that if he was going to sell his price would be $30 or $35 an acre. Witness thought price too high, and told Collins he had better consider it, that maybe the money would pay him more than the farm. Defendant Iowa and her mother were present. Mrs. Harrell said he had better sell. The farm had never brought more than enough to pay the taxes and repairs. Collins said he did not care to sell then, but she urged him, and he said, "I didn't know but that I would want to give it to Babe and you some time for a home." Mrs. Harrell said she did not want it if she had to live on it as a home. Burkhart was not in the house during this visit. J. W. Cooksey, being recalled, testified that he had filed a claim of $1,200 against estate of Caleb Collins, covering a period for 1891 to 1905, inclusive, for work and labor done, and the same was then pending. There was other evidence to the effect that, after the death of Caleb Collins, Mrs. Harrell only claimed two cows and a calf and a mare as belonging to Iowa. Also, evidence that Mrs. Harrell had stated to different witnesses that, if Caleb had not left a will, she and Iowa would get nothing. Also, that Mrs. Harrell had told Le Grand he ought to buy the Queen City farm, that Mr. Collins was not able to look after it, and could loan his money to better advantage.

As already seen, this is a bill in equity on the part of Iowa Harrell to enforce the specific performance of a verbal agreement on the part of Caleb Collins in his lifetime to convey the 152 acres of land, specifically described in her interplea and answer, and lying in Schuyler county, and known in the record as the "Queen City farm," to said Iowa Harrell. The circuit court denied the relief prayed for in said interplea and answer, and defendant, Iowa Harrell has appealed to this court. Caleb Collins was nearly 80 years old at the time of his death in 1905. He had no children. His wife died in 1898. Mrs. Maggie Harrell was a sister of Caleb Collins' wife. Mrs. Harrell had one child, Iowa Harrell, the defendant. Dr. Harrell, the father of Iowa, died in 1890. Prior to her marriage in 1878 to Dr. Harrell, Mrs. Maggie Harrell lived in the family of Caleb Collins, as a member thereof. After her husband's death, Mrs. Maggie Harrell and her child, Iowa, again became members of the family of Caleb Collins and were living with him when his wife died. Caleb Collins had been and was a successful business man. He had become the owner of three or four farms in Davis county, Iowa, aggregating about 500 acres, and two farms in Missouri, of which the Queen City farm in Schuyler county was one. He was a man of considerable education. Had taught school and been a merchant in his younger days. He seemed to have been a man of note and influence in his neighborhood. He maintained his mental vigor up to his death. He seemed to have been a generous man and was very fond of defendant Iowa, who had lived with him from the time she was 9 years old until she was about 16 at the time of his death. During all the time, beginning with the death of Dr. Harrell up to the death of Caleb Collins, except the few months Mrs. Harrell and Iowa lived at Leroy, Kan., Caleb Collins furnished Mrs. Harrell and Iowa a home, free of charge, clothed them, and paid their medical bills, sent Iowa to school, and gave Mrs. Harrell for her pin money one-half the eggs, chickens, etc. They seemed to have entertained a strong affection for him, and he became greatly attached to Iowa. He always expressed interest in her welfare, and there can be little doubt that he not only purposed to make a provision for her out of his property, but repeatedly announced his intention to do so.

With this preliminary statement of the relations existing between Caleb Collins and Iowa Harrell prior to August 24, 1898, the date of the funeral of the wife of Caleb Collins, we come to the averments of the interplea or equitable answer of defendant Iowa in this case, to wit, "That shortly after the death of the said Caleb Collins' wife, the said Caleb Collins contracted and agreed with this defendant that if this defendant would live with him, stay with him, and comfort him until his death, he would give her all of the Schuyler county land above described in consideration therefor." That this defendant accepted said proposition and agreed to live with him, stay with him, and comfort him until his death, and in pursuance of said agreement she did live, and stay with him, and comfort him until his death, and fully performed her part of said contract, but that said Caleb Collins failed and neglected to keep his part of said contract prior to his death and failed to convey the same to her. The time when this alleged specific arrangement was made is fixed in the testimony as the day of the funeral of Mrs. Collins, and the promise made that day by Caleb Collins to Iowa is the one upon the faith of which Mrs. Harrell abandoned her expressed intention of taking her things, leaving the house of Caleb Collins, and making her home with her brother Ezekiel Dooley, and it was on this occasion that the testimony on the part of Iowa tends to establish her acceptance of Caleb Collins' proposition, for it is then that she put her hand in his and said, "I am going to stay with Uncle," and went into the house with him, and thereupon Mrs. Harrell abandoned her intention of making her home with her brother.

Now the testimony as to the promise of Caleb Collins is variously stated, as follows: "He (Caleb) said: 'You are not going to leave me now in my bereavement and leave me here alone. No, Iowa, stay with me, and I will school you and educate you and give you all your clothes. You live with me, and I will see that you have plenty.' And to this she replied, 'I am going to stay with Uncle.'" It is too plain for discussion that, if this were all the testimony, it utterly failed to sustain the averments of the answer as to an agreement to convey this specific real estate. There was no reference by either party to the land which the defendant claims she was to have conveyed to her upon her staying with him, as long as he lived. Mrs. Ezekiel Dooley in her testimony gave this conversation in practically the same words. She says that Caleb Collins said: "If she would stay, he would always see that she had a home. He would school her. That is about all." Ezekiel Dooley was present, but he did not testify to this contract alleged to have been made that day. It is significant that, after Mrs. Harrell had been examined and cross-examined and re-examined, until her testimony covered 45 printed pages, she had never stated that Caleb Collins had mentioned this real estate. Finally, counsel for defendant Iowa again re-examined her, and requested her to repeat again the conversation that took place up at the house immediately after the death of Mrs. Collins. Up to that time she had invariably stated the alleged agreement was made in the yard. She had been asked again and again to state the place, time, and substance of each conversation she had or had heard in which Caleb Collins referred to this matter, and had never mentioned a conversation in the house, and she stated that: "After we were in the house, we were talking in the south room, and he said he had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm. Counsel: That is not what I want. What else did he say, if anything? A. If she stayed with him, he would give her the Queen City farm. Q. How long did he say for her to stay? Ans. Until the last—until he died." On her previous examinations, she had been pressed by counsel for plaintiffs to state anything else that Caleb had said, and she had repeatedly testified that she had stated all that he had said. Obviously counsel for defendant was not satisfied with her testimony, as up to this time she had completely failed to sustain the averment as to this real estate. She had testified to an arrangement which all the evidence establishes had been fully complied with by Caleb Collins. This long-belated testimony as to the Queen City farm was only forthcoming after the question of counsel had suggested a new place, and a different time, and then the answer was that Caleb had said, "He had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm," and, this also being unsatisfactory, counsel stated this was not what he wanted, as obviously it was not. Then for the first time, in response to a call for something more, she answered, "If she stayed with him he would give her the Queen City farm." Then came the suggestive question: "How long did he say for her to stay with him?" and the answer, "As long as he lived." Previous to this she had stated that, after the talk in the yard, nothing more had been said about the matter for about six months. No other witness testified to this statement in the house. When it was made the mutual agreement in the yard had been consummated. To this last voluntary statement, which was that he had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm if she stayed with him until the last, or his death, there is no pretense that there was any assent or agreement on the part of Iowa. It was wholly ex parte, and the mother does not state that thereupon she agreed that they would remain. The court was made to understand that the alleged contract in the yard had proven satisfactory and its performance begun when all parties adjourned from the yard to go to dinner, and that the proposed removal to Ezekiel's had been abandoned.

In Kinney v. Murray, 170 Mo. 674, 71 S. W. 197, the principle governing courts of equity in this class of cases was well stated to be that: "When, as in this case, and in consonance with this doctrine, a court of equity is called upon to establish and enforce a contract of this character, in the teeth of the statute of wills, and of the statute of frauds and perjuries, and to set aside the disposition of valuable property made in conformity with the requirements of those statutes, there is devolved upon the chancellor the gravest responsibility, perhaps, that ever attaches to his high office. And nothing short of the inherent justice of the claim, supported by evidence that can be relied upon with the utmost confidence, proving the existence of the contract, its terms and conditions, and a substantial and meritorious compliance therewith, with such certainty and definiteness as to leave no room for reasonable doubt, can ever justify the exercise of such an extraordinary prerogative." In the same case it was elsewhere stated: "A court of equity in this state will specifically enforce an oral contract to make a will in a particular manner, where a valuable consideration has been received for the promise, and a fraud would be perpetrated upon the promisee or beneficiary unless the contract be performed; but the proof of such a contract must be so cogent, clear, and forcible as to leave no reasonable doubt in the mind of the chancellor as to its terms and character, and, where the consideration consists of acts to be performed, there must be like proof that the acts performed refer to and result from that contract and are such as would not have been done unless on account of that very agreement and with a direct view to its performance. "There must be no equivocation or uncertainty in the case." This doctrine is established, and its application illustrated, in a long line of cases." That case has since been followed and approved in Rosenwald v. Middlebrook, 188 Mo. 58, 86 S. W. 200; Kirk v. Middlebrook, 201 Mo. 289, 100 S. W. 450. In Phillips v. Thompson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 149, Chancellor Kent observes: "It is well settled that, if a party pleads part performance to take a parol agreement out of the statute, he must show acts unequivocally referring to and resulting from that agreement, such as the party would not have done unless on account of that very agreement, and with a direct view to its performance; and the agreement set up must appear to be the same with the one partly performed. There must be no equivocation or uncertainty in the case. The ground of the interference of the court is not simply that there is proof of the existence of a parol agreement, but that there is fraud in resisting the completion of an agreement partly performed." And the chancellor concludes by observing: "This case, like many others, shows the utility of the statute of frauds, and the danger of relaxing the sanction of its provisions. I agree with those wise and learned judges who have declared that the courts ought to make a stand against any further encroachment upon the statute, and not to go one step beyond the rules and precedents already established."

Turning now to the first essential exacted by all the authorities in this class of cases, to wit, that the contract itself must be definite and specific for the conveyance or devising of the specific land in suit, and that the proof of the contract must be cogent, clear, and convincing, it must be evident that the statement of Caleb Collins that, if the defendant Iowa would stay with him, he would school her and educate her and give her clothing and see that she had plenty, and her assent to that proposition, fell far short of the alleged agreement to convey her the Queen City farm. As already remarked, in the testimony of those who heard these statements by Caleb Collins, no mention whatever is made of any statement by him that, if she would remain with him as long as he lived, he would convey to her or give to her the said farm. As to the unsupported evidence of Mrs. Harrell that after this conversation, and after her assent to the arrangements made in the yard, they then went into the house, and during the afternoon, while they were talking in the south room, Caleb Collins said he had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm if she stayed with him until he died, it must be borne in mind that this was the testimony of the mother who had been examined, cross-examined, and re-examined until her evidence in the record covered over 45 printed pages, and never until after all this long and searching examination and re-examination did she testify to any such a contract or statement. She had repeatedly said that she had detailed everything that had been stated by Mr. Collins in regard to providing for her daughter. Now the evidence tends to show that Mrs. Harrell was an intelligent witness and certainly a deeply interested one; one who was fully alive to the importance of testifying to facts which tended to establish the alleged contract for the conveyance of this piece of land. It must have impressed the trial judge as being at least remarkable that she had forgotten to mention this highly important statement during all of her long and tedious examination. While this court has often said that in an appeal in an equity case it would not abdicate its right to examine and weigh the testimony, yet it will defer to a large extent to the judgment of the chancellor who hears and tries the cause on the circuit, and who has an exceptional advantage in weighing the testimony of witnesses, which this court cannot in the nature of things have. So, in this case, the circuit court was present, and it must have appeared significant to it that this statement alleged to have been made in the house on the day of the funeral of Mrs. Collins had not been testified to by Mrs. Harrell during all of her previous examinations, when the great purpose of her testimony was to establish the existence or nonexistence of this particular contract; but, when the testimony itself is closely scanned, it will be noted that, when left to herself, without suggestion of counsel, her statement was that Mr. Collins simply said in a general conversation that he had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm. Certainly this was not the language of an irrevocable contract to specifically convey or will to this young girl that particular tract of land. In the language of the courts, it was no more than a declaration of an intention which he might abandon, or change altogether, or substitute another piece of land in lieu of that tract; but taking altogether the interest of the witness, the circumstances under which this testimony was elicited, the fact that the witness was before the court, and he had an opportunity to observe her manner and her interest in the case, this court should hesitate a long time in reaching a different conclusion from that reached by the circuit court in finding that the alleged contract was not made, and that the evidence fell far short of that clear and satisfying testimony which courts of equity uniformly require in cases of this character.

Mrs. Stella Dooley, in her evidence as to what occurred on the day of Mrs. Collins' funeral, did not corroborate Mrs. Harrell as to the statement of Caleb Collins that he had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm. All that she heard him say on that day was that, if she would stay with him, he would always see that she had a home, and he would school her and clothe her, and all the testimony shows that he fully complied with his agreement in that respect. Ezekiel Dooley, who was there that day, did not hear either of the statements attributed by Mrs. Harrell to Caleb Collins in regard to this farm. Now Mrs. Harrell states in her testimony that the only persons present at the conversation in the yard with her were her brother, Mr. Dooley, and his wife, Stella Dooley, and Mr. Collins, the witness, and her little girl. As already said, Ezekiel Collins heard neither of the statements which Mrs. Harrell says Caleb Collins made on that day. So that, as far as the alleged contract made on the day of the funeral of Mrs. Collins in regard to the land in suit, the cause stands upon the uncorroborated evidence of Mrs. Harrell, unless the subsequent declarations of Caleb Collins can be said to have sustained her evidence as to the contract. Now, as to these, many of them are of the most unsatisfactory character, declarations made in the most casual conversations. Thus, Masterson testified that on one occasion, perhaps in 1903, Caleb Collins stayed all night with him, and in talking to his wife Caleb said that he had a girl living with him, and he had given her a calf, and she had made a cow, etc., but that was not all he was going to do for her; that he was either going to deed her the farm or give her a farm, he would not say which. But in the same conversation witness asked why he did not sell the Queen City farm, and Mr. Collins said land was raising in price, and if he sold it he would have to purchase other land. When he said he thought of deeding the farm, he did not say what farm, nor when he intended to deed it. Rinehart's testimony was to the effect that, when he offered to purchase this farm, Mr. Collins said that he had thought of deeding it to the girl. Ezekiel Dooley testified that he was at Caleb Collins' in 1904 with his daughter. Iowa, the defendant, wanted to go home with him to go to school in St. Louis. The old gentleman objected, and said that she ought to go to Stiles that winter, and said "You know, Iowa, I told you I would give the Queen City farm if you would stay with me until the last." Mrs. Harrell testified that she heard this statement. James Collins also testified that Collins told him that he had promised Iowa the Queen City farm and wanted to make a deed to it. Cooksey testified that Mr. Collins said to him in 1904, when Iowa was absent in St. Louis, that he was going to deed her the Queen City farm, and that that was about all he ever said to him about it. And Mrs. Stella Dooley also stated that he said he was going to give her the Queen City farm, and was going to fix it up. Burchette simply testified that, when some parties wanted to buy this farm, Mr. Collins said he thought it would make Iowa more money for him to sell the farm and invest it in Iowa land, and on another occasion he said he wanted to make a deed to Iowa to a piece of land. But defendant also introduced another witness, Mr. Melvin, who testified that he was the justice of the peace in Lancaster, Mo., and that Mr. Caleb Collins came into his office and desired to make a deed to a piece of land in Iowa, and the justice told him that he was not the proper officer to take the acknowledgment, and he left. Mr. Collins did not call the grantee's name, but said it was a girl that he had raised.

Now of this character of testimony this court has often spoken. In Kinney v. Murray, 170 Mo., loc. cit. 706, 71 S. W. 197, this court said: "Evidence of such declarations, it is true, is admissible, but it never amounts to direct proof of the facts claimed to have been admitted by those declarations; and it is sometimes doubted whether it ought to be received at all when introduced for the purpose of divesting a title created by deed." Johnson v. Quarles, 46 Mo., loc. cit. 427. "This kind of evidence has always been received with great care, and when not supported by other evidence is generally entitled to but little weight." Cornet v. Bertelsmann, 61 Mo., loc. cit. 127. "The evidence, consisting as it does, in the mere repetition of oral statements, is subject to much imperfection and mistakes; the party himself either being misinformed, or not having clearly expressed his own meaning, or the witness having misunderstood him. It frequently happens also that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few of the expressions really used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party actually did say. * * * When we reflect upon the inaccuracy of many witnesses in their original comprehension of a conversation, their extreme liability to mingle subsequent facts and occurrences with the original transaction, and the impossibility of recollecting the precise terms used by the party, or of translating them by exact equivalents, we must conclude there is no substantial reliance upon this class of testimony." 1 Greenleaf, § 200; Johnson v. Quarles, supra; Ringo v. Richardson, 58 Mo. 385; Cornet v. Bertelsmann, supra; Berry v. Hartzell, 91 Mo., loc. cit. 137, 3 S. W. 582; Fanning v. Doan, 139 Mo. 392, 41 S. W. 742. "The intrinsic weakness of this class of evidence is further enhanced in any given case by the length of time that has intervened since the declarations were made, and the ease with which it can be manufactured, and the temptation to do so, when all those by whom it could be contradicted are in their graves." Fanning v. Doan, 139 Mo., loc. cit. 412, 41 S. W. 747. "Such evidence can and ought to have very little weight, when it is sought by it to asperse the memory, and set aside the last will and testament of worthy and just persons, executed in contemplation of death, and in the manner required by law, disposing of their own property according to the dictates of their own conscience."

When given full consideration, it will be seen they were at the most but the expression of affection by Mr. Collins for the defendant Iowa and of an intention on his part to make provision for her, but it will be observed: That to one witness he stated that he was going to deed her a piece of land in Iowa; to another witness he said he had thought of giving her this Queen City farm, but he did not know but what it would be better to sell it and invest the money for her in other property. But as already said of the conversation in the house, on the day of the funeral, none of these expressions measure up to the statement that he had made an irrevocable contract with the defendant Iowa to convey her this specific land. We can add nothing to what was said by this court in Kinney v. Murray, supra, as to the unsatisfactory character of such evidence to make out a case of specific performance; but, more than that, the chancellor had all these witnesses before him, and he heard the evidence, showing the motives which prompted James Collins, who was at that time prosecuting a similar action for 172 acres of the land left by his uncle, Caleb Collins, and his admission that he expected to rely upon Mrs. Harrell and the defendant Iowa to establish his right to the specific performance of a contract by Caleb Collins to convey him that land. Cooksey also was shown to have an action at that time pending against the estate of Caleb Collins for $1,200 for work and labor done, and the court must have been strongly impressed with the interest which these parties had in testifying against the heirs of this estate. The evidence consisting, as it did, of the testimony of the mother and uncle and aunt of the defendant Iowa, on the one hand, and the testimony of parties who were seeking to prove up like verbal claims to the estate of this old gentleman against whom no such claims had been preferred in his lifetime when he could defend against them. In our opinion this testimony was peculiarly a matter for the consideration of the court, who saw these witnesses and heard them testify, and who could weigh that testimony much better than we can. Scanning this evidence as closely as we can, we have been forced even at this distance to reach the same conclusion as he did, that it failed of that satisfactory character which a court of equity requires; but there is still a further consideration, and that is this, in many of the adjudicated cases stress has been laid upon the fact that the party who was seeking this specific performance had severed the natural ties of affection and left his or her home and gone to the family of the decedent, and had fully performed the contract of service for which the deed or will was to be made, but no such state of facts appears in this case. The defendant Iowa and her mother had long been inmates of the home of Caleb Collins, and had received support and maintenance at his hands, without any demand for service, and without any pretense of any contract. The defendant Iowa had not been called upon to sever her relations with her mother in any degree. She remained in the same home of this kind old gentleman and benefactor just as she had been for the most of her life, and she had her mother's care and protection and affection, and the same benefaction had been extended to the mother as to the daughter. According to the alleged contract, she was simply to stay in and not to go from the home of Caleb Collins, and was not called upon to make any sacrifice whatever, but simply to continue to receive the same protection and support and care that he had already generously given to her, and in this respect the facts of this case differentiate it from that character of cases which appear in our reports.

When we consider the further essential that the performance must be unequivocal and must in its own nature be referable alone to the very contract sought to be preferred, because it is only by performance (whereby the party to be charged is benefited) that the conscience of the promisor and those claiming under him is bound, it is hard to conceive that Mrs. Harrell and her daughter, considering their financial condition would have refused to continue making their home with Mr. Collins unless he had stipulated to convey them a farm, in addition to giving them a home which he had for years furnished them from the motives of kindness, generosity, and relationship. On his part, left alone, without wife or children, naturally he desired their society, and was willing to continue to give them a home and protection and act the part of a father to Iowa without the thought that he could only procure their assent to his bounty, without making an irrevocable contract to convey them a large portion of his estate. Surely, if their presence and society would sweeten his declining years, a like feeling of gratitude on their part, after all his benefactions to them, they would not, without some urgent reason, abandon him and that home, when the invitation to remain was extended to them. Indeed, it would seem that such a step had never occurred to him, and, when the announcement came to him in the hour of his distress, he naturally urged them to remain, and all that occurred in the yard was entirely consistent with human experience and was in itself, under the circumstances, all that could have been expected.

Why Mrs. Harrell should have announced her intention of leaving him on that day of all others, without having consulted him about it, is inexplicable. Surely it was not because of any thought of impropriety on her part in living there, when his age and the relationship that had existed so long are considered, for, if it was improper to remain without the contract, it was equally immodest and improper to remain with it. We think the circuit court might well have refused to believe, as it did, that Iowa Harrell and her mother continued in the home of Caleb Collins for the sole reason that he had agreed to convey Iowa this farm, and that their acceptance of Mr. Collins' bounty was referable alone to such a contract. We prefer to believe that they felt that they owed him a debt of gratitude to render him some return for all his unselfish kindness to them by remaining with him in his loneliness, and at the same time securing to themselves a home, which they so much needed. That Caleb Collins was very fond of Iowa Harrell we have no doubt whatever. She had lived in his home from the time she was a babe. He had no children of his own. He had been generous to her and her mother all her life. Neither do we question that he purposed to make some provision for her out of his property, but we think the whole evidence indicates that he had not fully determined what that provision should be. At times he thought of giving her this farm, and then he thought of giving her some of his Iowa land; but that he ever made such a contract to give her this specified farm we think the evidence fails to establish. We think that whatever he thought of doing for her he considered it would be a voluntary gift, and not because he was bound by an irrevocable contract to give her this specific property.

In our opinion the circuit court correctly held that the defendant Iowa Harrell had not established her right to a decree of specific performance of a contract to convey or devise her the Queen City farm, and its judgment is therefore affirmed.

VALLIANT, C. J., and BURGESS, FOX, LAMM, and GRAVES, JJ., concur.

WOODSON, J. (dissenting). This suit was instituted in the circuit court of Schuyler county, and had for its object the partition of certain real estate, described in the petition, situate in Schuyler and Macon counties, among the plaintiffs and defendants, collateral heirs of Caleb Collins, deceased. Iowa Harrell filed an intervening petition, claiming the Schuyler county land, which is set out later. The petition was in the usual and proper form.

On the application of John H. Jeffries, guardian and curator of Iowa Harrell, she was made a party defendant to the suit, and she filed the following intervening petition, the formal parts omitted: "Now comes Iowa Harrell, one of the defendants by leave of court, by her guardian and curator, John H. Jeffries, and for her answer to plaintiff's petition denies each and every allegation therein contained and set forth. Defendant further answering admits: That Caleb Collins, late of the county of Davis, and state of Iowa, died intestate and without issue or widow on the 11th day of August, 1905. That the title to the following described tracts of land situated in Schuyler county, Mo., appears of record to be owned by the said deceased, Caleb Collins, at his death, to wit: The northeast one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the southeast quarter of section thirty-one (31) and the north half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section thirty-two (32), except eight (8) acres, described as follows, to wit: Commencing at the northeast corner of said southwest quarter of the northwest quarter; thence running west about thirty-two (32) rods on the north line of said tract to a stake ten feet from a double white oak tree, the smallest one being about six inches in diameter in the year 1870 and marked with two blazes; thence on a straight line to the southeast corner of said tract; thence north to the place of beginning—and all in township sixty-five (65), range fifteen (15), Schuyler county, Mo. Defendant admits that the deceased, Caleb Collins, owned the south half of the southeast quarter of section eight (8) in township fifty-seven (57) in range fourteen (14) in Macon county, Mo., at the time of his death. Defendant admits that the heirs of the said deceased, Collins, are properly set forth in plaintiff's petition. Defendant, further answering, says: That her father died and left her when she was a small child, as his only child. That about six years ago the said Caleb Collins' wife died, and left him alone without issue. That he was a man of considerable real and personal property, both. That his father and mother were dead. That his wife was a sister to the mother of this defendant. That, shortly after the death of the said Caleb Collins' wife, the said Caleb Collins contracted orally and agreed with this defendant that if this defendant would live with him, stay with him, and comfort him until his death, he would give, transfer, and convey to her all of the Schuyler county land above described in consideration therefor. This defendant answering accepted said proposition on the part of said Caleb Collins and contracted and agreed with said Caleb Collins to live with him, stay with him, and comfort him until his death; and in pursuance of said agreement this defendant lived with, stayed with, and comforted the said Caleb Collins from the time said agreement was entered into until his death, and performed the said agreement on her part fully. The death of said Caleb Collins occurred on the 11th day of August, 1905. By reason of which contract and the performance thereof by defendant, the said described real estate situated in Schuyler county, Mo., is owned absolutely by this defendant. That the said Caleb Collins failed and neglected to keep his part of said contract prior to his death, and failed to convey, transfer, or deed said land to this defendant. That the plaintiffs herein and the other defendants have no interest in said land. Wherefore this defendant prays the court that a decree be entered in this cause declaring this defendant to be the absolute owner of said real estate, and that the other plaintiffs and defendants in this cause be decreed to have no interest whatever in said real estate, and that the title to said land be vested in this defendant, and the plaintiffs and the other defendants be divested of all right, title, and interest in and to said tracts of land, situate in Schuyler county, Mo., aforesaid, and for all proper and general relief."

Defendants Albert H., Ira W., Ed. R., James, and Lina D. Collins, and Sallie Gibson filed the following answer: "That it is their distinct understanding that said land in Schuyler county set out in the petition belongs to Iowa Harrell of Stiles, Iowa, and that she obtained same from her uncle, Caleb Collins, during his life. We further state that it was distinctly understood shortly before the death of said Caleb Collins that said land should be and was the property of said Iowa Harrell, and this understanding came from a statement made by said Caleb Collins to certain of the parties hereto. We therefore disclaim any interest in said land, and ask the cause to be dismissed as to us, and that there be no costs taxed to us in the final judgment in said cause, but that the costs, if any, be taxed against those only who make the claim to the land."

The answer of Thomas R. Hollingsworth was as follows: "Now comes Thos. R. Hollingsworth by his guardian ad litem, P. O. Sansberry, for answer to plaintiffs' petition, and asks the court to strictly protect his interest."

Plaintiffs' reply to the answer of Iowa Harrell was a general denial and a plea of the statute of frauds. When the cause was called for trial, Iowa Harrell, the intervenor, demanded a trial by a jury, which was by the court denied, and proceeded to try the cause as a chancellor, to which ruling and action of the court she duly excepted. The court found the issues for plaintiffs, and entered a decree partitioning the land as prayed for in the petition. In due time Iowa Harrell filed her motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which were by the court overruled, to which action of the court in so overruling her said motions she duly excepted, and timely appealed the cause to this court.

1. Counsel for intervenor, Iowa Harrell, insists that the findings and decree of the circuit court denying specific performance of the contract set out in her intervening petition are not supported by and are against the great weight of the evidence, and that, this being a case in chancery, it is our duty to review the evidence and pass upon the weight thereof; and, if found to preponderate in her favor, to reverse the decree and enter one in this court in her favor specifically enforcing the contract.

This court has uniformly held that in equity cases it would on appeal proceed de novo to hear and determine the cause, deferring somewhat to the findings of the trial court; but, if its findings and decree were not sustained by the evidence and the law, then this court would proceed to make its own findings and enter such a judgment as equity and justice might require. Gibbs v. Haughwout, 207 Mo., loc. cit. 891, 105 S. W. 1067. Under the rule above announced, we have reviewed the entire evidence, as presented by the abstract of record, which is very voluminous, and have carefully considered and weighed the same. According to the record disclosures, the following facts stand undisputed, viz.: Plaintiffs and defendants are collateral kindred of the deceased, Caleb Collins, who died intestate, without a widow or legal descendants, in Davis county, Iowa, on August 11, 1905. At the time of his death he owned about 500 acres of land, situate in that county, besides what he owned in this state. The land involved in this case is 152 acres and is located near Queen City, Schuyler county, and is known and referred to in the record as the "Queen City farm." Caleb Collins was an elderly gentleman at the time of his death, and was a man of more than ordinary intelligence. He was secretary of the school board, counselor for many of his neighbors, kept the Iowa statutes, regarded as a safe legal adviser, a successful business man, and commanded the respect of his neighbors. He was kind, sympathetic, and charitable. For a number of years prior to his death Maggie Harrell, his wife's sister, her daughter, Iowa Harrell, and her aged and afflicted father had made their home with him. Intervenor's father, Dr. Harrell, died in 1890, when she was only eleven months old, and upon his death her mother, Maggie Harrell, took her to the home of Caleb Collins, where they resided as members of his family practically all the time, until the death of his wife, who was the sister of Mrs. Harrell, which occurred in 1898. During a short period of that time she was absent attending to her deceased husband's business, and for a few months in the year 1902 she conducted a hotel at Leroy, Kan. The intervenor was in Kansas with her mother during those few months. Mrs. Harrell went to Kansas for the purpose of giving her daughter, Iowa, a better education and placing her in better society. The mother was a stenographer, and she served as such for a short time in a lawyer's office in Leroy. While in the hotel business, her health failed, and she and Iowa returned to the home of Mr. Collins, where they resided until his death, which occurred, as before stated, in 1905. From 1890 to 1905 Collins gave the mother and daughter a home, clothed and fed them, and sent Iowa to school, and paid their medical bills. During the time they resided with him, he became very much attached to Iowa and spoke to and of her in very affectionate and endearing terms, and frequently said he intended to do something for her, and on several occasions stated that he intended to give her the Queen City farm. Intervenor claims the contract set up in her intervening petition was entered into on August 24, 1893, the day of Mrs. Collins' funeral. At that time she was about nine years old. Mr. Collins grieved greatly over the death of his wife, and on the day of her death Mrs. Harrell concluded to change her and her daughter's place of abode, and discussed the matter with her brother, Ezekiel Dooley. She testified that when Collins heard them discussing the matter he pleaded for them to remain with him, and then and there made and entered into the contract in question with Iowa, to the effect if she would stay with and take care of him until his death he would deed to her the Queen City farm. She also testified that Iowa accepted his proposition and agreed to live with him and care for him until his death, and that she fully performed her part of the contract. The contention of the respondents is that the evidence fails to establish the contract stated in the petition, or its performance by Iowa Harrell; while, upon the other hand, her counsel insist that the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the contract was entered into by Caleb Collins and Iowa Harrell, and that she fully performed and executed her part of it, and that a denial of specific performance thereof would be unjust, inequitable, shocking to the conscience of the chancellor, and would work a fraud and irreparable injury upon her. These contentions of the respective parties present the vital question involved in this case for determination.

Intervener starts out in the contest with the laboring oar and undertakes the burden of overcoming the statute of frauds, which requires such a contract to be in writing, by showing beyond peradventure that the contract was actually made, and that it was fully executed on her part. Learned counsel for respondent assails the sufficiency of the evidence to make out a case for appellant for two reasons: First, because the probative force of the evidence shows that Mr. Collins only contemplated giving the land in question to her as a voluntary donation, prompted by love and affection entertained by him for her, and not based upon a contract obligating him to do so; and, second, for the reason that the record discloses the fact that all of the evidence tending to prove the alleged contract comes from interested parties, some of whom have claims pending against the estate, and so marked with fraud and collusion between them that it is unworthy of belief, and that the chancellor was wholly justified in refusing to give it credence. We will discuss those two propositions in the inverse order, in which they are stated.

Before we proceed to the consideration of the evidence of the case, it might be well to state that the principles of law governing this case are so well and firmly settled in this state that it would be a supererogation of labor to re-discuss them in this opinion. We will content ourselves by simply stating the rule which has been so often stated by this court in similar cases. The clearest and strongest statement of the rule to which my attention has been called is by Lamm, J., and is found in the case of Kirk v. Middlebrook, 201 Mo., loc. cit. 289, 100 S. W. 462, which is in the following language: "As equity follows the law, it (the contract in such case) is nonenforceable in equity, except on one high condition, and such condition arises when the nonenforcement of the contract would work an equitable fraud upon the promisee; that is, the conscience of the chancellor is stirred and relief is extended in his open palm when, and only when, it is certain beyond peradventure of a doubt that to deny the relief would be to strike down the underlying purpose of the statute of frauds, to wit, the prevention of frauds and perjuries. When a court of equity is called upon to exercise its high and delicate function, it asks, as an irreducible minimum of those who seek relief, proof showing beyond a reasonable doubt: First, not only that some contract existed, but that the precise contract in suit existed; second, the terms of the contract should be so clear and definite as to leave no doubt in intentment and certainty; third, performance on the part of the promisee should be shown, and that performance must be unequivocal, and must in its own nature be referable alone to the very contract sought to be performed, because it is only by the performance * * * that the conscience of the promisor and those claiming under him is bound; fourth, and the acts relied on to show performance must point to the contract in suit and none other." The last utterance of this court upon the subject is found in the case of Wales v. Holden (decided at the present term) 209 Mo. 552, 108 S. W. 89.

We will now consider and weigh the evidence of this case, and apply to it the rule above stated. In the first place, Mr. Collins was an elderly gentleman (his exact age not appearing from the record, for the reason he was averse to telling his age), with more than ordinary intelligence, kind and affectionate in his nature, charitable in disposition, and possessed of 700 or 800 acres of land, and $8,000 or $10,000 worth of personal property. He was married, but of that union there were no children born. He and his wife lived together for many years upon a farm in Davis county, in the state of Iowa. She was a sister of Mrs. Maggie Harrell, the mother of Iowa Harrell, the appellant in this case. Dr. Harrell, the father of Iowa, died in the year 1890, and from that time until the death of Mr. Collins, which occurred in August, 1905, Iowa and her mother lived with him practically all the time, and after the death of his wife, which occurred in the year 1898, they kept house and cared for him until his death. At the time Iowa and her mother first went to reside with Mr. Collins and his wife, the former was only nine months old, and from that time up to the time of the death of Mrs. Collins, Mr. Collins had become greatly attached to Iowa, and loved her as affectionately as a father would love one of his own children.

The following facts were shown to exist by the great preponderance of the evidence, to wit: That after the death of Mrs. Collins, and on the day of her funeral, Maggie Harrell, Ezekiel Dooley, and his wife, Stella Dolley, were standing in the yard at the home of Mr. Collins, and in his presence and hearing, and in that of Iowa Harrell, Mrs. Harrell, while discussing the death of her sister and the further plans of herself and her daughter, said to her brother, Ezekiel Dooley, that she and Iowa were going to gather up their belongings, load them in the wagon, and go home and live with him. That when Mr. Collins heard that remark he said "No," and came up to where Iowa was standing and said to her: "You are not going to leave me now. * * * You are not going to leave me now in my bereavement and leave me here all alone?" And that he then began to cry, and Iowa ran to him and placed her hands in his and sympathized with him, when he again said to her: "No, Iowa, stay with me, and I will school you and educate you and give you all your clothes. You live with me, and I will see that you have plenty." Iowa then put her hand in his and said, "I am going to stay with Uncle," and they then started off and went into the house together. Shortly after that occurrence, they were talking about the home place and the other farms he owned, and he said to her in their presence that he had concluded to give to her the Queen City farm because he thought it would be better for her than the one on which they were living on account of the wood being there. He also said to her that the conditions upon which he gave her the farm were that she would have to stay with him as long as he lived, to the last, and care and comfort him in his old age. In reply to that she said she would do it. He then said, "If you will, I will give you the Queen City farm."

A portion of Maggie Harrell's testimony regarding the terms of the contract was in the following language: "Well, the day after my sister's funeral, we had the wagon, my brother and I, my brother Zeke and his wife, Mr. Collins, and several of them, I don't recall who all they were now. There were several standing in the yard talking. I don't remember who all were there. I don't just now. I could recall there were several out there, though I don't know who they were now. I don't remember talking to them about that. It impresses me Mr. Caleb Collins was out there. My daughter was there. She was playing there with her cousins. Q. What conversation, if any, took place there by Mr. Collins with reference to Iowa. By Mr. Fogle: Q. Now you confine yourself to the conversation that took place between Mr. Collins and your daughter, Iowa. A. I said to the little girl, 'We will get our things and go home with brother

Zeke and make our home,' and Mr. Collins said, 'No.' Iowa was in the yard. He came to where the little girl was, and he said, 'You are not going to leave me now?' Q. To whom was he directing his talk? A. To the group. He said Iowa was my babe, and he turned to the little girl, and she looked up at us, and he said, 'You are not going to leave me now?' By Mr. Fogle: Q. What did he say? A. He said, 'You are not going to leave me now in my bereavement and leave me here alone?' and he began to cry, and the little girl sympathized with him. She ran to him and put her hands in his hands, and he said: 'No, Iowa, stay with me, and I will school you and educate you and give you all your clothes. You live with me, and I will see that you have plenty.' Q. Go ahead and state what occurred? A. Iowa put her hand in his, and said, 'I am going to stay with Uncle.' They started off and went into the house together. She said she was going to stay with her uncle. Q. What was the next conversation you heard between Mr. Caleb Collins and Iowa? A. Well I don't know as I understand the question. By the Court: Relative to her staying there. A. They went in for a little while after that, and he went on doing for her. We stayed there with him, and afterwards he said that he made up his mind to give her the Queen City farm. Q. Talked to her? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he say to her? A. In the talk that came up afterwards we were talking about the home place that we lived on and the two farms that he owned, and he said that he had concluded to give her the Queen City farm—he thought it would be better, on account of the wood being there, than the one we lived on. Q. How soon after the other conversation in the yard? A. Well, it was maybe some little time after that before this other came up. Q. Did Iowa then continue to stay with him? A. Stayed with him; yes, sir. Q. Now, what, if any, conditions did he couple with giving her the Queen City farm? What did he say she would have to do after that? A. She would have to stay with him as long as he lived, to the last. Q. And what, if anything, would Iowa say to him when he said she would have to stay with him as long as he lived, or until the last? A. She said she would do it. She never gave a word of inclination that she wanted to leave him. Q. Then on his statement that if she would stay with him as long as he lived, or until the last, what did he say he would do for her, if anything? A. He said he would give her this farm, the Queen City farm. Q. Now, I want you to commence and detail that conversation that occurred between Mr. Collins and your daughter, just state exactly what happened, give it all, give the statement, how it came up, and everything. A. Well, we were at home, and we were talking about different farms that he had, and the suitableness of them. He lived on that farm, and he said that he had made up his mind to give Iowa the Queen City farm, if it would suit her, and she said she accepted that, if I understood you. He said he had made up his mind to give her the Queen City farm; that she was to stay with him, take care of him until the last, as long as he lived."

As contended, if the foregoing testimony is read alone, then there is some confusion about the date the contract was actually entered into; but when the entire evidence is read together, and the interruptions of counsel for respondents are considered, it is perfectly clear that the contract was entered into the day after the death of Mrs. Collins. Mrs. Harrell and her brother, Mr. Dooley, also testified: That in 1904 the latter was living in St. Louis, and that he and his daughter were visiting her and Iowa at the home of Mr. Collins, when the daughter of Mr. Dooley expressed a wish that Iowa would return to St. Louis with her in order to attend school down there. That some time later in discussing that question with Iowa, Mr. Collins said to her: "No, Iowa, I cannot get along without you. It is so lonesome without you. I want you and your mamma to stay with me. You can go to school a winter longer here at Stiles. You know you agreed to stay with me if I would give you the Queen City farm." She said in reply, "Yes," and told him that she still wanted to go to St. Louis, but she would stay with him. These same witnesses stated that they heard Mr. Collins say many times that he was going to give the Queen City farm to Iowa, and that he was going to fix up the house on it for her so she could live in it and make it her home. Mrs. Harrell also testified that Mr. Collins told her that he wished to make a deed to Iowa, conveying to her the Queen City farm, and that he went to Bloomfield, Iowa, to have Mr. S. S. Carruthers draw the deed for him, but that he forgot to take with him the description of the land, which prevented him from having the deed drawn; and that subsequent thereto he wrote the letter to Mr. Carruthers read in evidence, dated July 29, 1905, asking advice as to how to draw the deed, which, however, was never mailed, for the reason that he was taken sick and died before he had an opportunity of doing so.

James Collins testified: That he was a nephew of Caleb Collins. That he was at the latter's home frequently during the last five years of his life, and was there nearly all of the last two years thereof. That he knew Iowa Harrell. That she lived with Mr. Caleb Collins, and that he treated her like one of his own children, kindly and affectionately. "In 1905, the day when Hiram McLaughlin was buried, while he and Mr. Collins were standing at the gate leading into the farm, he said to me that he had promised the Queen City farm to Iowa Harrell, and that he wanted to see Sam Carruthers and have him make a deed for him conveying the farm to her so they could not beat her out of it. At different times he discussed the matter with me, and also the condition the farm was in. In 1903 he spoke to me about making out a bill and a statement of the dimensions of the lumber and the amount it would take to build her a house on the farm. I made out the list and what it would cost. He talked of having the lumber sawed on the place. That was in July, 1903. He said he wanted to fix the place up for her and build a square house of four rooms. I figured on the job, but someone else built it. A man lived there then, and he built the house. I saw Mr. Carruthers and told him what Mr. Collins said regarding the deed." On cross-examination he said he had a similar suit pending in the district court of Davis county, Iowa, in which he was claiming that Mr. Collins made an oral gift to him in April, 1905, of the Savannah farm of 172 acres.

John W. Cooksey testified: That Mr. Collins spoke to him about deeding the Queen City farm to Iowa Harrell. "He was on his way to Kansas City at the time, and he said to me that 'Babe,' as he called her, 'had gone to the St. Louis Fair. * * * I am going to fix her so she won't have to work out when I am gone.' And I said, 'Uncle, what are you going to do?' and he said, 'Deed her the Queen City farm.' I heard him say she was good to him, and he never asked her to do anything for him but what she did it."

George W. Melvin testified: That he was a justice of the peace at Lancaster, Schuyler county, Mo.; that he knew Caleb Collins; that Mr. Collins called into his office one day and told him that he wanted to make out and take his acknowledgment to a deed conveying a certain piece of land in Davis county, Iowa, to Iowa Harrell; that he told Mr. Collins that he had no authority to take the acknowledgment to a deed conveying land located in the state of Iowa, and that he had better get a notary public to take the acknowledgment. He said he would do so, and he thought it was a duty he owed her, and he then went away.

D. B. Burchette testified: That he had been sheriff of Davis county, Iowa, for four years. That he knew Mr. Caleb Collins. That he had a talk with him one day about conveying a piece of land to Iowa Harrell. He said: "She was the sweetest child he ever knew, and that she could not be closer to him if he had been her father. He was proud of her." He said she had a lady's head on her shoulders, and that he was going to school her and make a lady of her so that anybody would be proud of her. He also said when she was in Leroy, Kan., that they had advanced schools out there, and that he aimed to fix his business here as best he could and go out there and make his home with her and her mother; that he took a great interest in her and her advancement. "Some two or three years before his death, I was at his home and spoke of some land buyers from Missouri who wished to purchase the Queen City farm, and he said that he thought it would make Iowa more money for him to sell it and invest the proceeds in Iowa land, but he also said that, 'Recently Missouri land is advancing in value, and I am not right sure but that it will come up to ours up here.' I was at his house twice during his last sickness. The first time I just dropped in to see him, but the last time was at the suggestion of the Collinses, which I regretted to do, but did so at their earnest request. I asked him if his business was in the condition in which he wished it to be. He said, 'No, it was not.' He said, 'I want to make a deed to Iowa to a piece of land,' and also said he wanted to 'make a will.' He said that the last time he had seen Sam Carruthers he told him what he wanted to have him make. He said he had written Carruthers, or had spoken to him about what he wanted, and I am not sure which he said. I told him that, if he wanted me to, I was going to Bloomfield and would send Carruthers right down there if he said so, and he said: 'I am too weak, sick, and nervous today. If he was here, I don't know as I could sign my own name. I am feeling awful weak.' But he said, 'Hold yourself in readiness so if I don't get any better.' He said, 'Ira told me the symptoms were better, that you (I) will be much better to-morrow.' He said, 'If I do not, I will phone you to have Carruthers come down,' and I said, 'I will be in town to-morrow, and, of course, will do that much for you.' The next time I heard from him he was dead."

W. A. Rinehart testified: That in the fall of 1902 he had a talk with Mr. Collins about buying the Queen City farm, and he said he did not care to sell it; that he had talked of giving that particular piece of land to a young lady living at his house. He called her "Babe" and "Iowa." He called her by both names. "I never saw her before or since."

William Masterson testified: That he knew Mr. Collins. That when he visited the Queen City farm he would frequently stay with him. That Mr. Collins had a girl living with him, but he never knew her name until he heard it here in the courtroom. "That one time when Mr. Collins was at my house, he told me that he had given the girl a calf, and she had made a cow, etc., and he said, 'That is not all I am going to do for her,' and previous to this time he told me he was either going to deed her the farm or give her the farm, and I won't say which."

All the evidence on both sides shows, and it is undisputed, that Iowa Harrell and her mother lived with and kept house for Mr. Collins from the date of his wife's death down to that of his own death, about seven years, with the exception of some three or four months spent by her and her mother in Leroy, Kan. It is also undisputed that they cared for him and administered unto his wants and necessities during all those years, and nursed and cared for him during his last sickness, and that Iowa treated him with the greatest kindness and with love and affection, as much so as if he had been her own father.

Mr. Harbarger testified on the part of plaintiffs, that he was at Collins' in an endeavor to buy the land in the fall of 1902. That Mrs. Harrell was present. That Collins was reluctant about selling the land, when Mrs. Harrell spoke up and urged him to sell it. To her Collins replied that he had an idea of his own about the farm; that he did not know but that he might want to give it to her and Iowa for a home, to which Mrs. Harrell replied that she would not have it for a home if she had to live on it.

Elmore Israel testified to a talk he had with Collins while Mrs. Harrell and Iowa were running the hotel in Kansas, whither they had gone in direct violation of the terms of the purported contract upon which the intervener bases this suit, that he sometimes thought they were trying to force him to make over some property to the child. That he intended leaving the child something, but not at present.

Thomas F. Collins, one of the administrators, testified that at the time he was taking the inventory Mrs. Harrell said to him, "Uncle Cale gave Babe these two cows and this calf and this mare." "I said, 'Is that all?'" and Mag said, "Yes, that is all." After the sale Mrs. Harrell told him she would like to have him give Babe and her the Queen City farm.

Al Ray, who lived at the Collins home, testified: That a few days after the death of Collins, Mrs. Harrell said to him: "If he (Cale) has not made a will, Babe and I will get nothing." That during his last illness Mrs. Harrell said to him: "If he gets well, he will do something for Babe and me. If he don't get well, we will get nothing." "I asked her if Cale had ever given Babe anything, and Mag replied, 'Nothing but a horse and a cow.'"

Dr. Grant Giles testified: That Mrs. Harrell said to him after Collins' death: "I and Babe would like to have the Queen City farm, and if Uncle had lived he would have given it to us." That a day or two after the sale she told them, "If Uncle had lived he would have given Babe and me something." She told him that Cale had said to her while he was sick: "Don't cry. Maybe I will get well, and if I do I will give you and Babe something." The doctor further testified that Ezekiel came to him and asked if Collins had left a will, as he was anxious to know whether or not Babe and Mag would get anything out of the estate.

Sam Le Grand testified that in 1901 he went to Collins to see about renting the farm. While Collins was away, Mrs. Harrell said to him, "You ought to buy the Queen City farm," to which he replied, "I did not know Uncle wanted to sell it." Mrs. Harrell then said to him: "Uncle cannot look after it, and he is getting so old he cannot look after it, and he has more land here than he can take care of. He could loan the money and get more out of it than he does out of the farm with less trouble."

James H. Collins, one of the administrators, testified that Mrs. Harrell told him that "Cale always intended doing something for us, and we would like to have Iowa get the Queen City farm."

Plaintiffs also introduced evidence showing that James Collins had a similar suit to this pending in the district court of Davis county, Iowa, against the heirs of Caleb Collins, to recover 170 acres of land, based upon an oral contract of similar import to the one made with Iowa Harrell; also, showing that John W. Cooksey was prosecuting a claim against the estate for the sum of $1,142.64 for work done and material furnished by him for certain buildings and other improvements made by him on one of Caleb Collins' farms, located in the state of Iowa, covering the period from 1891 to 1905. If this evidence is to be believed, then there can be no doubt but what Caleb Collins entered into the contract with Iowa Harrell stated in the petition, and that she fully and fairly performed her part thereof. One of them testified that she was present when the contract was made, and testified positively what the terms thereof were. Two others testified that Caleb Collins told them that he had agreed to give Iowa the Queen City farm in consideration of her agreeing to stay with him and to care for and comfort him during the remainder of his life.

Mr. Collins was old, and was left alone in the world by the death of his wife. He was greatly bereaved by her death and loss of his lifelong companion, with no children or other descendants of his own to lean upon or upon whom to bestow his generosity and affections; nor had he those of his own blood to love him, care for, or to administer unto him in his old and declining years. What was more natural than for him to turn his mind and affections to the niece of that beloved and departed wife, whom he had virtually reared from infancy, and whom he had learned to love, and around whom his affections had entwined as tenderly and fondly as if she had been his own child? What noble sentiment that springs from the human heart would have suggested his selection of some other one in preference to her to live with and care for him in his lonely, sad, and declining days, and upon whom he might bestow his affections and donate a portion of his worldly goods? Spontaneously comes back the answer—none. That being true, then what was more natural than for him to make provision for the dependent object of his affections out of the amplitude of his fortune in consideration of the care and loving services to be administered unto him by willing and affectionate hands? The mere asking of these questions carry with them their own answer—nothing. Those were the conditions surrounding him, and the relations that existed between them at the time the alleged contract was entered into. The death of Mrs. Collins suggested to Mrs. Harrell the propriety of the departure of herself and daughter from the home of Mr. Collins, which severed all her claims and natural ties to that hospitable home, and prompted her to make other arrangements for a home for herself and Iowa. While discussing that matter with Mr. Dooley, her brother, Mr. Collins entered a protest against their leaving him and taking up their abode with her brother. He reminded them of his old age, helpless condition, and sad bereavement, and pleaded with tears in his eyes with the young and affectionate child, who knew no other father, not to leave him in that sad plight, and very naturally said to her in the presence of her mother, and afterwards repeated in the presence of her uncle and many of his and their neighbors, that if she would stay with and care and comfort him to the end that he would provide a home for her, clothe and educate her, and give her the Queen City farm, which at that time was not worth more than $3,500, with the beneficial use thereof withheld from her until death should remove him, which, of course, largely detracted from that value. Why should he not have made that arrangement with her? It was the most natural thing in the world for him to do, not only from a financial point of view, but also from one of care, comfort, and ease in his declining days. He thereby made his home permanent, surrounded by those who were nearest and dearest on earth to him, who were ever willing to administer with a kind hand unto his wants, and contribute to his pleasures and happiness. By so doing he took nothing from any one who had any claims upon him or his bounty. He had no children or other lineal descendants, or ascendants for that matter, who were dependent upon him; none but collateral kindred, whom the record fails to disclose had any claims whatsoever upon him, or who ever contributed in the slightest degree to his comfort or well-being.

Those are the matters testified to by Mrs. Harrell, Ezekiel Dooley, and Stella Dooley, his wife; but it is argued that Caleb Collins did not agree to give Iowa the farm because her mother did not testify to the terms of the agreement until after she had been asked several times about it. That is true, but upon an inspection of the record it will be seen that, when interrogated regarding the contract, the shrewd objections of counsel would divert her mind from the question, and it was not answered fully until she did so upon her redirect examination; but those facts do not rest exclusively upon their testimony. There are other persons who testified in the case whose evidence is just as convincing as theirs. James Collins testified that he was a nephew of Caleb Collins, and that he heard his uncle say upon several different occasions that he was going to convey the Queen City farm to Iowa Harrell. Also, that he wanted to see Sam Carruthers about drawing the deed for him. In this he is corroborated by the testimony of Mrs. Harrell, who said Mr. Collins went to Bloomfield to see Mr. Carruthers about the same matter, but failed to have the deed executed because he forgot to take with him the description of the land. She also testified that upon his return home from Bloomfield he wrote the letter before mentioned to Mr. Carruthers regarding the deed. Both James Collins and Mrs. Harrell are corroborated upon that point by the testimony of Mr. Burchette, an ex-sheriff of Davis county, Iowa, and who visited Mr. Collins twice during his last illness. During his last visit Mr. Collins expressed a desire to deed the Queen City farm to the intervener, and stated to him that he had either written Mr. Carruthers regarding the deed, or that he had consulted him orally regarding the matter, and that he was not sure which. James Collins also testified that his uncle told him that he wished to build a house on the farm for Iowa, and had him make out a bill for the lumber required for that purpose, and to make an estimate of the probable cost of the house. The evidence shows that he afterwards built the house, but got some one else to build it. Mr. Cooksey testified that he heard Mr. Collins say he intended to leave Iowa in such shape that she would not have to work out, that he was going to convey the Queen City farm to her, and that he was going to have it deeded to her so they could not beat her out of it. Mr. Rinehart testified that he knew Mr. Collins and the land in question, that he went to Mr. Collins with a view of purchasing the land, but he refused to sell it, and assigned as his reason for such refusal that he thought he would give it to Iowa. Mr. Masterson testified that he resided near the Queen City farm, and that Mr. Collins frequently stayed with him while visiting the farm, and that upon one or more of those occasions he heard Mr. Collins say that he was going to give the farm to the young lady, whose name he did not know at the time, but subsequently learned that her name was Iowa. Mr. Burchette, who seemed to be an absolutely disinterested witness and a gentleman of good sense, testified: That he had known Mr. Collins about 20 years. That he knew him well, and frequently visited him, and visited him twice during his last illness. The last visit was made at the request of some one of the Collinses for the purpose of ascertaining what disposition, if any, he had made of his property. He told Mr. Burchette that he had made no disposition, but that he wanted to deed to Iowa the Queen City farm, and wanted to make a will also, but did not state what property he wished to will, or to whom he intended to will it. He made arrangements with Mr. Burchette to hold himself in readiness to go on a moment's notice after Mr. Carruthers, an attorney at law, at Bloomfield, Iowa, with whom he had previously consulted orally or by letter regarding the execution of said deed and will. Death, however, intervened and prevented their execution.

If this evidence is true, and if it was not the intention of Caleb Collins to make a voluntary gift of the Queen City farm to Iowa Harrell, then there can be no reasonable doubt about the fact that they entered into the contract mentioned, and that she fully and faithfully performed her part of it, and that he at all times fully intended to execute his part thereof by conveying the farm to her by a proper deed of conveyance, which was prevented by his unexpected death. Counsel for respondents insist that this evidence is not worthy of credence, and for that reason the trial court disbelieved it and found the issues against the intervener. The basis of that contention is predicated upon the facts that several of the most important witnesses for her are either blood relations, or that some of them have claims pending against the estate, and that they testified in her behalf in consideration of and in expectation that she and her relations would in return testify for them, and thereby establish their respective claims, and by that fraudulent conspiracy rob and loot the estate of Caleb Collins, deceased. That is a very serious and grave charge and should be well established before concurred in by this court. After a most careful review of all the evidence preserved in the record, we find that there are but three facts appearing therefrom which are relied upon by counsel as supporting that alleged fraudulent conspiracy. One is that two of the witnesses mentioned are blood relations of appellant, namely, her mother, Mrs. Harrell, and her uncle, Ezekiel Dooley; second, that two other of her witnesses, James Collins and J. W. Cooksey, have claims pending against the estate; and, third, that the latter two expect appellant to testify in their favor when their claims are heard. It will be noticed that the majority opinion lays great stress upon the fact that James Collins and Ezekiel Dooley, two of Iowa Harrell's witnesses, had those claims pending against the estate of Caleb Collins, and it holds that their testimony is unworthy of belief for that reason; yet there was not a word of testimony introduced tending in the remotest degree to show that either of them were not just demands, or that a fraudulent conspiracy had been entered into between them to loot and sack the estate of Caleb Collins. There was no charge of conspiracy presented by the pleadings, and she was given no opportunity to meet such an issue. Without plea or evidence it is arbitrarily held that there was a conspiracy existing between them, simply because they had claims pending against the estate, and, as before stated, without a word of testimony tending to show that they were unjust, the majority opinion virtually holds such conspiracy actually existed, and that all of the claims were fraudulent, and that none of her witnesses were worthy of belief. In reply to that contention, it might be suggested that those facts are more in the nature of coincidences, rather than evidence of the existence of fraudulent conspiracy. The existence of those facts is not unusual or out of the ordinary; but, if fraudulent, that fact should have been proven. If a child of that age had made a contract of the character mentioned, who would most likely know of it? Of course, her mother and relations. Many estates have one or more claims presented against them, and it is not unusual for the owner of one claim to have knowledge of the existence of the other which would make him a material witness if the claimant should see proper to use him as such. Fraud is never presumed to exist, but must be established by evidence just as any other fact must be established; and, in the absence of all such evidence, as in this case, the court would not be justified in drawing the conclusion from those facts alone that a conspiracy existed among the various persons mentioned to defraud the estate. While such interest should be weighed and considered along with all the other facts and circumstances in determining what weight should be given to their testimony, yet their co-existence alone should not, as a matter of law, brand all of the claims as spurious and fraudulent, as is virtually held in this case. Besides all that, there is not a breath of suspicion cast against the honesty, morality, or veracity of any of the witnesses, except in one or two instances, where it was attempted to show contradictory statements regarding matters which were wholly irrelevant and immaterial to the issues involved in the case. Under our statute interest alone in the result of a suit does not disqualify a witness from testifying, but such interest may be shown to affect his credibility; but that alone, as a rule, does not destroy the total weight of such witness' testimony. If that were true, then it would be a vain and useless thing to place an interested person upon the witness stand for any purpose. We have carefully considered the testimony of respondents' witnesses, and there is nothing therein to contradict or militate against the conclusions before stated.

This brings us to the consideration of respondents' second contention, namely, that even though the court should believe that the testimony of intervenor's witnesses is true, yet it is insisted that all the evidence shows that Mr. Collins only intended to make a voluntary gift of the farm to appellant, and not a contract by which he bound himself to convey it to her, and, that being true, a court of equity will not specifically enforce such proposed gift. If we correctly understand counsel for respondents, this is their main reliance in this case, and that they lay much more stress upon this contention than they place upon the question previously discussed regarding the credibility of the witnesses; but, preliminary to the observations I desire to make in this case, I wish to state that I am not unmindful of the importance of section 3418, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1951), commonly called the "statute of frauds," which requires all contracts for the sale of land to be in writing, and signed by the party thereto who is sought to be charged thereby. So impressed am I with the wisdom of that enactment, that I am thoroughly convinced in my own mind that one of the most serious errors this court has ever committed was in holding that, when such a contract has been executed by one of the parties thereto, equity should relieve him from the operation of that statute. By so doing it has written into the statute an exception which the Legislature never enacted or intended to exist. That judicial interpolation owes its existence to what is known in the law as "hard cases make bad laws." That is literally true in this instance, and if the courts would only bear in mind, when dealing with hard cases, that bad laws produce so much more wrong and injustice than hard cases do, then I apprehend there would be less bad laws and fewer unjust decisions found in our reports. And I am also deeply impressed with the wrong and injustice which is constantly growing out of that exception that I would, if my voice would wipe it from our jurisprudence, not hesitate one moment in so expressing myself. The original object the courts wished to accomplish by writing that exception into the statute was to relieve a party from its harsh operation who had performed his part of the contract, and thereby avoid the unjust results flowing from the refusal of the other party to perform his part thereof, and at the same time retain the consideration paid to or received by him; but later, during the growth and development of that doctrine, designing persons availed themselves of that exception by bringing suit upon trumped-up contracts, and relied upon perjured testimony for their specific performance. So numerous were those cases, the courts again felt called upon to improvise another rule by which to qualify the broad exception before written into the statute, and thereby circumscribe and prevent the wholesale frauds which were slipping through that exception. They adopted the rule now in force, which requires the plaintiff to plead the contract of sale with certainty in all of its details, and to prove the same by such a preponderance of the testimony so as to leave no room for reasonable doubt in the mind of the chancellor as to its existence, as it is written in many of the reported cases. By reading those cases it will be seen that many a designing landowner has taken advantage of the strictness of that rule, and has under the cloak thereof approached minors, widows, and orphans, also ignorant and confiding persons, who are not infrequently ignorant of the statute of frauds and of the law of contracts, and by means of vague and indefinite promises and innuendoes has caused them to believe he intended to give them lands in consideration of services to be performed by them for him during his old and declining days, and by that means has secured their services for years without being required to pay one cent therefor. In my judgment the rule, if tolerated at all, should operate alike upon both parties to the contract. If the promises and innuendoes are sufficiently specific and definite as to cause the minor to believe, and the members of her family and friends to believe, as in the case at bar, she was working for and in consideration of his promise to give her the farm, then when he received her services under that promise the courts should not hesitate in holding that it was sufficiently definite and certain to bind the landowner also; otherwise he would receive the benefit of her services without paying one cent therefor. Before concluding these preliminary remarks, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not mean hereby to cast any aspersion whatever upon the character or reputation of Mr. Caleb Collins, but, upon the contrary, by reading this record, one must conclude that he was a good, just, and charitable man; and, if Iowa Harrell is deprived of that which she has earned by serving him, then that wrong and injustice cannot be charged up to him, but must be laid at the door of those who are claiming unjustly that which they did not earn.

If we were to ignore the relations that existed between Mr. Collins and the appellant at the time of and prior to the date of the alleged contract, and also disregard the testimony of Mrs. Harrell, Ezekiel Dooley and his wife, Stella Dooley, and consider only the testimony of the remaining witnesses introduced by her, in conjunction with respondents' evidence, then there would be some force and plausibility in that contention, for, when thus segregated and considered alone, it might look as though he intended to deed her the farm as a voluntary gift or donation; but when we consider the fact that Mr. Collins was not related to appellant, that he had no natural claims upon her, that she owed him no legal duty to keep house and serve him free of charge, that, in the absence of an understanding to the contrary, he would have been legally liable to her for all such services she might render unto him, and when we consider the positive and unequivocal testimony of Mrs. Harrell, Mr. and Mrs. Dooley, who above all others ought to have known of the existence of the contract if it was actually made, instead of looking upon their testimony with suspicion because of the relations existing between them and the appellant, we are of the opinion that such fact should be reckoned in her favor, and we would look upon the contract with much suspicion if the record had disclosed the fact that her mother and near relations had no knowledge of its existence. Of course, and as before stated, that relationship should be considered in weighing their testimony, as in any other case, but should not, in the absence of all evidence, brand the transaction as a fraudulent conspiracy to rob the estate of Mr. Collins. When the entire case is thus viewed, the conclusion to our minds seems to be irresistible that the contract stated in the petition was actually entered into by them; and if we view and weigh the testimony of the other witnesses in the case in connection with and in the light of the above facts, it corroborates and strengthens the position above stated, rather than militates against it, for the reason that it shows that the statements of Mr. Collins made to the various witnesses, regarding his intention to deed the farm to Iowa, related to and were prompted by his contractual obligation to do so, and not out of a spirit of charity and benevolence entertained by him, and thereby ignore all legal and moral obligations he owed her for the years of care and toil she had so faithfully performed for him. Such a view by Mr. Collins of the situation would have detracted from the merits and virtues of appellant by treating her services as practically worthless, when all the evidence is to the contrary, and would brand him as being a penurious, unjust man, designingly accepting her years of faithful toil without compensating her therefor. This idea is also in conflict with all the evidence in the case—in fact, all parties admit that he was a liberal-minded, generous man, upright and just in all of his dealings. The fact that he had a fixed and definite purpose to deed the farm to her and to will his other property to his kindred indicates that his intention was not to make her a present of the property, but that it was his intention to convey it to her in fulfillment of his contract with her. While, upon the other hand, if it had been his intention to make a gift of the farm to her, he would most likely have said that he intended willing it to her, as that was the mode by which he repeatedly expressed his intention of giving away his other property.

We are therefore clearly of the opinion that the contract stated in the petition was made and entered into by and between Mr.

Collins and the appellant, and that it was fully and completely executed on her part, and to deny specific performance of the contract at this time would work irreparable injury to her, deprive her of all compensation for the years of faithful care taken of him, honest services performed in his behalf, and turn that justly earned compensation over to his collateral kindred, who had no moral or equitable claims upon him or his bounty outside of the cold letter of the statute of descent and distribution. Such a descent and distribution of the land in question under the facts and circumstances of this case would be unjust, inequitable, and shocking to the mind of the chancellor, and should not be tolerated for a moment.

2. It is next insisted by counsel for appellant that, if it be conceded the contract was actually entered into by and between Mr. Collins and Iowa Harrell, still specific performance of the contract should be denied, for the reason, they contend, that the evidence shows that she violated the provisions of the contract by leaving him and going to Leroy, Kan., with her mother, and there remaining for three or four months without his consent or permission. It is a conceded fact that she did leave the home of Mr. Collins in the year 1902 for a period of about four months and resided with her mother during that time in the town of Leroy, Kan., but why she left, and whether it was with or without his permission, does not satisfactorily appear from the record. It is true, one witness for respondents testified that Mr. Collins stated to him, not, however, in the presence or hearing of Iowa or her mother, that he thought they left him for the purpose of compelling him to convey them some of his property, but that he did not propose to do so. Conceding the competency of that evidence, without deciding it, we are of the opinion that it is entitled to no weight or consideration, for the reason that no such issue was made in the case, and, even though it had been made, the undisputed evidence shows that she returned to his home within a few months and resumed her former position and performed the same services without objection on his part from that time until the day of his death, which was in August, 1905. Under those facts he himself would not be heard to say, after accepting her services for a period of three years or more after her return, that she violated the contract, and on that account she should not be permitted to recover, much less should his collateral heirs be permitted after his death to enter that objection against her right to recover in this case. Besides all that, Mr. Burchette testified that, in a conversation he had with Mr. Collins while appellant and her mother were in Leroy, Kan., he said that they had advanced schools out there, and that he intended to fix up his business the best he could and go out there and make his home with appellant and her mother. This evidence was competent and was apparently wholly disinterested. It shows there was no estrangement existing between them during the period of her absence from home, and strongly indicates that her stay in Kansas was agreeable to him, and that he was going to shortly join them at Leroy. So, if we view this question from any point we may, the evidence shows that it is totally destitute of all merit and should not operate in any manner to bar specific performance of the contract.

3. Learned counsel for respondents insist and argue with much force and ingenuity that Mrs. Harrell was not a competent witness to testify in the case, for the reason, alleged, that she was a party to the contract; that is, her assent to the contract made between Mr. Collins and her infant daughter was necessary before the contract would have become binding on the latter. Concede that to be true, then the contract would have been only voidable and not void on account of her infancy, and after she went on and faithfully performed her part of it, it would not now lie in the mouths of respondents, after the contract had been fully executed, to say it was voidable at the time it was entered into, because of her infancy. That being true, it was wholly immaterial, in so far as the binding force of the contract was concerned, whether her mother, her natural guardian, assented to the contract or not. But returning to the question in hand. There is not a scintilla of evidence in the case which tends to show Mrs. Harrell was a party to the contract, or that she was requested to, or that she ever gave her assent to, her daughter's entering into the contract in question, without silent acquiescence might be considered such assent; but, however that might be, such assent would not make her a party to the contract in a legal sense. If so, then all parents would become parties to contracts made by their minor children, provided they know of the contract and failed to protest against it. If they protested, of course, such protest would nullify the contract; ergo there could be no contract with a minor without the parent of the child is also a party to it. Such is the logical sequence of counsel's argument, and effectually refutes the soundness thereof. We must therefore hold that Mrs. Harrell was not a party to the contract within the legal signification of those words, and, consequently, that she was a competent witness in the case.

4. After deferring somewhat to the findings of the trial court in this cause, a careful reading of the evidence and a due consideration thereof have fully convinced us that the findings of the learned court are against the weight of the evidence, as disclosed by the record, and that the judgment rendered thereby in favor of respondents is for the wrong parties, and is against right, justice, and equity.

We therefore, under and by authority of the law as stated in the case of Gibbs v. Haughwout, supra, reverse the judgment of the lower court, and remand the cause, with directions to that court to enter a decree in favor of appellant, specifically enforcing the contract stated in her cross-bill according to the prayer thereof.

CHILDERS v. PICKENPAUGH et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Feb. 25, 1909. Rehearing Denied
April 13, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 593*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

Hearsay testimony, though not objected to, has no weight or probative force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 593.*]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 295*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to warrant a finding that a debtor conveyed property with intent to defraud his creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 301*)—FRAUD OF GRANTEE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a grantee participated in the fraud of the grantor conveying land to defraud creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 301.*]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 74*)—GIFTS BY INSOLVENT.

A gift by an insolvent is a fraud in law on his creditors.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County; Geo. W. Wannamaker, Judge.

Action by William H. Childers against Napoleon B. Pickenpaugh and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is a companion suit to the one involved in appeal No. 13,657, now pending in this court, the two cases growing out of a former suit by the law firms of Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., as plaintiffs, against Napoleon B. Pickenpaugh, one of the respondents in the case at bar, as defendant, in which said Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., on the 26th day of April, 1904, obtained a judgment for $1,750 against said N. B. Pickenpaugh for attorney's fees for services rendered in a suit by said N. B. Pickenpaugh against the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company for $20,000 damages for personal injuries. That suit was filed in the circuit court of Sullivan county on the 18th day of March, 1902, and at the April term of said court following the railroad company appeared and filed its application and bond for a change of forum, and the change was awarded to the United States Circuit Court, Western division, Western district, at Kansas City, Mo. After reaching the federal court, the cause was first continued on motion by the railway company to compel plaintiff therein to file cost bond, and at the next term the cause was again continued, because plaintiff's injuries rendered him unable to appear in court. These continuances in the federal court carried the case over until the April term, 1903, of that court, it being at that term set for hearing on May 12th. Some time the last of April, or the first of May, that year, the plaintiff in that suit, without the knowledge or consent of his attorneys, entered into some sort of an agreement, the nature of which is not shown, with the railroad company, by which he agreed to and did dismiss it when it was called for trial; plaintiffs claiming he compromised and settled the case against the railroad company for a large sum of money, and in consequence thereof agreed to dismiss the suit, while, upon the other hand, N. B. Pickenpaugh, the plaintiff in that suit, testified that he never received a cent in compromise of the case, but that he voluntarily dismissed the same.

When plaintiffs in this suit learned of the agreement of compromise or dismissal, they requested a settlement and payment to them of their proportionate part of the amount received from the railway company on compromise as per his contract with them, but he refused to pay them one cent, and defiantly told them if they could get anything off of him "they were welcome to it." After this interview a number of letters were addressed to him requesting settlement, the last one on August 23d, and is as follows:

"Milan, Mo., Aug. 23rd, 1903. N. B. Pickenpaugh, Esq., Lucerne, Missouri—Dear Sir: We have repeatedly, on behalf of Harber & Knight and ourselves, written you requesting that you take some steps toward a settlement with us for time, services and expenses while caring for your interests in the case against the Milwaukee Railroad Company. To all these requests you have turned a deaf ear, and each letter you have absolutely ignored. Now we beg to say to you frankly and positively that unless you make some satisfactory settlement with us for this fee in the next few days we will submit our claim to the November term of the Putnam county circuit court, and abide its judgment as to the amount you should pay. Please give this matter your immediate attention. Respectfully, Childers Bros."

Plaintiffs failing to receive a reply to this letter, and failing to reach any settlement of their claim for fees due them for services rendered by them in the case of Pickenpaugh against the railroad company, did, on October 22, 1903, bring suit therefor in the circuit court of Putnam county, at the November term, 1903. On application of defendant that case was continued until the April term, 1904. Defendant answered at that term, and on the 26th day of April a trial was had—the defendant, though present took no part therein—which resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs for the sum of $1,750.

No part of this judgment having been paid, the plaintiffs therein, on the 7th day of August, 1905, caused to be issued out of the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Putnam county, Mo., an execution against the defendant therein, and delivered the same to the sheriff, who, on the 9th day of August, 1905, seized and levied on the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 8, all in township 65, of range 20, Putnam county, together with other lands, and sold the same to satisfy that judgment. At that sale, under that execution, which occurred September 8, 1905, the plaintiff, and appellant herein, became the purchaser, and received, filed, and recorded his sheriff's deed. Possession of the land being refused, he brought this action in two counts, the first to set aside a deed dated on the 28th day of August, 1903, by N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife to his son, C. A. Pickenpaugh, on the ground that it was made to defraud creditors, and for the further reason that, after the issuance, levy, and seizure under the execution, the defendant, C. A. Pickenpaugh (one of the respondents herein), has changed, altered, interlined, and placed in said deed other lands at that time belonging to the defendant, N. B. Pickenpaugh, to wit, the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, of range 20. The second count of the petition was ejectment.

The evidence tended to prove the following facts on behalf of plaintiffs: That, when N. B. Pickenpaugh employed plaintiff and others to prosecute his suit against the railroad company, he had in his own name 480 acres of land, 97 head of cattle, 20 head of horses and mules, a number of sheep and hogs, and some other personal property, all of which was reasonably worth $14,000; and that the lands involved in this suit were a part of the lands above mentioned, belonging to N. B. Pickenpaugh.

On August 28, 1903, respondent, N. B. Pickenpaugh, and wife conveyed to their son and co-respondent, C. A. Pickenpaugh, the west half of the northeast quarter of section 7, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 8, all in township 65, of range 20, leaving N. B. Pickenpaugh the record owner of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of said section 7. That he remained the owner thereof until after the issuance and levy of the execution on the 9th day of August, 1905, which was issued August 7th, upon the judgment aforesaid for $1,750. After the levy and seizure as above mentioned, this deed was changed and erased, and when so changed it was a deed to the north one-half of the northeast quarter, instead of the west one-half of the northeast quarter, as it was at the time of its execution and delivery, and at the time of the issuance and levy of said execution. The deed in this changed condition was, on the 17th day of August, 1905, refiled and re-recorded, without being reacknowledged. That respondent C. A. Pickenpaugh had the scrivener who wrote the deed to make the change above mentioned by erasing the letter "W" from the deed and writing the word "North" in lieu thereof, making the deed read "North one-half" instead of "West one-half," as it read at the time it was acknowledged and recorded.

The date of the contract by which N. B. Pickenpaugh employed Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., to bring suit for him against the railroad company was November 30, 1901.

Some little time prior to the time N. B. Pickenpaugh conveyed the 120 acres to his son, he also conveyed 120 acres to one Williams, and on the 26th day of April, 1904, he conveyed to Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, his father, a resident of Iowa, 120 acres.

On May 22, 1903, an execution was issued on a judgment, dated April 10, 1903, in favor of the National Bank of Unionville and against N. B. Pickenpaugh, for $261.36, interest, and costs, amounting to $310.11. The sheriff's return shows that on May 28, 1903, he made diligent search, and finding no personal property belonging to N. B. Pickenpaugh on which to levy the execution, etc., proceeded to and notified him that he could claim his homestead exemptions, but that he refused to do so; whereupon the sheriff selected three disinterested householders who valued and set off his homestead. Then follows a description of the land so set off to him, which was a part of the 480 acres of land he owned in Putnam county. The sheriff's return on the execution further shows that he, on the same day (May 22, 1903) levied upon all the right, title, and interest of said N. B. Pickenpaugh in and to the following described lands, to wit: The north half of the southwest quarter and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 6, and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 8, all in township 65, range 20. The return also shows that all of this land was advertised to be sold on August 27, 1903, and that on the 26th, the previous day, N. B. Pickenpaugh paid the sheriff $310.11, the full amount due on the execution in the manner hereafter stated, and the execution was returned fully satisfied. This return was made two days before the date of the deed from N. B. Pickenpaugh to C. A. Pickenpaugh.

Plaintiff also showed that Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, the father of N. B. Pickenpaugh and the grandfather of C. A. Pickenpaugh, the son of N. B., knew of the contract existing between N. B. Pickenpaugh and Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. regarding their attorney's fees in the railroad damage suit, and that he did not intend to pay it if he could prevent doing so, and that Jacob did not think their claim was an honest claim against N. B. Pickenpaugh.

C. A. Pickenpaugh had lived with his father up to the date of his marriage, which was on the 10th day of April, 1901, and he was then 22 years of age. Shortly after his marriage he moved to the 120-acre tract of land his father subsequently sold to Williams, and lived there almost a year. He then moved from there to the land conveyed to him by his father and mother on August 28, 1903, and has lived there ever since. The annual rental of those lands was worth from $1.50 to $2 per acre, and that he paid no rent therefor whatever during the two years he lived on them. Before his father sold the 120 acres to Williams he gave C. A. Pickenpaugh a house, which was standing on the Williams tract, and C. A. moved it over on the tract he had acquired from his father, but the record nowhere discloses the value of the house. At the time C. A. Pickenpaugh acquired the 120 acres of land from his father he had no money and but little property, a horse or two, a cow, and about $100 worth of corn. That the consideration expressed in the deed from N. B. Pickenpaugh to his son C. A. was $3,600.

After N. B. Pickenpaugh had agreed to dismiss his suit against the railroad company, C. A. Pickenpaugh, his son, telephoned Childers Bros., at Milan, that the suit had not been settled, and that there was then in the neighborhood a railroadman subpoenaing witnesses in the case, and thought they should look after the case, etc. In response to that telephone message, Childers Bros. wrote the following letters:

"Milan, Mo. May 9, 1903. N. B. Pickenpaugh, Esq., Lucerne, Mo.—Dear Sir: We had a 'phone message from your son this morning, purporting to be authorized by you, stating that the case against the R. R. Co. had not been dismissed, and that the Co. was now subpoenaing witnesses to appear at Kansas City on Monday. We are exceedingly sorry that matters are as they are, but feel that it is no fault of ours. You took the matter in your own hands and notified us that the case would be dismissed, and that our services were no longer needed. We thought at the time the R. R. Co. had taken advantage of your unfortunate condition and had worked upon your fears of defeat until you had concluded that it was useless to proceed further. It is now impossible in the limited time we have to subpoena witnesses in the case for Monday, and all we could hope for would be a continuance. We are only too sorry that matters are not in a shape so we could present your injuries in all their seriousness at this term of the court, but it is impossible to do so now. We beg to say, however, if you desire either ourselves, or Col. Harber, to go to Kansas City Monday and do what we can to secure a continuance, you can wire us or him, and your rights will be strenuously protected. Again expressing our sorrow, we are, respectfully, Childers Bros."

"Milan, Mo. May 28, 1903. N. B. Pickenpaugh, Esq., Lucerne, Missouri—Dear Sir: A few days since we had a 'phone message from your son, C. A. Pickenpaugh, purporting to be authorized by you, in which he said you had instructed him to 'phone us and tell us the case against the Milwaukee Railroad had not been dismissed, and trying to induce us to still make another trip to Kansas City and incur still further expenses to protect your interests in the case. At that time we told the boy you had secretly come to Milan and had secretly attempted to settle with the stenographer for taking depositions at Harris, and that when we learned you were here you refused absolutely to talk with us, or to have anything further to do with us, informed him you had told us the case was dismissed and settled, and that we were discharged, and that you had then said to us you would not pay us one cent for time or expenses. We then told him that under the circumstances we would not, and could not go to Kansas City, and for him to tell you to arrange at once to pay us a fee of $2,000. Now Mr. Pickenpaugh, we learned that at the time you sent C. A. Pickenpaugh, to 'phone us, you had secretly accepted from the railroad company a large sum of money as a compromise and settlement of the case, and at that time had agreed and arranged that the case should be dismissed, and that in pursuance to this compromise and arrangement it was called and dismissed on the 20th day of this month. Now, you have run us all over the states of Iowa and Missouri, and we have been going here and there at every beck and call that it pleased your mind to make, and at the cost of our own time and money, and now you swear for all this you will not refund or pay us one cent. Is this your idea of justice between man and man? Now, the firm of Harber & Knight and this firm together have spent in cold hard cash of their own money about $500, in chasing evidence, which in your imagination would assist you in securing compensation for your injury, and it is not our purpose to lose this, or the time consumed in running round for your benefit. How much you got for this compromise and settlement we are not advised, but under the contract we are entitled to one-third of it, and we demand that you remit that pro rata at once, or in lieu of the one-third if you will pay us $2,000 we will accept that sum and be satisfied. Take your choice, one-third of the amount compromised for or $2,000. Let us hear from you by return mail, and without delay. Respectfully Childers Bros."

Childers Bros. received no reply to any of the three letters before copied.

That on April 26, 1904, without notice to Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, his son, N. B. Pickenpaugh, conveyed to him the 120 acres of land before mentioned for a consideration of $3,000, and started at noon on that day to the home of Jacob W., in Iowa, for the purpose of delivering the deed and collecting the purchase money, and by a circuitous route reached there that same night, some time between 9 and 12 o'clock. That was the same day the judgment, of $1,750 was rendered against him for the attorney's fees.

Plaintiff offered and read in evidence tax-book for the year 1902, showing the assessment of N. B. Pickenpaugh, which shows under the head of "horses," 18, value $400; "mules," 1, $10; "neat cattle," 105, value $1,280; "sheep," 5, value $5; "hogs," 8, value $20; "other personal property," $470—total valuation by assessors, $1,785.

Claud Pickenpaugh, horses, 3, value $60; live stock, neat cattle, 2, $25; hogs, 3, $10; all other property, $35—total value, $130.

Plaintiff offered and read in evidence tax-book of assessment of 1903, showing the assessment of N. B. Pickenpaugh, horses 22, value $460; mules, 1, value $20; neat cattle, 97, value, $1,648; sheep, 4, value, $4; hogs, 24, value, $48; all other personal property, $179—total $2,359.

Claud Pickenpaugh, same year, same book: Horses, 3, value $75; cattle, 3, value $40; hogs, 2, value $5; all other personal property, $25—total $145. The tax list first read, being made in the year 1901, for the year 1902, tax list second read being made in the year 1902 for the taxes for the year 1903.

Plaintiff offered and read in evidence tax-book list for N. B. Pickenpaugh and C. A. Pickenpaugh, made in 1903, for the year 1904; Pickenpaugh, N. B., horses, 8, value, $175; neat cattle, 84, value $475; sheep, 3, value $5; hogs, 7, value $20; all other personal property, classes 3, 4, and 10, $80—total value, $755.

Pickenpaugh, C. A., horses, 5, value $125; neat cattle, 4, value, $60; hogs, 5, value $15; all other personal property, $45—total value, $240. There being no lands at either year mentioned assessed to C. A. Pickenpaugh.

It was also shown that prior to the rendition of this judgment, N. B. Pickenpaugh had disposed of all his live stock, and on that day had no real or personal property which was subject to execution.

The testimony introduced by defendants will elucidate some of the transactions before mentioned.

The testimony for defendants tended to show: A deed of trust from N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife to the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, dated November 20, 1901, for the sum of $4,200, with interest, conveying the southwest fractional quarter of section 8, the north half of the north half of section 7, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 8, all in township 63, range 20, containing 243 acres, including the land involved in this suit; also a second deed of trust executed by N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife to B. H. Bonfoey, of same date, conveying same land to secure a note for $300 with 7 per cent. interest; also a note for $210, payable in five annual installments. Both of said deeds of trust were duly recorded.

Defendants introduced the execution before mentioned in the statement of plaintiff's case, which will render it unnecessary to restate its contents here.

Squire Valentine testified, substantially, as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. Where do you live? A. I live about 10 miles south and west of here, Jackson township. Q. Do you know N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife? A. Yes, sir. Q. And C. A. Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir. Q. I will ask you to look at plaintiff's 'Exhibit C,' being the deed from N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife to C. A. Pickenpaugh, and state to the court who wrote that instrument? A. Yes, sir; that is this deed; I wrote it myself. Q. Do you know what land N. B. Pickenpaugh sold to C. A. Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir, I know; don't know as I could call the number of it. Q. You may refresh your mind by looking at the description in the deed. A. Northwest of north section 8, township 65, of range 20, and 80 acres of the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, range 20. Q. Now, Squire, when the parties came there they told you what land Pickenpaugh had sold to his son? A. Yes sir; I went to Mr. Pickenpaugh's house to make that deed. Q. And that's the land they told you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You notice there where the word 'North' is written over an erasure; how did you write that in the first place? A. N. half, instead of north. Q. Well, how does it come that the word 'North' is written in place of that? A. Claud Pickenpaugh came to my place and said that there had been a mistake in the recording of it, and they couldn't make it out anything only a 'W' instead of an 'N,' and wanted to know what to do about it, and I erased the word 'N,' and wrote 'North,' and wrote a note to Underwood and told him that I had erased that. Q. Do you know who took the deed when it was first written and acknowledged? A. I think I turned the deed over to Claud Pickenpaugh. Q. The parties were all present? A. Yes, sir; and N. B. Pickenpaugh and his wife both read the deed. Q. Do you know the land out there that was conveyed? A. Yes, sir; I am pretty well acquainted with it; been all over it. Q. Do you know whether N. B. Pickenpaugh owned the west half, south 40, of the west half? A. Don't think he did. Q. Do you know who does own it? A. No sir; I don't."

Cross-examination:

"Q. When did you first learn that N. B. Pickenpaugh wanted to make a deed? A. The day I made it. Q. Never heard of it before? A. No, sir. Q. His son was living there at that time? A. Don't think he was living in the house with N. B. Q. Was his son married at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long have you known the young man, C. A.? A. I have known him ever since we were boys together. Q. He was raised on his father's place and in his father's household? A. Yes, sir. Q. The consideration is \$3,600. Who told you to put that in? A. I suppose they did; I don't remember. Q. What else did they tell you there, if anything? A. I don't remember what they told me, what they did tell me, now. Q. No mention in it about assuming a debt or anything of that kind? A. I don't know; the deed will tell it. Q. Was you informed anything about that? A. No, sir. Q. Don't know anything about it, from what you learned of them? A. They didn't tell me anything themselves, I don't think. Q. You don't know anything about that trade? A. No, sir; just suppose it was a trade and they called me in to make the deed. Q. You didn't see any money paid? A. No, sir. Q. Didn't see any notes given? A. Well, I don't know as I did; I don't remember about that. Q. Do you have any recollection of seeing any money paid or notes given there that day? A. Well, I don't recollect whether I did or not. The understanding was, the way I understood it was, that C. A. Pickenpaugh was getting the money from his grandfather to pay. Q. Who did you understand that from? A. Well, I understood it from C. A. Pickenpaugh and his grandfather. Q. His grandfather, wasn't there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you make a deed to his grandfather at that time? A. I made a trust deed or mortgage. Q. What was done with that? A. His grandfather took it. Q. You knew C. A. Pickenpaugh had nothing? A. I don't know anything about what he had. Q. You lived there in the neighborhood and knew all the land in the neighborhood? A. Of course he didn't own any land. Q. You knew he had no personal property? You never knew him owning any up to that time? A. Owned some; a team, and cows, and such as that. Q. I say was that all you ever knew of him owning. A. It is all I ever knew personally of him owning; I know he had a team and some cows and horses, and such as that. Q. How much was all the personal property that you knew of him owning worth at that time? A. I don't know. Q. Couple hundred dollars? A. Yes, sir; I expect more. Q. Well, how much? A. I don't know. Q. Some time in August last C. A. Pickenpaugh came to you and told you this deed was recorded as being the west half in place of the north half? A. Yes, sir; some time this last summer. Q. Who else was present at that time? A. My wife and children. Q. And you observed the deed at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. He had been to the recorder with it prior to coming to you to get the recorder to correct it? A. I think he had. Q. And told you the recorder would not correct it? A. Yes, sir. Q. The recorder said it was recorded as it was written? A. Said it was recorded as the west half in place of the north. Q. Then there was nobody else there except you and your family and C. A. Pickenpaugh? A. No, sir. Q. You made this correction there perfectly apparent putting the north half in place of the west half? A. Yes, sir. Q. And handed it back to C. A. Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that was the 17th of August? A. Don't remember what time it was. Q. You never took a reacknowledgment of it? A. No, sir. Q. And the deed—he left with the deed for the purpose of having it recorded? A. Yes, sir, he told me he wanted to get it changed on the record, or re-recorded. Q. This correction that you made there now is perfectly apparent, isn't it? A. Yes, sir; there's where I corrected it; it was an 'N' there in place of 'North.' Q. You have erased the letter that was recorded by the recorder and written in the word 'North,' adding the figure $\frac{1}{2}$? A. The figure $\frac{1}{2}$ was there. Q. Were these figures that appear there now there then? A. I think they are. Q. Wasn't that $\frac{1}{2}$ made at the same time you wrote the word 'North' there? A. Well, I don't remember, but I had to erase that to get the word 'North' in. Q. You did erase something in the deed? A. I erased the letter

'N.' Q. And the '1/2' was in there? I will ask you if you didn't also erase the '1/2'? A. I don't know. Q. Wasn't that '1/2' made at the same time and with the same pen and ink as the word 'North'? A. It looks like the same ink, and it might be. I erased it to get the word 'North' in; looks like the same ink. Q. It was not made at the same time the body of the deed was written in? A. It don't look like the same ink."

Redirect examination:

"Q. Mr. Harber gets you to say that you erased 'W' there and wrote 'North.' Did you mean to say that? A. I didn't erase 'W,' I erased the letter 'N,' that's the letter that I erased was the letter 'N.' Q. Do you know whether or not he did make a loan of his grandfather? A. I think, if I ain't mistaken, I wrote the mortgage or trust deed. Q. You wrote the note? A. I think so, from Claud to his grandfather. Q. And Claud and his wife both signed it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And signed the deed of trust? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was to Jacob, the grandfather? A. I don't remember his name, only Claud's grandfather Pickenpaugh."

Recross-examination:

"Q. If the letter 'N' was so plain, then what would be the use of erasing it? A. It was plain to me, but I don't suppose it was to the recorder. Q. He told you he had been to the recorder and tried to get him to record it as an 'N'? A. Yes, sir. Q. And when the recorder refused to do it and insisted upon it being a 'W,' then you took your pen and erased it and changed it? A. Yes, sir; I did, and it was the letter 'N.'"

Mr. Arthur Young testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. What official position do you hold? A. Collector of Jackson township; township taxes. Q. You know the Pickenpaughs? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know of this land that Claud bought of his father? A. Yes, sir. Q. Can you give the numbers of it? A. Well, I don't say that I can, but I think the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7; but the 40, I couldn't say I could give that. Q. It is right east of it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Can you give the numbers of it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You have a farm adjoining that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know whether or not this land that Claud bought of his father in 1903 was advertised for sale under an execution? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was there anything said to you about buying it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Why did they want to sell it? A. For to pay off a security note. Q. A bank judgment? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did they offer you the land for? A. $25 an acre. Q. What would you say the land was worth? A. I had offered him $25 before that, and he wouldn't take it. Q. Who had been paying the taxes for that since that time? A. Claud Pickenpaugh. Q. Who has been farming it? A. Claud Pickenpaugh as a renter. Q. Wasn't he farming it that year, 1903; remember when he rented it?

A. Well, I think he plowed some that fall; I think he bought it in 1903."

Cross-examination:

"Q. How long have you been collecting taxes up there? A. I collected two years before this year. Q. You collected in 1903-04-05? A. Yes, sir. Q. How much property has Claud Pickenpaugh been paying taxes on aside from this land, if any? A. Well, I don't know as I can say exactly. Q. I don't expect you can tell exactly. A. Two or three hundred—about three hundred. Q. How long have you known him? A. We were boys together. Q. How old are you? A. Thirty-two. Q. Prior to his marriage where did he live? With whom? A. With his father then. Q. How long has he been married? A. Four years. Q. How long after he was married until he moved onto this land? A. About a year and a half, I reckon. Q. Where did he live that year and a half? A. North of Central City. Q. On part of his father's land? A. Yes, sir. Q. The part that he afterwards conveyed to Claud's grandfather? A. No, sir. Q. Conveyed to Mr. Williams? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did his grandfather live then? A. I think in the east end of the county. Q. How long has it been since he lived in this county, the grandfather, Jacob Pickenpaugh? A. Well, I can't just say when he left, but he came from Plano, Iowa, to pay his taxes last year. Q. And this is about the same quality of land as they conveyed to the grandfather? A. Yes, sir."

Mr. Jacob Pickenpaugh testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. Mr. Pickenpaugh, where do you live? A. I live at the present time in Plano, Iowa. Q. Where had you lived before going to Plano? A. In Grant township, east part of this county. Q. How long had you lived in this county? A. About 40 years. Q. You are the father of N. B. Pickenpaugh and grandfather of Claud Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you present at your son's, N. B. Pickenpaugh, in August two years ago, when N. B. Pickenpaugh and his wife made a deed to Claud Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir. Q. You may state, Mr. Pickenpaugh, whether or not you made a loan of money to your grandson at that time? A. Yes, sir; I loaned him $310.20, if I am not mistaken. Q. Did you take your grandson's note for it? A. Yes, sir; took a mortgage on the 40's of land. Q. Were these the same 40's of land that his father deeded to him? A. Yes, sir. Q. You saw the land, did you? A. Why, yes, sir; I have seen the land a number of times. Q. Can you tell if it lays, the three 40's, in a string, east and west? A. Yes, sir. Q. And joins right up to his other land on the west of it? A. It corners with the land that N. B.'s house is on, I think. Q. Do you know what their purpose was in selling this land? A. Well, yes, sir; I think I do. Q. Tell the court. A. The purpose was to pay his honest debts. Q. Was there any debts then pressing him? A. Yes, sir. Q. What debt was it? A. A debt that the bank had against N. B. Q. Had an execution out? A. Yes, sir, and the land advertised for sale. Q. Now, to whom was that $310 paid? A. Why, that $310 was paid to Sheriff Crooks. Q. Who paid it? A. I did. Q. And your grandson gave you a note and deed of trust for it then? A. Yes, sir."

Cross-examination:

"Q. Let me see that note, please. You say this was all one transaction, the making of the deed and the giving of the note? A. All done at the same time. Q. And all on the same date? A. Yes, sir; Mr. Valentine drew the note and drew the mortgage. Q. And you still have the note? A. Yes, sir; I have the note and mortgage. Q. Mortgage on the same land? A. Yes, sir. Q. Recorded? A. Yes, sir. Q. Note has never been paid to you? A. Why, no; if it was, I wouldn't have the note, I presume. Q. Mr. Pickenpaugh, your son, N. B., at that time had a considerable amount of stock on hands, did he not? A. Well, yes, sir; I think he had some stock; I don't know how much, though. Q. Had 97 head of cattle, didn't he, on the place at that time? A. No, I think not that many at that time. Q. You don't know whether he had 97 head of cattle and 27 head of horses? A. No, sir; he had some horses and cattle, but how much he had, I don't know. Q. He was quite a large farmer, and continued so until he conveyed his land, part to his boy and part to you? A. Why, he had some left. Q. He conveyed part of it to you afterwards? A. He conveyed 120 acres to me, but I paid him for it. Q. Conveyed it to you when you were not in this state? A. I lived—when the deed was brought to me, I lived in the state of Iowa. Q. He conveyed the land to you when you were not here, and not even in the state? A. I have told you. Q. Tell me again. A. He brought the deed to me in Plano in Iowa. Q. And did pretend to have a deed made to you on the 26th day of April, 1904? Was you in this county or state at that time? A. No, not on that date, I wasn't. Q. Then you wasn't here when that pretended deed was made to you, and even when it was recorded? A. No, sir; I sent it to the recorder. Q. When did you first learn of that deed? A. If it is necessary for me to go into details, I will tell it. When I first learned of the deed— Q. By the Court: That is what he asked you. A. I had let N. B. have $600 in money, and at the time I made a contract with him that I was to have a 120 acres of land there and assume a mortgage of $2,400 and give him $600 when he made me a deed; and he brought me the deed and I gave him the $600. Q. Were you in this county or in this state at the time that the deed purported to have been made to you on the 26th day of April, 1904? A.

No, I was in the state of Iowa. Q. You know nothing about him going to Squire Helferstine at that time and try to have him make a deed and take his wife's acknowledgment over the telephone? A. I don't know anything about the deed; all I know about the deed is simply this: We had a contract that I was to assume the payment of that $2,400, and when he made me a deed I was to pay him $600, and that's what I done. He brought me the deed in Iowa. Q. When was it brought to you? A. I think he brought it—I wouldn't say positively as to the date. I think, though, it is just probable, maybe the next day after it was made; I ain't sure about that; wouldn't say positively. Q. Did you know court was in session here at that time? A. Well, I don't remember. Q. Did you know there was a suit pending against him at that time? A. Probably I did. Q. Don't you know as a matter of fact that the very day that this deed purports to have been made to you for the 120 acres of this land, the 26th day of April, 1904, that your son, N. B. Pickenpaugh, was right in this court pretending to desire a continuance in this very case in order that his lawyer might get here, and during the time that he was so pretending that he made this deed? A. I don't know about that. Q. Didn't he tell you there was a suit against him? A. I don't recollect whether he did or not. Q. Do you pretend to tell the court that you don't know there was a suit pending then at that very time? A. I may have known it; I am not positive about that; don't know whether I did or not. Q. Didn't he tell you he had left his wife in town and that they would telephone for him, and he came there to tell you about the suit? A. I don't know anything about that; I know he brought me the deed, and that's all I know about it; I wasn't there. Q. Did you give him $600 by check or count it out in cash? A. Counted it out in cash. Q. Had it there in the bureau drawer; where did you have it? A. I had it in the safe. Q. At home? A. I have got a safe and I keep my valuables there. Q. How much other money did you have there? A. Well, I don't just remember how much; probably from $600 to $800 more. Q. You had from $1,200 to $1,400 in your safe? A. I think I had about $1,500. Q. And you just counted him out the cash on the day he brought you the deed? A. Yes, sir. Q. You don't know whether he told you he left court and there was a suit pending against him? A. No, sir; don't recollect of him telling me anything about it. Q. You say you had some kind of an agreement before that at some time, when he would make a deed to a 120 acres—the time was not set? A. I don't think there was any specific time set for him to make it. Q. But at such time as he saw fit to make it you would assume $2,400? A. He wanted me to take the land and pay the

$2,400 debt for him and let him have some money to pay some other debts that he was owing, and, in order to help him out, I done it. Q. You had some talk with him before making this deed, in which you had told him that if at some time he would make you a deed to this land, that you would assume $2,400 and give him $600? A. Yes, sir; I think we had a kind of a written contract. Q. Where is that written contract? A. I don't know just where it is. Q. When did you see it last? A. I think when I paid him the money I gave him up the contract. Q. Who wrote it? A. I think I wrote it myself. Q. Well, you knew there was no time as to when the conveyance was to be made? A. I don't think there was, if I remember right. Q. Or when the money was to be paid? A. I think, as near as I remember about the matter is this: That when he made me a deed for that 120 acres of land that I was to give him $600 in money and assume the payment of this $2,400, and I gave him the money and notified Mr. Brawford—he was the agent—that the money was got through, and notified Mr. Brawford that I had got the land. Q. Have you ever paid the $2,400? A. No, sir; I have not paid the $2,400, but I have paid the interest on it. Q. At that time Pickenpugh, your son, wasn't owing you anything? A. After I paid him the $600. Q. The consideration for the land was, you was assuming the debt of $2,400 and paying him $600? A. Yes, sir; there was other notes that I had paid for him at other times. Q. Did you count them? A. Not in that transaction. Q. You was just paying him the $600 and keeping these notes and other obligations to him? A. Yes, sir. Q. And in your talk about the purchase of this land there was nothing said about you taking out your accounts against him? A. Well, he wanted the money, and wanted me to carry the other notes. I had a note against him that I paid Mr. Bonfoey $321, I think it was; I have that note yet. Q. You was simply trading for the 120 acres of land? A. I simply bought the 120 acres of land to help him pay his honest debts. Q. You didn't know what the effect would be on a suit pending and judgment rendered if you wouldn't do this, did you, or stop to inquire? A. Why, no; I didn't know that, or stop to inquire anything about it. I just paid him the money as I had agreed to do when he made me the deed. Q. When had you been down to his house prior to this? A. Why, I hadn't been there prior to that. The day I let Claud have this money and this mortgage and notes to Claud was executed, that was the last time I had been there. Q. That was in 1908? By the Court: Was that when you made that contract? A. No, sir; when we made this contract about the 120 acres of land he was at my house—come to see me. Q. When was the first time you ever talked about it? A. As near as I remember the time, kind of made a contract and wrote up a kind of agreement, was, I think about the 18th of March, 1904. Q. No time specified when he was to make the conveyance? A. No particular time. Q. Do that whenever it suited him, or if it ever suited him? A. If he didn't do it he wouldn't have got the money. Q. It was a matter of choice entirely with him? A. Yes, sir. Q. You entered into an agreement that if he ever saw fit to convey you the 120 acres of land you would assume $2,400 or the mortgage, and pay him $600? A. That was the contract. Q. You kept it after it was written? A. I had it until he brought me the deed, and when he brought me the deed I think I gave it up to him. Q. Didn't he tell you he came from court here? A. I don't remember that he did or didn't. There's a direct railroad from our place, or within three miles of it, it goes down to Lucerne, and when he come to my place he came on that road. Q. Do you know what became of all his horses and cattle that he had at the time he was making you this deed? A. Don't know anything about that. Q. Nearly 100 head of cattle and 22 head of horses and 1 mule? A. I think the Drumm Commission Company had a lien on his cattle and horses, too, probably, though I never saw it. Q. Do you know what became of the $600 you paid him? A. Well, I think he paid the Drumm Commission Company a part of it, but just how much of it I don't know—they were pressing him. Q. And when he made this conveyance to you he made such sales as to entirely strip himself of all property that could be got at upon execution? A. Well, probably he sold all the property that would be subject to execution. Q. Prior to that time he had always been good upon execution, hadn't he? A. I think so. Q. But after that time there was no chance to collect a dollar from him, after you and the son got through your dealing? A. We paid every dollar the property was worth. Q. You know the usual rule is not to loan to exceed 40 per cent. of the appraised value? A. I don't know. Q. You don't know who appraised it? A. No, sir; I don't. Q. You say you wrote this contract that you have mentioned between you and your son? A. I think so. Q. Where? A. At home. Q. When? A. If my memory serves me right, I think it was on the 18th, may be, of March—somewhere about that time. Q. You had talked with your son about this conveyance before that? A. Before? Q. The 18th of March, the day of your sale? A. Well, it is my mistake. Q. The day of the sale was the 28th of March? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you had talked with your son about it prior to the 18th of March? A. Yes, sir; I think so. Q. And when first? A. Well, now, I couldn't tell you positively when; some time during the latter part of the winter, or about that time. Q. You lived in about 25 miles of your son ever since you left this county? A. Well, I guess it is further than 25 miles—80 or 85. Q. You.

keep in touch with his affairs all the time? A. Why, no, I don't keep in touch with his affairs. Q. What is this land worth an acre, for rent—the 120 acres you have got—$2.50? A. I don't suppose it would bring that. Q. Well, about what? Give your estimate. A. I suppose probably bring $1.75 or $2. Q. It is about the same value as land of your grandson? A. Yes, sir. Q. When did you leave? A. I left—well, my sale was on the 28th of March, and I left, I think, the thirteenth day afterward. Q. 1904? A. Yes, sir. Q. All the papers in this county published the circuit court docket preceding court? A. Probably they do. Q. You always observed that as well as other news items from this county? A. Sometimes I look at it; most generally look over the docket. Q. Don't know why he said he should make a deed at this inopportune minute? A. Didn't make any statement. Q. He came and handed you the deed and you went down in your safe and got him the $600 and the contract, and said, "Go, son"? A. I paid him his money according to the agreement. Q. How far from your house to Lucerne? A. Three miles. Q. To the railroad? A. About three miles, not quite three miles. Q. And you think he walked? A. I think so. Q. Now, Mr. Pickenpaugh, this suit here upon which this suit was rendered on April 26, 1904, was brought to and pending in the November term, 1903, of this court; did you know that? A. I don't know whether I did or not. Q. Do you want this court to believe there was a suit pending for attorney's fees against your son for $2,000 before he made this deed, and you was intimate with him, you at his house and he at yours, and you didn't know anything about it? A. I might have known there was a suit against him; I think likely I did. Q. Did you know there was a suit pending for $2,000 at the November term, 1903, and didn't you know that if your son told you it was continued, that he got a continuance because he couldn't get a lawyer that he pretended to employ in Iowa to come and try it? A. No, I know this: I know he went some time to see Howell on some business but my impression was that he was going to hire Howell to conduct a suit against the railroad company. Q. Tell the court whether or not prior to November, 1903, you were not taking a paper in this county? A. Prior to November? Q. Yes, sir, 1903? A. I think I was taking, prior to November, two of them. Q. How many times do you say your son Napoleon, between the 22nd day of October, 1903, and the time of the delivery to you of this deed, in April, 1904, was in Iowa, at your house? A. Well, I couldn't tell positively. Q. Some half dozen times? A. Well, probably not that often; I don't remember just how often I saw him."

Redirect examination:

"Q. Mr. Pickenpaugh, something said here about a suit your son intended to bring against the railroad company; when was your son hurt? A. Well, I couldn't give the date; I don't remember. Q. About four years ago, wasn't it? A. I think so. Q. In 1901? A. Yes, sir. Q. What has been his health and ability to carry on his farm and conduct his business since that time? A. Well, he has had no health, and a good deal of the time he is incapacitated for business, even to look after his interests. Q. Well, his business has been in a failing condition ever since he was hurt? A. Yes, sir. Q. Been going down? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, Mr. Harber asked you about him having something like 97 head of cattle and a lot of horses? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know whether there was a mortgage for a considerable sum on that stock? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know what the mortgage amounted to? A. I don't know. Q. To what proportion of their value? A. I never knew what the amount of that mortgage was. Q. Now, you say that your recollection is that you executed that contract for the purchase of this land, you think, on the 18th of March, 1904? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you give it up when you got the deed? A. I think so. Q. Do you recollect whether or not you entered a memorandum on the back of the contract of the date when you received the deed? A. Why, probably I did. Q. Look at this paper and see if you can tell what it is (witness here handed paper)? Q. You say you gave the contract up at the time you got the deed; have you seen it since? A. No, sir. Q. Look at that and see what it is, please? A. Well, that's a memorandum of the contract. Q. Is that the contract, the written contract, that you and your son signed? A. Yes, sir. Q. Read it, please. By Mr. Harber: Let me see it. (Paper handed Mr. Harber.) By Judge Higbee: Now, read it, please. A. 'March 18, 1904. This day N. B. Pickenpaugh has sold to J. W. Pickenpaugh the northwest quarter of section No. 7, township 68, and range 20 in Putnam county Missouri, for $3,000; $2,400 on a loan on said land and $600 cash when deed is made.' Q. Whose signature to that? A. N. B. Pickenpaugh and J. W. Pickenpaugh. Q. Are those the signatures of yourself and son, N. B.? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that the contract you spoke of as having written at the time? A. Yes, sir. Q. What memorandum is on the back of that? A. 'Delivered April 26, and $600 paid.' Q. What date is that—what year? A. 1904. Q. Who wrote that on there? A. I did; it is my handwrite. Q. Was that the day he delivered the deed to you? A. I think so. Q. That whole contract is in your handwriting? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, Mr. Pickenpaugh, I will ask you to state to the court whether or not you know of your son being indebted in any sum to Harber & Knight or Childers Bros? A. Well, I know there was a contract drawn up between Harber & Knight, and they was to prosecute a case for him for 33 per cent. of what they would get, and after that, some time afterward, they drew up another contract for 15 per cent. more. Q. I will ask you if you know whether or not your son owed them any money at the time you made this contract for the land? A. I knew that the contract existed, that they had never done anything in the case, and wasn't justly entitled to a cent. Q. Did you know whether there was any indebtedness on the part of your son to them at that time? A. No, sir; he didn't owe them anything justly. Q. Why did you buy that land? A. To help him pay his honest debts. Q. The debts on these cattle and horses? A. I think part of the cattle and $2,400 of it was borrowed money, mortgage given for— Q. He used this money in payment of debts—this $600? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you any purpose in buying this land to assist your son in defrauding any of his creditors? A. No, sir; I simply done it because I had the money and wanted to help him out if I could. I advanced him money several times; two or three different times. Q. He was owing you other money? A. Yes, sir. Q. To what amount? A. Well, to the amount of $300 that I paid to Bonfoey; $331, I believe, it was I paid Bonfoey a year ago last November, probably."

Recross examination:

"Q. That mortgage has never been satisfied, has it—the Bonfoey mortgage? A. No, sir. Q. Now, you know sufficient in detail of your son's business to know that there was a suit instituted against the Milwaukee Railroad Company for $25,000 for personal injuries? Answer 'Yes' or 'No.' A. I don't know what the amount of the suit was brought for. Q. You know of the details of it, even the contract, the amount they were to receive? A. I saw the contract. Q. He showed you the contract? A. I think so; yes, sir. Q. Then afterwards the case was removed to the United States court? A. I don't know. Q. You know it got down to Kansas City? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then you know it was suggested that other lawyers be employed at Kansas City; your son informed you of that? A. No, sir; don't remember that he did. Q. You know very well that a question arose as to the lawyers, and increased the fee from 33 per cent. to 15 per cent. more? He told you that? A. Napoleon showed me the contract. Q. And that was the purpose of employing other lawyers. Harber & Knight and Childers was to pay half the fee of what they got, and wanted him to pay the other half? A. I didn't understand it that way. Q. Then you understood he settled or dismissed the suit; you knew that? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you know of your son dismissing the suit? A. Yes, sir; I know he dismissed it. Q. Then he told you that Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. were claiming a fee off him, but they never done anything, and you say that, didn't he? A. Yes, sir; he told me that Harber & Knight took four depositions was all he done in the case. Q. But he told you they were claiming a fee, did he not? A. Don't remember at the time that him and I had that talk about it; I don't think he made any claim of a fee. Q. When was that? A. That was some time after the case was dismissed; some time after, I think. Q. And you say they never done anything because he told you that, you don't know yourself? A. No, sir. Q. You don't know how many trips they made to Kansas City, or how many trips to Iowa, in taking depositions and otherwise? A. All I know about what was he said and other parties. Q. Who took Davis' deposition? A. I think Knight, maybe; I ain't sure about it; but some one took his deposition. Q. How did Pickenpaugh come to tell you they hadn't done anything if they wasn't making a claim for fees? A. Dillydallying the case along. Q. That's what he told you? A. That's the history of the case. Q. That's the history you got from your son Napoleon, ain't it? A. Well, yes, I got it from him. Q. Then he has kept you in touch? A. And other parties. Q. What others? A. Mr. Culler out here, for one. Q. Mr. Culler was one of the securities? A. Yes, sir. Q. So, you have talked to different parties about it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was you down here at the November term of court when the case was to be tried? A. No, sir. Q. You supposed it would likely be tried at the November term, didn't you? A. I supposed likely that the case would be continued. Q. Why did you suppose that? A. Because he wasn't ready. Q. Who wasn't? A. Napoleon. Q. How do you know that? A. Well, he told me that he wasn't. Q. Told you he wasn't going to be ready before court met? A. Don't know as he told me before. Q. Well, during the term? A. I learned it from him or other parties; I don't remember. Q. You learned he was not going to be ready at the November term, 1903? A. I am not positive about it now; I couldn't tell where I learned he wasn't going to be ready. Q. You tell the court you didn't think it would be tried at that term, because you thought it would be continued? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did you get the impression? A. I couldn't say. Q. You said you understood your son wouldn't be ready, and that it would be continued; that's the understanding you had? A. That was an impression of mine; don't know as I had a correct inference in the matter. Q. And you supposed it would be continued because you understood your son wouldn't be ready; isn't that true? A. That's my impression about the matter. Q. Why didn't you come down at the April term, or was you fixing to come when your son came there. A. No, sir. Q. Why didn't you come at the April term? A. Because my business was such it required my attention. Q. You knew there hadn't been any services rendered, and this suit was coming up against your son; didn't you think you could do him good down here? A. Probably I could if I had been here; but I couldn't very well leave. Q. You testify you didn't come because your business demanded your attention? A. Yes, sir. Q. Otherwise you would have come? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had it not been for your business demanding your attention at home, you would have been here? A. In all probability I would. Q. Now, if it was continued at the November term, you knew it would come up at the April term? A. If it had been continued, certainly. Q. And you knew the terms of court here? A. I had lived here in this county for a number of years and knew when the terms of court came. Q. What time in the day did your son get up to your house that day he brought this deed? A. I think it was along in the evening. Q. How far was it from here to where you lived then—you now live in the same place? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far? A. I don't really know the distance, I suppose probably 35 or maybe 40 miles. Q. How do you go to get there? A. Go from here to Sedan on this railroad, and then you take the K. & W. west from Sedan, and this town is 18 miles west of Centerville."

Mr. Claud A. Pickenpauh testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. You are one of the defendants in this case? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is your age? A. Twenty-six. Q. Where were you born? A. In Putnam county, I think. Q. How long have you lived in the neighborhood of this land? A. Well, I have lived there ever since I was seven or eight years old. Q. When were you married? A. April 10, 1901. Q. And before you were married you lived at home, did you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where have you lived since your marriage? A. Two years north of Central half a mile. Q. Where is that? A. It was a mile north of home. Q. You lived there a while, and then where have you lived since that time? A. Well, I lived down on the place Pa sold to Grandpa; moved there some time in March, and moved off some time in September onto the place where I now live. Q. What year? A. 1903. Q. Now, you may tell the court about the circumstances of your buying this 120 acres of land from your father. A. Well, the land was advertised. Q. By whom? A. By the National Bank. Q. Under an execution? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then what did you do? A. Well, I talked to him about it and asked if he was going to pay it off, and he said he didn't know where he could raise the money; I told him if he would sell me 120 acres I would try and raise it, which I did. Q. You brought up the matter of the sale? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was your purpose in doing that? A. To pay off the execution and stop the sale. Q. What did you agree to give your father for this land? A. $3,000 and a little over. Q. How was it to be bought? A. I agreed to raise the money to pay off the execution; that was $310.21; I borrowed that of Grandpa. Q. Where did you see him and get the money? A. He was at home. Q. You went to his home? A. I sent Pa to see if he had the money, and if he had, if he would loan it to me. Q. Go ahead and tell what occurred. A. Well, Grandpa came up, and I told him before this; he owed me in the first place $128 for corn. Q. Who? A. Pa; and owed me $100. Q. For what? A. For a horse. Q. When did you let him have it? A. Didn't let him have it; James Alexander got the horse; he owed Alexander, and I let Alexander have the horse, and took the account off him—$100. Q. What else? A. Well, sir, during harvest I hired a hand and helped him put up his hay; we exchanged work, and the creek washed my hay down and I paid the hand $28 in cash, and he owed me the same, and he owed me $128 for corn. And I turned him over two horses at $200. Q. $56 for help with the hay, $128 for corn, $100 to Alexander, and $100, two other horses; and this $310 you borrowed from your grandfather? A. Yes, sir. Q. Know whether incumbrances on this land? A. Yes, sir. Q. How much? A. On the 240 acres there was $4,500, I bought half of the land and assumed half of the incumbrance, which would be $2,250. Q. How about this $300 to Bonfoey? A. That makes $4,500. Q. So the items you have enumerated and the $2,250, makes how much? A. $3,044.25. Q. This $210 note—did you assume that $210? A. That $210 note I think was payable in installments as interest; I paid my part of the interest. Q. Well, the amount that you assumed was $2,250? A. Yes, sir; and I placed $310 on it myself. Q. Now, Mr. Pickenpauh, why did you buy this land? A. To save the home place. Q. Did you buy it to defraud creditors? A. No, sir. Q. Did you know of your father owing these gentlemen? A. No, sir. Q. Childers Bros. or Harber & Knight? A. I did not. Q. Had you ever heard anything about that? A. He never did tell me his business, and I never meddled with it. Q. This was before the suit? A. Yes, sir. Q. This was in August? A. Yes, sir, 1903. Q. And the suit was October 22d following? A. Yes, sir; I think so. Q. Who wrote the deed? A. W. A. Valentine. Q. Can you give the description of the land that you bought from your father? A. Well, I bought the north half of section 7. Q. Well, take the deed and see if you can describe it? A. Forty acres of the northwest of the northwest of section 8, township 65, range 20, and 80 acres of the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, and range 20. Q. Now, then, Mr. Pickenpauh, did your father own the west half of the northeast quarter? A. No, sir. Q. You bought the north half? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is that what you and your father told Valentine to write in the deed? A. Yes, sir; and he told me when I took the deed to him the letter was an 'N.' Q. Did you see and read the deed? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the letter? A. I presume it was an 'N.' That's what I thought it was, and he said positively it was; said it was as plain as the nose on a man's face. Q. Now, Mr. Pickenpaugh, when did you discover that there was any misunderstanding about this being an 'N'? A. Well, I discovered to the best of my knowledge on the 16th of August. Q. What did you have done then? A. I went to the justice that made it and had him correct it. Q. You talked to the recorder about it, didn't you—Mr. Underwood? A. No, sir; I never talked to him myself about it; I had Mr. Little, too. Q. Did Mr. Little read it? A. I presume he did. Q. He is a pretty good hand at reading writing, isn't he? A. Yes, sir. Q. When was that you made this discovery that the recorder had written it as 'W'? A. Well, it was day or two, probably three days before I took it to Valentine. Q. That was last August? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that's when he made the erasure and wrote the word 'North' in there? A. Yes, sir. Q. After you bought the land, did you take possession of it? A. I had possession of it when I bought it. Q. You were cultivating it? A. Yes, sir; part of it. Q. Have you had possession of it ever since? A. Yes, sir. Q. What doing? A. Farming the most of it. Q. Who has paid the taxes? A. I have, also the interest. Q. Paid the interest on the mortgage, have you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What improvements? A. I moved a house and fixed it up and built a barn and corncribs; dug a well. Q. Living on the land? A. Yes, sir. Q. For how long? A. Since September, 1903. Q. Lived on the land? A. Yes, sir."

Cross-examination:

"Q. Up to the time of your marriage you lived at home? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long after your marriage did you live there? A. Two weeks. Q. What land did you move to then? A. Half mile north of Central. Q. What land? A. Land now owned by Williams. Q. Your father owned at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long did you live there? A. Two years. Q. And from there you moved where? A. Moved down to the land that is now owned by Grandpa. Q. You lived there one season? A. Just a part of a season. Q. When did you move on the land in question? A. September. Q. What year? A. 1903. Q. You had worked at home all the time prior to your marriage? A. Yes, sir. Q. What property did you have at the time of your marriage? A. I had a team and some hogs, don't remember how many, and a couple of cows. Q. You gave in the amount you had? A. Yes, sir. Q. For each year? A. Yes, sir. Q. So the assessment will show? A. Yes, sir. Q. The amount and value? A. The assessor's value. Q. Half their value, say? A. Don't know whether it is or not. Q. That was the only property you had, the property you gave in to the assessor? A. That was all except the crop I raised. Q. You seem to have had about the same number of horses each year; how did you get some to sell to your father? A. Look up the records and see, I had two in 1904. Q. How many in 1903? A. Five, sold three. Q. How many in 1902? A. Had three, I think. Q. Now then, how many in 1902? A. I think I had three. Q. And how many in 1903? A. Had five. Q. You say you never interfered or meddled with your father's business? A. No, sir. Q. How did it happen at that minute you stepped in and said, 'I will pay off this execution'? A. It was necessary. Q. He had 97 head of cattle? A. I don't know how many. Q. He was a large feeder at that time? A. No, sir; not at that time. Q. That was 1903? A. Yes, sir. Q. Assessment for 1903, how many head do you say he had in 1903? A. I don't know. Q. He was a large stock feeder and grower? A. Not so very large. Q. Averaged from 94 to 97 cattle, and had horses? A. Had some, but I don't know how many. Q. You had never borrowed any money before in your life? A. No, sir, never any money. Q. Never tried to do any business before of that kind in your life? A. What business I had to do I had the capital to do it with. Q. You never bought any land before? A. No, sir. Q. Never traded with your father any before? A. Yes, sir; I traded with him before. Q. What had you traded? A. Sold him hogs and such like several times. Q. Never traded him lands? A. No, sir. Q. Now, your trade was you to assume $2,400? A. $2,250 and the interest. Q. These coupons or notes that have been taken on the $300 and $500 were coupon notes? A. I suppose so. Q. You pay them annually? A. Yes, sir. Q. Take them up annually? A. Yes, sir. Q. You get this coupon when you pay the annual interest? A. That $300 is a loan. Q. That's in the $4,500? A. Yes, sir. Q. $4,200 mortgage and $300 mortgage and $210 was commission note to Mr. Bonfoey? A. Yes, sir. Q. You traded along, and your father got to owing you for a horse and stacking the hay and some horses you sold somebody else, and all at once you concluded you would borrow money from your grandfather and buy this land? A. I thought if I could raise the money and pay off the judgment I would buy the land, and done it. Q. You didn't pay your father a dollar at the time? A. Turned him over two horses at $200, and he paid me what he owed me. Q. And you receipted him for the stacking of the hay account? A. Yes, sir; and also for the hired hand. Q. Valued the land at $3,000? A. Yes, sir. Q. That's what it is worth to-day? A. Ain't worth any more. Q. What worth an acre to rent? A. I don't know. Q. Your deed was made, when? A. August 28, 1903. Q. Had you talked with Childers Bros.—you know them? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you talked with them at any time regarding the suit of your father? A. I think, once. Q. Over the telephone? A.

Yes, sir. Q. Where was you at that time? A. I was at Arthur Young's. Q. That was the time you told them that your father had told you to tell them the case against the Milwaukee had not been dismissed? A. I didn't tell them that; I told them that Ma told me. Q. And the railroad was subpoenaing witnesses? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you were talking to them with respect to the suit? A. Ma told me to talk to them. Q. You told them the suit had not been dismissed, that the railroad company was subpoenaing witnesses? A. Yes, sir. Q. On that day you were talking to them pretending to them your father had told them not to dismiss the suit, you took this deed from your father? A. I don't remember what date it was. Q. It was a few days before you took this deed? A. I know nothing about it. Q. You knew at the time your father had dismissed the suit? A. I know that he said in the spring that he had a notion to dismiss it, but didn't know. Q. But you told them your mother told you to tell them it had not been dismissed, and that was before you took this deed from your father? A. I don't remember whether it was or not. Q. Didn't Childers tell you in the talk over the phone that it certainly had been dismissed, that your father had come to Milan and secretly tried to settle with the stenographer that took the evidence, and would not come to their office? A. I don't think he did. Q. Why did Childers tell you he thought the suit had been dismissed? A. I don't know that he told me that; he told me to watch the case carefully and let him know if anything occurred. Q. Didn't he tell you your father had been to Milan and settled with the stenographer, and didn't come to his office? A. Don't think he did, to the best of my knowledge. Q. What became of all this stock your father had there? A. Sold it, I guess. Q. What did he do with the money? A. I don't know. Q. What became of the $600? A. I don't know. Q. How frequently did you see your grandfather between October 22d and April, 1904? A. Don't remember that I saw him at all. Q. Might have seen him a half dozen times? A. No, sir. Q. Was you at your father's house frequently? A. I was there several times. Q. How can you tell he put in the wrong description? A. I know what land I was to get; I never gave the justice any description. Q. Who did? A. Pa and Grandpa gave him the description. Q. You don't know by numbers; you don't know the land by numbers? A. No, sir; but I know it. We got a tax receipt. Q. But you can't tell now what it was? A. No, sir. Q. Can you tell whether the deed was dated 28th or 29th? A. I used to know figures. Q. Look at that now, and see if you still know them? A. I think that's the 28th. Q. The 8 made over a 9? A. 28th. Q. Has there been a figure 9 made there? A. No, sir; I can't see there is any figure 9 made there."

Redirect examination:

"Q. What was the condition of your father's health after he was hurt? A. Very poor. Q. How did it affect his business? A. It affected his mind greatly. Q. Business declined, did it? A. Yes, sir."

Mr. J. W. Alexander testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. Where do you reside? A. At the present time I live at Pollock. Q. Where did you reside during the summer of 1903? A. Well, sir, my home partly was at my father's mostly. Q. Where was that? A. West of here about 12 miles. Q. Do you know Claud Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir. Q. You may state whether you got a horse from them; tell the circumstance of it. A. Yes, sir, I bought a horse from—well, I got the horse from Claud, or it come through Claud, got it from Poly, but Poly got it from Claud; Poly owed me $180.15. Q. Who do you mean by Poly? A. Poly is the father of this boy, and I was over there to see him, and he was poorly, had poor health, and he proposed to sell me a horse, and he showed me a black horse that he wanted to sell me, and I told him I didn't want it. By Mr. Harber: Never mind, let us get at the facts. A. Well, we looked through the horses, and I didn't care to buy anything he had for the price that he had on it, and I went over to his son's, where he had this 120 in controversy rented at that time. And he had a black filly there, and I and Poly was looking at his colts, and I told him I wouldn't mind having this, and he wanted to know what I would give for her on that debt; said she belonged to Claud. I told him I would give him $100 on that debt, and so we went over to the field where the boy was plowing corn, and he said I could have the filly and he would take his father for the debt. Q. Which Pickenpaugh was that? A. Claud Pickenpaugh."

Mr. U. G. Bishop testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. Mr. Bishop, do you know the defendants in this case, Mr. Pickenpaugh and Claud Pickenpaugh? A. Yes, sir. Q. You worked for Claud along about the winter and spring and summer of 1908? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know anything about Poly buying corn from Claud during the winter and spring? A. Yes, sir; I was there when Poly's hand hauled the corn off. Q. Then what work did you work at during the summer? A. Through harvest. Q. Who paid you? A. Claud. Q. Who hired you? A. Claud. Q. Where did you work? A. On Poly's place; they exchanged work; and this other field washed down. Q. How many days did you work? A. Fourteen days. Q. Furnished a team? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did Claud pay you for that work? A. $28. Q. I believe you testified you saw Poly hauling the corn? A. His hand, Mr. Jacobs."

Cross-examination:

"Q. Was you out there at any time when corn was hauled at night for fear of a levy on it? A. No, sir. Q. Ever hear of it? A. No, I don't know as I did. Q. You mean to say you can't tell whether you heard of it or not? A. No, sir; I can't say whether I did or not. Q. There was a good deal of shuffling going on among Napoleon's property? A. I couldn't say; I wasn't there. Q. Don't remember of hearing of the circumstances? A. I might have heard of it, but never interested me. Q. Circumstance of that kind would be so ordinary it wouldn't impress itself upon you? A. No, sir; don't think it would; if I heard it I probably forgot it. Q. Where was the corn you saw Napoleon get from Claud there? A. North of Central. Q. What place? A. Williams' place. Q. When was it? A. 1903. Q. How much did he get? A. The biggest part of 20 acres; couldn't say the amount of bushels. Q. What was he feeding it to? A. Couldn't say. Q. What do you know about this corn being hauled to Napoleon's? A. I was there when Poly's hired hand hauled it. Q. How many loads? A. I couldn't say; there was several. Q. You were working for Claud at one time and went over and helped him work for his father? A. That wasn't corn gathering. Q. How long had you been working for Claud at that time? A. Well, he hired me, and we put up Poly's hay first, and then was to go to Claud's part, and it washed down and Claud paid me for the work. Q. You was exchanging work; wasn't Napoleon going to help him back with his hay? A. No, sir; it had washed down and he didn't want it. Q. Wasn't that the intention for them to exchange work, you and Claud help Napoleon, and Napoleon and his hand help Claud? You never heard of Claud having an account against his father until after this transaction came up? A. Yes, sir; I know of him buying this corn. Q. How much corn did he buy? A. I couldn't say. Q. How much was he paying for it? A. Thirty-five cents. Q. Where was you when the contract was made? A. Hauling corn for Claud to Lucerne."

Mr. N. B. Pickenpugh, of lawful age, being produced, sworn, and examined on the part of the defendants, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. How long have you lived in this county? A. I couldn't tell you exactly—30 years or more. Q. You got hurt on the Milwaukee Railroad? A. Yes, sir. Q. In 1901, I believe? A. Yes, sir. Q. Has that impaired your health? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where do you suffer? A. Well, I suffer in my hip, ankle, back, and head. Q. Any injury to your spinal column? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you been able to carry on your farm work and manage your business since that injury? A. No, sir. Q. Well, now, you may tell the court how you come to sell this 120 acres of land in controversy to your son, Claud? A. Well, I owed the National Bank of Unionville here $250; a man by the name of John Bishop was my security, and he got restless. Q. There was a judgment and execution levied on your land? A. Yes, sir. Q. That sale was set for a day in August, 1903? A. I think so. Q. How did you come to deed it to your son, Claud? A. Well, I sent my wife over to Young; he told me he wanted to buy the land, and he said he had concluded not to buy it, and I was talking to my son, and he said if he could get the money he would take it; and I told him I believed he could get it from Father, and I went to see Father, and he said if Claud wanted the land he would let him have the money, and help him to buy it. Q. That was why you sold it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did your father let Claud have the money? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who paid the money to the sheriff? A. Father. Q. Do you remember the amount? A. Well, I don't know whether I do exactly or not, but I think it was $310.21. Q. Well, do you remember what incumbrance there was on the land, if any? A. There was $4,200 going to Hartford, Conn., $300 to the widow Webb, and there was a commission to Bonfoey. Q. How much of that did your son assume? A. One-half. Q. How much land did that deed of trust cover? A. Two hundred and forty acres. Q. Your son agreed to pay half of it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, how did he pay the balance of it? A. He let me have two horses. Q. At how much? A. One hundred dollars each. And he let Mr. Alexander have a horse for $100, and I was owing Mr. Alexander paid $100 for me, and he worked some in the harvest, and hired Mr. Bishop with a team helping. Q. Know what that amounted to? A. No, sir; I trusted to him to keep the account; I wasn't able to. I think $50, as near as I remember. And they put my hay up first, and the creek come up and run over his grass and made it worthless. Q. Didn't cut his hay? A. Don't think they cut but very little of it. Q. Was there any corn in the deal? A. Yes, sir; I had a man by the name of Jacobs hired, and he hauled quite a number of loads, and my son kept an account of them. I trusted to him to attend to that. It was cold weather, and I wasn't able to be out to see after it. Q. Did you know the description of the land you sold him? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was it? A. Well, it was the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, range 20, and there's a 40 in 8; it joins it on the east. Q. Do you own the 40 acres of land south of that? A. No, sir. Q. That's the 120 you sold to your son? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see the deed when Squire Valentine wrote it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you read it? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did it read? A. As near as I remember it read: "The north half of the northeast quarter, section 7, township 65, range 20." Q. You know the controversy about that letter 'N'? A. Well, I have heard about it since that time. Q. I will ask you now whether it was a letter 'N' or 'W'? A. I called it letter

N.' Q. That's what you read it? A. Yes, sir. And I was hurt, and I just got him a tax receipt to get the numbers from, and he also had an atlas. Q. What did you tell your son you wanted to sell it for? A. To keep it from selling."

Cross-examination:

"Q. You heard something last August about the recorder having misrecorded that letter, did you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Which farm was your son living on when he got this farm from you? A. He was living on what we called the 'Smith place.' Q. That's what has been mentioned as the 'Williams place'? A. Yes, sir. Q. What rent was he paying for it? A. Not any. Q. But when you got anything from him he charged you for it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You wasn't charging him any rent? A. No, sir. Q. And yet when you got a little corn from him he charged you? A. Yes, sir; he is my son. Q. How much land was that he was occupying? A. One hundred twenty-two acres. Q. What was it worth, rental value? A. It was my son and my land, and I let him have the proceeds of it. Q. You got how much corn from him? A. Couldn't tell the number of bushels. Q. Raised on your land? A. He farmed and raised it. Q. And you charged him no rent? A. No, sir. Q. And the horses he got there while he was living with you? A. Yes, sir; he got three horses from home. Q. And these horses you got from him from time to time, did you get all of them at the same time? A. He got the three horses at the same time. Q. When was the work you spoke of done—what year? A. He always helped me harvest until the last two years. Q. Always charged you for it? A. Yes, sir; he was 21 years old. Q. You never charged him anything you done for him? A. That was my business. Q. Now, give me the land that is conveyed in this deed from you to your son on the 28th day of August, 1903. A. Well, it was the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, range 20, and then the other 40 is in section 8. Q. Can you describe it? A. I don't believe I can. Q. When did you last see that deed? A. I haven't seen that deed from the time it was made until now. Q. You saw it to-day? A. Yes, sir. Q. Up to that time from the time it was made until to-day you never have seen it? A. I never have; no, sir. Q. When did you go up to Iowa to see your father with reference to the April term of court? A. Didn't go with reference to the April term of court. Q. Was you there in April, 1904? A. I was, the latter part. Q. What time? A. I think it was about the 26th or 27th. Q. You left here—do you remember the day of the week the 26th was? A. It was on Tuesday. Q. This case was to be tried of Harber & Knight's against you, was set for Monday? A. Yes, sir. Q. It was continued over from Monday until Tuesday because Magee couldn't get here on account of high water? A. I don't know as it was; it was passed over. Q. On Tuesday again you were here and insisting that both Magee and some lawyer you had in Iowa couldn't get here? A. No, sir. Q. On Tuesday you consulted with Judge Jones? A. Yes, sir; another man, Greenwood of Kirksville. Q. And it had been continued at the November term previous, at your instance? A. Yes, sir, it had been. Q. At your instance? A. Continued. I don't know; I wasn't here. Q. Wasn't here at the November term? A. No, sir. Q. You do know it was continued at the November term? A. Yes, sir. Q. You do know it was set for trial on the first day of the April term, 1904? A. I think it was. Q. And you do know in 1904 you was representing to the court that your lawyer, Magee, couldn't get here on account of high water? A. I suppose that was the reason. Q. And wasn't gentlemen called right in to show they had come from beyond the bridge you said Magee couldn't cross? A. They questioned some men here. Q. Then on Tuesday, and about noon, you consulted Judge Jones and Mr. Greenwood? A. I consulted Greenwood earlier in the morning. Q. About noon Judge Jones—you consulted him? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did you go that day? A. To Plano, Iowa. Q. What time? A. In the afternoon. Q. Where did you strike the train? A. I got on the Rock Island, went to Seymour, and went from there to Jerome. Q. You didn't leave here until the afternoon? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did you strike the Rock Island? A. Up here at—it was between Centerville and Seymour. Q. Belknap? A. No, sir; I forget the name. Q. How did you get from here there? A. I started and walked out a little ways, and a man overtook me going north, and I rode with him to the other side of Genoa. Q. The closest station of the Rock Island from this point is Seymour? A. No, sir. Q. The closest point from here on the Rock Island is Seymour? A. No, sir; it was on the Milwaukee & Rock Island also. Q. It is about 22 miles? A. I don't know; ain't that far, I don't think. Q. How far was it from here to the point where you took the Rock Island? A. I don't know exactly. Q. What time did you reach this point? A. Well, sir, it was after night, a little. Q. You took the night passenger? A. No, sir, it was just a freight. Q. Some time after night? A. Just getting pretty dark. Q. And you went where that night? A. Got to Seymour and waited until a train came going to Jerome, and got to Jerome after night—don't know what time—and then I walked to Plano. Q. What time did you get to Plano? A. Don't know, but it must have been 8 or 9. Q. You got on the Rock Island and went to Seymour? A. Yes, sir; and then went to Jerome. Q. You got on the Rock Island east of Seymour? A. Yes, sir. Q. And went west to Seymour? A. Yes, sir. Q. What kind of a train did you strike on the Rock Island? A. Freight train. Q. Regular or extra? A. I didn't ask. Q. You got on a freight train on the Rock Island? A. Yes, sir. Q. Didn't get to the Rock Island until after dark? A. Getting pretty dark. Q. Did you take supper there? A. No, sir. Q. Then you came to Seymour? A. Yes, sir. Q. And got a freight at Seymour? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long did you wait in Seymour? A. Went from one depot to the other, and along came a train and I boarded it. Q. That was a freight? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know whether either one of the regulars carried passengers? A. No, sir; they carried me. Q. Any other passengers on either of them? A. Yes, sir. Q. On the Rock Island? A. Yes, sir. Q. What day of the month was that? A. The day after I left town, I think the 26th. Q. Then, after you got to Seymour, you went where? A. Jerome. Q. That's on the Milwaukee? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far from Seymour? A. It is the next station, ain't it? Q. Then how far was Jerome from your father's? A. Three and a half miles, I think they call it. Q. You got out to your father's about what time? A. I didn't just look at the clock; I was most awful tired and hungry, and my stepmother got my supper. Q. Was your father at home? A. Yes, sir. Q. What time was it? A. I don't know, might have been 9. Q. Somewhere between 9 and 12 o'clock? A. Yes, sir; somewhere along there. Q. Ever went that way before? A. No, sir. Q. Ever went that way since? A. No, sir. Q. You went from here starting to walk to strike the Rock Island? A. Yes, sir. Q. And got out how far? A. I expect a half mile north of town and some man overtook me. Q. Who was he? A. I don't know. Q. You rode? A. Up to Genoa. Q. That's where you took the Rock Island? A. No, sir. Q. How far was it from the place you struck this man to Genoa? A. I don't know; the first time I ever went over that road. Q. Have you any impression at all? A. No, sir. Q. How far was it from Genoa to the place where you struck the Rock Island? A. I don't know. Q. How did you travel from Genoa to the Rock Island? A. I went afoot. Q. You don't know how far it is from this town to Genoa? A. No, sir; never went it only this one time. Q. You can't tell the court what point on the Rock Island that you struck the train? A. I would remember the town if I heard it. Q. It was very muddy? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the creek up everywhere? A. Not much on Tuesday, that was down; but the banks and bottoms awful muddy. Q. The trains up on the Rock Island at Centerville and Eldon and Des Moines had all been delayed on account of high water? A. I expect they was. But I got a train just the same. I know I come down on Monday from Centerville and seen places where the water washed the track out. Q. What time did your wife get in town that day? A. Early in the morning. Q. You tried to get the justice to take the acknowledgment of your wife to the deed before, over the telephone? A. No, sir. Q. You never visited your father in this way before in making this kind of a trip? A. What kind of a trip? Q. We have only been speaking of one; going from here to the Rock Island train, and from the Rock Island to the Milwaukee, and from the Milwaukee to this point, and then walking out. A. That's the only time. Q. You left here that day knowing that this case was for trial? A. Yes, sir. Q. And knowing the plaintiffs had been insisting upon Monday as well as Tuesday of disposing of the case? A. I think you did insist on trying it Monday. Q. And you knew upon Tuesday it was being insisted that we would dispose of it? A. I think you fellows wanted it disposed of. Q. And you left some time in the middle of the afternoon or later? A. About the middle of the afternoon. Q. For your father's, having to go at least 20 miles before you could strike a railroad at all? A. I don't think it was 20 miles. Q. You know you struck the Rock Island east of Seymour? A. Ain't there a place by the name of Dunlap, ain't that the name, between Centerville and Seymour? Q. There's a Belknap? A. I have forgotten the name. Q. What was your haste to get to your father at that time? A. I just wanted to go, and I went. Q. Why was it necessary to make such haste? A. You fellows had demanded papers, and I didn't intend to give them to you. Q. What papers? A. All my letters. Q. Was there any demand made for anything of that kind? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you went to keep from producing letters to be used—that was that the purpose? A. That was my main purpose. Q. If you had any other purpose, what was it? A. That was my purpose. Q. After you learned the recorder had recorded, in recording that deed, had recorded the letter that you thought was 'N' as 'W,' did your son speak to you about it? A. No, he didn't speak to me until after he had come to town and got the papers and had it fixed, and I think my wife told me. Q. What did you say about it? A. Well, I don't know just what I did say about it; I couldn't tell. Q. Did you express your satisfaction with it? A. Yes, sir, as near as I remember. Q. Don't remember exactly what you said? A. No, sir; but I was glad it was corrected."

Defendants introduced several witnesses who testified in their judgment that the land in controversy was worth not more than $25 per acre.

Judge Brawford, of lawful age, being produced, sworn, and examined on the part of the plaintiff, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

"Q. What is your business? A. Loan and real estate. Q. How long have you been engaged in that business? A. About 25 years. Q. How long have you lived in this county? A. About 50 years. Q. Are you acquainted with the west half of the northwest quarter of section 8, township 65, range 20, and also the north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, range 20, this county? A. Yes, sir. Q. Tell the court what that land was worth on the 29th day of August, 1903, and is worth now, in your judgment? A. From $30 to $35 an acre. Q. And is worth that now? A. Yes, sir. Q. You are acquainted with the land Pickenpaugh conveyed to his father about the 26th of April last? A. That was in section 7. Q. The land conveyed to his father on the 26th of April, what is that worth? A. I think about the same as the other; same kind of land."

Mr. Underwood, the recorder of deeds of Putnam county, testified in part as follows: (Having been shown the deed from N. B. Pickenpaugh to C. A. Pickenpaugh, his son.)

"Q. That contains the identical land as the deed before it was recently changed; it is the same description as was recorded as being contained in the original deed? (Defendants object. Objection sustained.) Q. What did you take that letter to be then, and now? A. Believed it to be a 'W.'"

Cross-examination:

"Q. You were not certain about that? A. Well, I was certain enough to tell them I couldn't record it as 'N.' Q. I believe you said yesterday it might have been read as an 'N' as well as a 'W,' didn't you? A. I said it looked a good deal like an 'N,' but I believed it to be a 'W.' Q. You wouldn't be absolutely certain it was an 'N,' would you? It is not a very good letter of either? A. No, not very good. Q. You had some little doubt about? A. Well, that was my judgment about it."

The findings and judgment of the trial court were for the defendants, and the plaintiff duly appealed from that judgment to this court.

E. M. Harber, A. G. Knight, and N. A. Franklin, for appellant. Edward Higbee, Lorenzo Jones, and B. L. Robinson, for respondents.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The salient facts of this case are practically undisputed; and the differences existing between the parties do not question the existence of those facts, but go to the intention which underlie and gave them birth. In the discussion of the legal propositions involved in the case, I will, first, make a brief statement of the facts; and, second, will call attention to the evidence preserved by the record which throws light upon the intention of the respondents underlying those facts.

On November 30, 1901, the respondent, N. B. Pickenpaugh, resided in Putnam county, this state, on a farm which he owned, consisting of 480 acres. As far as disclosed by record, his family consisted of himself, wife, and son, Claud A. Pickenpaugh, then about 22 years of age. The farm was worth $12,000. The assessment books of the county made in the year 1901 for the taxes of 1902 show that his live stock located upon the farm was assessed at the sum of $1,785, and that for the same year Claud Pickenpaugh's total assessment of all kinds of property was $130.

On the day first above mentioned, November 30, 1901, N. B. Pickenpaugh entered into a written contract with the firms of Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., attorneys at law, to bring a suit for him against the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company for the purpose of recovering $20,000 damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him through the negligence of the company. That in pursuance of that contract they instituted a suit in the circuit court of Sullivan county on March 18, 1902.

At the April term following, the railroad company filed its application and bond for a change of forum to the Circuit Court of the United States sitting at Kansas City, which was granted by the Sullivan circuit court. The cause on reaching the federal court was continued until the next term thereof, in order that Pickenpaugh might file cost bond; and at the succeeding term thereof the cause was again continued because Pickenpaugh's injuries rendered him unable to appear in court. The last continuance mentioned carried the case over to the April term, 1903, of the federal court, and the cause was set for trial on May the 12th thereof. Because of those delays and continuances, as I gather it, and for certain other reasons not made perfectly clear by the record, Pickenpaugh grew restless and apprehensive of the results of that suit, and, fearing that he and his surety on the cost bond might be required to pay large sums of money in the way of costs, entered into an agreement on or about May 1st with the railroad company to dismiss the suit. This agreement was made without the knowledge or consent of his attorneys, and in pursuance to that agreement the suit was dismissed when reached on the docket. In the meantime his attorneys had taken depositions and made other preparations for the trial of the cause, which do not appear fully in this record. Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. contended, without any evidence introduced in this case in support thereof (which I suppose would have been incompetent had it been offered, as the questions of attorney's fees were fully and finally determined in the case of those parties against said Pickenpaugh, which will hereafter be mentioned), that Pickenpaugh had settled the case for a large sum of money. Pickenough, however, without objection, testified that he dismissed the suit in the federal court without receiving "one cent" in compensation of his injuries.

Upon learning of the agreement to dismiss the suit against the railroad company, said attorneys attempted to adjust, settle, and collect the fees due them under the said contract of employment. Pickenpaugh refused to pay them any sum whatever, and definitely told them that if they could get anything off of him that "they were welcome to it."

After this interview they wrote him several letters demanding a settlement, and one of them, dated August 23, 1903, heretofore copied in the statement of the case, informed him that if he did not settle for their fees they would institute suit against him for the same at the following November term of the Putnam county circuit court. Instead of replying to any of those letters, N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife, on August 28th five days after the date of the letter before mentioned, by deed of general warranty, conveyed to their son, C. A. Pickenpaugh, the 120 acres of land involved in this case. The consideration paid therefor, as stated in the deed, was $3,600.

The attorneys, having been unable to make a settlement of their fees with N. B. Pickenpaugh, did, on October 22, 1903, institute suit against him therefor, returnable to the November term, 1903, of the Putnam county circuit court. The defendant therein appeared and filed answer, and upon his application the cause was continued until the April term, 1904, of said court. The case was set for trial Monday, April 25th, but at the suggestion of defendant therein it was passed until the next day. On Tuesday, the 26th, a trial was had of the cause, and defendant, although present in court, took no part in the trial, which resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in that case against him for the sum of $1,750. That judgment was not appealed from, and still remains in full force and effect.

Some little time prior to the date on which N. B. Pickenpaugh conveyed the said 120 acres to Claud Pickenpaugh, he also conveyed another 120 acres of his farm to a man by the name of Williams; and on the 26th day of April, 1904, the day on which the judgment for the $1,750 was rendered against him, he also conveyed to his father, Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, a resident of the state of Iowa, still another tract of 120 acres of land for the consideration of $3,000, as expressed in that deed.

The assessor's books for the year 1903 showed N. B. Pickenpaugh's live stock was assessed at the sum of $2,359, and that Claud Pickenpaugh's total assessment of all kinds of property was valued at the sum of $145.

No part of the judgment against N. B. Pickenpaugh for said attorney's fees having been paid, the plaintiffs in that case caused execution to be issued thereon on the 7th day of August, 1905, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of that county, who, on August 9th, levied it upon the lands involved in this litigation, and advertised them for sale on September 6, 1905. On said last-named date said lands were sold by the sheriff, and were purchased by Wm. W. Childers, the plaintiff and appellant in this cause. After seizure and sale of this land, the scrivener, at the instance and request of Claud Pickenpaugh, altered and changed the deed, dated August 28, 1903, from N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife, conveying this land to him.

Prior to May 22, 1903, N. B. Pickenpaugh had disposed of all of his live stock and other personal property which was subject to execution; and on that day an execution was issued on a judgment, dated April 10, 1903, in favor of the National Bank of Unionville against said N. B. Pickenpaugh, for the sum of $261.38, together with interest and costs, amounting to $310.11. The sheriff, being unable to find any personal property subject to execution, first had 120 acres of the 480-acre farm appraised and set off to him as a homestead, and then levied upon the lands involved in this suit, and advertised them for sale on August 27, 1903, but on the previous day, the 26th, said N. B. Pickenpaugh paid said execution in full; and the sheriff returned the same satisfied in full. In this connection it should be borne in mind that this land was advertised for sale the day before the date on which N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife conveyed the 120 acres to their son, C. A. Pickenpaugh.

Both Jacob W. Pickenpaugh and Claud A. Pickenpaugh, the father and son of N. B. Pickenpaugh, knew of the indebtedness of the latter to his attorneys for their fees, and the former testified that he thought the indebtedness was unjust, and the son testified that he knew of the contract agreeing to pay the fees, but knew nothing about the suit which had been brought thereon.

Such additional facts as may be necessary for a proper understanding of the case will be stated in connection with the respective propositions to which they relate when we reach them for discussion.

From the foregoing recitation of the facts of this case it will be seen that between the time when N. B. Pickenpaugh conveyed the 120 acres of land to Williams, which was about July or August, 1903, the exact month not appearing from the record, and the 26th day of April, 1904, the day upon which Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., recovered their judgment against him for $1,750 for their fees, he had disposed of all his property, both real and personal, which was subject to execution; and that there was nothing left of his $14,000 worth of land and live stock out of which that judgment could be satisfied.

Bearing in mind those undisputed facts, we will now take up and consider, separately, in their inverse chronological order, the various conveyances made by N. B. Pickenpaugh disposing of his property, and, in the light of the testimony bearing upon them, try and correctly determine whether those conveyances were made in good faith in the ordinary course of business, or were made for the purpose of hindering and defrauding his creditors out of their just claims. For convenience, I prefer to consider each conveyance separately in the first instance, and also for the purpose of preventing confusion and a misunderstanding of the evidence in the case, and after so considering those questions we will briefly apply the conclusions reached thereon to the question of the good or bad faith of N. B. Pickenpaugh underlying the disposition of his property.

2. We will first consider the disappearance of his live stock, and I use the word "disappearance" for the reason that this record is as silent as the tomb as to what became of the 97 head of cattle and the 20-odd head of horses which were on the farm, and which were assessed for the year 1903 at the sum of $2,359. That sum we know was far less than their actual value, for the reason that it is common knowledge that personal property is not assessed in excess of 50 or 60 per cent. of its market value; and if we look at the same assessment books we will see that the personal property of Claud A. Pickenpaugh, one of the respondents, for the same year was assessed at the sum of $145, while his own testimony shows that three of his horses were worth $300, and that his father allowed him $200 for two of them in the trade for the land conveyed to him on August 28, 1903, and that Mr. Alexander paid him $100 for the third. But independent of these passing observations, the record totally fails to show what became of that stock. It is true Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, the father of N. B., said in one place, in a casual statement, that the Drumm-Plato Commission Company held a mortgage on the cattle, but the record fails to show that he ever saw the mortgage; and he testified that he did not know the amount of money secured thereby, showing conclusively that he was testifying to hearsay testimony, which carries no weight or probative force whatever, whether objected to or not. In another place in his testimony Jacob W. Pickenpaugh said that "I think he," N. B., "paid the Drumm Commission Company a part of it," meaning that he had paid to the former as part of the purchase price of the land he purchased from N. B., on April 26, 1904, on said mortgage; but upon further questioning he said he did not know what sum N. B. paid on the mortgage. This, too, was clearly hearsay evidence, as clearly appears from the reading of the record. He did not pretend to be testifying from his own personal knowledge of the facts, but for the purpose of telling a plausible story which would receive favorable consideration at the hands of the court. Jacob W. Pickenpaugh was unable, or, rather, did not, utter a word as to what disposition was made of said live stock, why it was sold, to whom, what it brought, or what became of the proceeds of the sale.

Upon this same point C. A. Pickenpaugh, the son and co-respondent of N. B. Pickenpaugh, though living in the immediate vicinity of his father, was likewise unable to say what became of the cattle and horses. And if there was a person on earth who should have known what became of said live stock, N. B. Pickenpaugh was that person. He went upon the witness stand and attempted to tell at great length and in minute detail what his indebtedness was, even to the dollars and exact cents, his inability to pay the same, and the circumstances surrounding the various conveyances he made of his real estate; one tract to Jacob W., his father; another to C. A. Pickenpaugh, his son; and a third to one Williams, for the purpose, as he says, to pay his honest debts; but not a word did he say about the $3,000 or $4,000 worth of live stock he had on hand just a few months before the judgment of $1,750 was rendered against him, which he strenuously insisted was unjust, and which he said he did not intend to pay—that is, the claim upon which that judgment was based was unjust—but he did not contest it, though present in the courtroom with his able counsel on the day of the trial, and from which judgment he neglected to appeal. He could have told the court in no uncertain words what disposition he made of those cattle and horses, what sum of money they sold for, and what he did with the proceeds of that sale; but not a word did he utter upon those most important questions. If there had been an honest sale made of the stock, then it would have yielded him ample funds with which to have paid all of his indebtedness when due, including the claim of his attorney, and still there would have been several hundred dollars remaining; while upon the other hand, if he wanted to be dishonest and defraud his creditors, he would have done just what the evidence in this case suggests he did do, namely, secretly dispose of the stock, place the proceeds of the sale presumably in his pocket, and decline to give out any information regarding the disposition made of the stock or what became of the proceeds of the sale.

Again, what did N. B. Pickenpaugh do with the $600 cash his father paid him for the land he purchased from him on the 26th day of April, the day on which the judgment was rendered against him for the attorney's fees? Upon the trial of this case he acknowledged he received that sum in cash from his father, and the record shows that he was practically free from all debts with the exception of this judgment after his property had passed through this scheme of adjustment and settlement, portrayed in this series of lawsuits. If he was honest and wanted to pay his honest debts, as he so earnestly endeavored to convince the trial court, and which he seems to have done, why did he not then and there pay or offer to pay that $600 on the judgment his attorneys held against him, instead of still opposing with all his power their efforts to collect the same? That is what an honest man would have done, and would have thereby proven his good intentions by deeds, and not by empty words and sounding cymbals.

Not only this, what became of the purchase money Williams paid him for the 120 acres he purchased of respondent, N. B. Pickenpaugh? That must have amounted to something near $3,000, for the reason that the evidence shows that all of the 480 acres was worth not less than $25 per acre, which would make that 120 acres worth the sum of $3,000. This record does not attempt to explain what became of that money. If it had been honestly paid out or expended, that fact could have been easily shown to the satisfaction of the court; but no, not a word escapes his lips in explanation of these important matters.

If I have not overlooked any of the items of N. B. Pickenpaugh's indebtedness, the total amount thereof did not exceed $5,600 when he started out to defeat the payment of the fees due his attorneys. At that same time this record shows that his real and personal property was worth not less than $14,000, and that he had a good and prosperous business. And it is a most significant fact in this case, none of his creditors had ever pressed him for payment of their claims before or after he disposed of his property, not even down to this time, except the National Bank of Unionville, and that claim was only for $310. And that burdensome demand is the sole cause of all of this trouble and litigation, if we believe respondent's story.

In view of those facts, the question naturally suggests itself to the mind, what became of all of that property? If we make a liberal allowance of $2,000 for his homestead and other exemptions, and add that sum to the total amount of his indebtedness, the total would be $7,600, which would leave unaccounted property worth the sum of $6,400. We again repeat the question, what became of this money, or the property which the evidence shows N. B. Pickenpaugh had at the beginning of this trouble, and which all of the testimony shows was worth that sum? If there was no other evidence in this case than that which shows the existence of the facts stated in this and in paragraph 1 of this opinion, it would be sufficient in our judgment to warrant the court in finding that the respondent had conveyed his property with the intention to hinder and defraud his creditors; and we might with propriety add, especially Harber & Knight and Childers Bros.

3. We will next devote our attention to the conveyance of the 120 acres of land made by N. B. Pickenpaugh to his father, Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, by the deed dated April 26, 1904. In the consideration of this proposition, the facts must not be lost sight of that the grantee in that deed was the father of the grantor, N. B. Pickenpaugh; that he knew of the claim the attorneys had against his son for their fees for legal services rendered by them for him in the railroad case; that he knew the son was using every means at his command to defeat the payment of those fees; that he was assisting the son in the payment of what he considered his just debts by purchasing part of his property and paying him the cash therefor, and by furnishing his grandson, Claud A. Pickenpaugh, with the means with which to purchase other lands belonging to him; and that he, Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, at all times considered the claim of the attorneys against his son to be an unjust demand.

Under that state of fact, without a word of explanation, we find that on March 18, 1904, about 20 days prior to the date of the rendition of the judgment against N. B. Pickenpaugh on the claim for the attorney's fees, the following contract of sale of real estate was entered into between the father and the son, to wit: "March 18th, 1904. This day N. B. Pickenpaugh has sold to J. W. Pickenpaugh the northwest quarter of section No. 7, township 65 and range 20, in Putnam county, Missouri, for $3,000; $2,400 on a loan on said land and $600 cash when deed is made." This contract was signed by both parties named therein.

There was no evidence offered to show why this contract was made at this inopportune time, or of the facts or circumstances which led up to or induced its execution, and Jacob testified that it was optional with N. B. whether he would consummate the sale or not. And, when viewed in the light of the facts which existed at the time the deed was executed conveying the land to Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, that provision of the contract which stated that the $600 purchase money should be paid in cash becomes significant, which will be noted later on. N. B. Pickenpaugh at noon, on the 26th day of April, 1904, only a few hours before or after the judgment for $1,750 was rendered against him for the attorney's fees, which he was trying in every way in his power to prevent paying, and which Jacob W. Pickenpaugh thought was unjust, started afoot to the home of his father, some 40 miles distant, in the state of Iowa. Twenty miles of that distance he would have been compelled to have made on foot had he not by chance happened to have been overtaken by a wagon, on which he rode that 20 miles to a station on the railroad, the name of which is not given, and from there he rode on the train to Jerome, 3 miles from Plano, the town where his father lived, and walked from the former to the latter place, and arrived there some time between 9 and 12 o'clock at night of the same day. When asked why he did not wait and go by rail via the usual route, and why he went afoot and over that unusual route, he replied by stating, in substance, that he went because he wished to get out of the way so that Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. could not get his papers or letters to use in the trial of their case against him. That answer was clearly untrue, for the reason that he had been in court that very morning the case was set for trial, and was attempting to have it again set over or continued, but being unable to do so, he immediately left the courtroom and started afoot to the home of his father in Plano, Iowa. The answer was not only false, but it was clearly a makeshift for the purpose of deceiving the court as to his real motive; and that was, in my judgment, to deliver the deed, dated that same day, April 26, 1904, which had evidently been previously drawn to his father, conveying to him the 120 acres of land involved in the other suit mentioned against him, hoping thereby to transfer the title to the land to his father before it could be seized under execution in satisfaction of said judgment, being ignorant, evidently, of the fact that the judgment when rendered would constitute a lien on the land, which would take precedence over the subsequently delivered deed; or he may have thought the trial might have been delayed or prolonged until he could reach his father and deliver the deed before the judgment could be entered. But, however that may be, N. B. Pickenpaugh appeared at the home of his father in Iowa on that same night, the 26th of April, 1904, and while there, and, according to his testimony, without telling his father a word about why he went there at that particular time, or the route he took, or anything about the case pending against him, or the trial thereof, which, as before stated, took place that same day, delivered the deed to his father, and the latter assumed to pay the $2,400 mortgage debt existing against it, and paid him, in addition thereto, the sum of $600 in cash, not by check, which would have been the usual and ordinary manner of transacting such business. This cash payment was provided for in the contract, and it is passingly strange, if the sale was made in good faith, that it was made on the very day the judgment was rendered against him, and upon the very heels of that unusual and most remarkable trip he made to his father's home. Not only that, but Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, his father, testified that he paid the son the cash for the land without knowing anything about what was the cause of N. B. going to Iowa, and that he did not remember of asking him anything about the trial of said case. That story seems a little strange to me, when almost in the same breath the father said that he would have been in attendance upon the Putnam circuit court to have assisted his son in the defense of the case had it not been for the pressure of business, yet he testified that he had no recollection whatever of ever making inquiry as to the case; but according to his story, before the ink of the record entry of the judgment against his son was dry, he with one hand, in good faith, accepted the deed which conveyed to him the last vestige of property of every kind which was subject to execution, or out of which that judgment could be satisfied, and with the other innocently paid to the son the purchase price thereof in cash, which also placed it beyond the reach of execution. Yet in the face of these fraudulent acts both Jacob W. Pickenpaugh and his son testified that said sale was made in order to enable the latter to pay his honest debts, when no creditor was pressing except these attorneys; even the bank's little judgment had been paid long before this.

But the most remarkable part of the entire fabrication is that neither of them intimated that any debt was paid with the proceeds of the sale after that most remarkable journey was made by N. B. Pickenpaugh to Iowa, which he says was for the purpose of avoiding the production of his letters or papers in the suit to recover the attorney's fees.

The simple and plain truth of the matter is this: Jacob W. Pickenpaugh and his son, N. B. Pickenpaugh, started out some time prior to August 28, 1903, the day on which N. B. Pickenpaugh conveyed 120 acres of his land to his son C. A. Pickenpaugh, to cheat and defraud Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. out of their fees, which were due them under their contract with said N. B. Pickenpaugh, dated October 30, 1901, whereby he employed them to institute and prosecute a suit against the railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries received by him, and from a careful reading of this record no impartial, fair-minded man can reach any other conclusion; and in my judgment the whole scheme was concocted and executed under the advice and instructions of Jacob W. Pickenpaugh the father of N. B. Pickenpaugh.

4. The last question to be determined in the order suggested at the beginning of this opinion, and really the main proposition involved in this case, involves the validity of the deed, dated August 28, 1903, executed by N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife to Claud A. Pickenpaugh, their son, conveying to him the land involved in this suit.

Claud's version of that transaction is this: That when he became possessed of the knowledge that his father's land had been seized under execution on a judgment for the sum of $310, in favor of the Unionville National Bank against the latter, and which was advertised for sale on the 27th day of August, 1903, he made arrangements with his father and grandfather, Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, whereby he agreed to purchase the land involved in this suit from his father upon the following terms: He was to pay $3,000 therefor, in the following manner, to wit, to assume a mortgage indebtedness standing against the land for the sum of $2,250, and his father allowed him the following items upon the purchase price thereof, to wit: Fifty-six dollars due him for labor performed for his father; $200 due him for two horses sold to his father; $100 for a horse which he sold to one Alexander, with the understanding that Claud would look to his father for the pay, in consideration of the fact that Alexander had given N. B. Pickenpaugh credit for $100 on a debt due him by the latter; $128 for corn sold to his father; and the $310 due the Unionville National Bank, which he says he paid for his father. He also testified that he authorized his father, N. B. Pickenpaugh, to make arrangements with his grandfather, Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, to lend him the $310 with which to pay the debt due the bank; that his grandfather agreed to furnish the money, provided Claud would give him his note therefor, secured by a deed of trust on the land he was purchasing; that in pursuance to that agreement Jacob W. Pickenpaugh furnished him the $310, and that he paid the same to the sheriff of Putnam county in satisfaction of the execution held by him, and had it returned fully satisfied; that in pursuance to that agreement, on August 28, 1903, N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife conveyed the land to him by deed of that date; and that he made the note and executed the deed of trust to his grandfather as agreed. Claud's father and grandfather substantially corroborated his testimony regarding those transactions. I have not commented upon the fact that Claud testified that he assumed to pay $2,250 of the $4,500 mortgage debts, when all the testimony in the case shows Jacob W. Pickenpaugh assumed $2,400 of them and paid $600 in cash for the land he got.

In our judgment, we have shown conclusively in the former paragraphs of this opinion that the respondent, N. B. Pickenpaugh, had fraudulently disposed of his property for the purpose of defeating and preventing his creditors from collecting their debts; and it, therefore, only remains to be ascertained and determined whether or not the respondent, Claud A. Pickenpaugh, knew of that fraud and was a party thereto. The evidence which tends to connect Claud with the fraud of his father is fully as strong and convincing as was that showing the connection of his grandfather with it. In the first place, his whole story is unreasonable. He resided in the immediate neighborhood with his father, and must have known that his father must have had ample means with which to have paid off the execution mentioned, which was for only $310, for the reason that he had but recently disposed of some two or three thousand dollars worth of personal property, and that there was no outward indications or evidence that he had disposed of or had expended any of the proceeds received for said property. Beyond that he would have this court believe that he, only 24 years of age, with but $400 or $500 worth of property, at the most, devised the scheme, and undertook same at his own instance, by which he was to purchase a farm of 120 acres, worth $3,000, in order to assist his father, in good faith, to raise the sum of $310 with which to pay off the bank execution. According to his own statement the land was worth $3,000, and that he paid that sum for it, while the deed shows he agreed to pay $3,600 for it. He says that the reason why he purchased the land was to save it from sale and sacrifice under execution; and that he made the arrangements for getting the money, which was necessary to consummate the trade from his grandfather, through the efforts of his father, N. B. Pickenpaugh, and his co-respondent. If that was his only purpose, then why did not Claud suggest and cause his grandfather to furnish the $310 direct to his son, N. B. Pickenpaugh, and take his note for the money, secured by a deed of trust on the land, instead of having N. B. arrange for getting the money for him from Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, and thereby obviate the necessity of conveying the land to him, Claud, and then he executing a deed of trust back to Jacob W. Pickenpaugh as security for the money, as was done? There was no necessity or reason for Claud's intervention in the matter, if it was only his purpose to assist his father in raising the $310, for the reason that Jacob W. Pickenpaugh certainly would have assisted his son as willingly and as readily as he would have assisted Claud, his grandson. This is conclusively shown by the fact that Jacob W. Pickenpaugh was ever willing to assist N. B. in this matter whenever called upon to do so. In fact, almost a year later he purchased another 120 acres from him and assumed an indebtedness of $2,400 standing against it, and paid him in addition thereto the sum of $600 in cash. So, under those facts, we must presume he would have furnished N. B. the $310, only one-half the sum he subsequently furnished him on request.

And independent of that, according to the testimony of all three of these parties, Jacob W., N. B., and Claud A. Pickenpaugh, the real estate owned by N. B. Pickenpaugh at the time his land was being advertised for sale under execution in favor of the bank was worth over and above all incumbrances three or four thousand dollars. One hundred and twenty acres of it was not mortgaged at all and it was worth $3,000, and the tract conveyed to Jacob W. Pickenpaugh was certainly worth $600 over and above the sum secured on it by the deed of trust, for he testified that he paid that sum in cash for it over and above the mortgage; and the tract conveyed to Claud was presumably worth the $750 he says he paid for it over and above the incumbrance on it. But independent of their testimony, all the other evidence in the case shows that all of those lands were worth at least $25 per acre, which would make N. B.'s interest in the three tracts mentioned at the time they were advertised for sale and at the time he sold to Claud worth $4,300 over and above the incumbrances; and yet in the face of those facts he would have us believe that his father would have been compelled to have suffered 240 acres of his land to be sold under execution at a sacrifice because he was unable to raise the small sum of $310 with which to pay off the execution. That story requires a man possessing a greater degree of credulity than I do in order to be believed. Doubtless if N. B. had been acting in good faith, conceding he did not have the means in his pocket, he could have gotten the money from his father or from any other money lender with that amount of good security to offer.

But that is not all of this story. Both Claud and his father testified that his father was in stringent circumstances and was unable to pay his debts, not able to raise even the $310, before mentioned, with which to satisfy the execution, under which about 240 acres of his land was about to be sold at a sacrifice, yet at the same time N. B. Pickenpaugh was permitting Claud to occupy 120 acres of his land free of rent, and all of the testimony bearing upon that question shows that the land could have been rented anywhere from $210 to $240 a year, and Claud said he occupied and used the land free of rent for two years, which aggregates $420 or $480 for the two years, and that his father gave him a house in addition, which he moved upon the land.

In law, equity, and good conscience that money and house belonged to the creditors of N. B. Pickenpaugh, and if insolvent, as he claims, he had no legal right to give that money and house to Claud, for the reason that a man must be just before he can legally be generous. If he was not insolvent, as contended by counsel for appellant, then his property had been either concealed or disposed of for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. If the former statement is true, then the gift of the rents and house to Claud was a fraud in law upon the appellant and his other creditors; and if the latter contention is true, then the donation of the rents to Claud was void because it was a fraudulent disposition of his property. Fehling v. Busch, 165 Mo. 144, 65 S. W. 542, and cases cited.

But independent of that fact, whichever horn of that dilemma we may take, the same evidence which shows its existence also cuts deeper and proves beyond cavil that the land conveyed by N. B. Pickenpaugh on August 28, 1903, to Claud was also a fraudulent conveyance of his property, and that it should be set aside for the benefit of his creditors. According to the testimony of both Claud and that of his father, the former took the crops and live stock raised on the land, which are the representatives of the rents given to him by his father, and paid for the land in suit with those crops and stock, which, as before shown, did not belong to him, either in law or equity. So by this little scheme of apparent innocent generosity of the father to the son, it was in fact a fraudulent scheme by which Claud has had not only the use of this land free of rent from August 28, 1903, to this time, which is worth not less than $1,500, but he has also become the owner of the land and the house thereon, if the deed from N. B. Pickenpaugh to him is permitted to stand, which land he testified was worth $750 over and above the mortgage standing against it. The two items, the rents and the value of the land, aggregate at this time about $2,250, which is far in excess of the amount of the judgment held by Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. against N. B. Pickenpaugh.

There is another view which must be taken of the deed from N. B. Pickenpaugh to Claud which vitiates it, and that is the confessed alteration of the deed. That act shows that it was made and executed in fraud of creditors, and that Claud knew of and participated in the fraud. The undisputed facts are that a short time after the deed was executed, which was on August 28, 1903, Claud filed it in the recorder's office of Putnam county for record; and that Mr. Underwood, the recorder of deeds, in copying the deed, wrote the description of the land in the record as follows: "Lying, being and situate in the county of Putnam and state of Missouri, to-wit: 40 acres N. W. of the N. W. section eight (8), township sixty five (65), of range twenty (20), and 80 acres W. ½ of N. E. quarter of section seven (7), township sixty five (65), of range twenty (20)." That shortly after the rendition of the judgment in the circuit court of that county against N. B. Pickenpaugh for the sum of \$1,750, which was on April 28, 1904, in favor of Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., they caused an execution to be issued on said judgment and placed in the hands of the sheriff; that the sheriff seized and levied the execution upon the following described lands, situate in that county, to wit: The north half of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 65, of range 20, and other lands not material to the question now under discussion. On or about August 16, 1903, after the levy of the execution, Claud A. Pickenpaugh, without the knowledge or consent of the makers of the deed, had it altered and changed in the following particulars: The following letters and words, "W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. E. quarter of section seven," contained in the deed, when recorded were so erased, altered, and changed as to read as follows, "North $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. E. quarter of section seven," and was on that day recorded in that changed condition. In other words, the letter "W," just before the figures " $\frac{1}{2}$," was erased, and in the place thereof the word "north" was written, thereby purporting to convey a different tract of land than the one which the deed purported to convey when first recorded.

N. B. Pickenpaugh and his son, Claud, testified that it was the intention of the former to convey to the latter the north half, and not the west half, of the northeast quarter of section 7, and that they so informed Mr. Valentine, the scrivener who drew the deed. Mr. Valentine testified that he was instructed to draw the deed so as to convey the north and not the west half, and that in writing the description of that land he wrote the letter "N" and not the letter "W," and that the recorder of deeds mistook the letter "N" for the letter "W," and therefore recorded the deed incorrectly in that regard. He also testified that, after the north half of the northeast quarter of said section had been levied upon, Claud took the deed back to him and informed him as to the manner in which it had been recorded. He also testified that he then examined the deed and found that the letter which the recorder had taken for a "W" was in fact the letter "N," and that at the request of Claud he erased the letter and wrote in its stead the word "north," and thereby made the deed read the "north $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. quarter of section 7," instead of the "W $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. quarter" of said section, as it appears of record. Claud's testimony was substantially the same as Mr. Valentine's was upon that point. Upon the other hand, Mr. Underwood, the recorder of deeds, who recorded the instrument, testified that he examined the deed closely, and that in his judgment the letter was a "W" and not an "N," as claimed by Claud and Valentine, and, consequently, in recording the deed he copied the letter as a "W."

The question now presented for determination is, which of those two stories is true, the one told by Valentine and Claud upon the one hand, or that told by Underwood upon the other. Mr. Underwood was a public officer with no interest whatever in the matter to influence or knowingly induce him to record the letter "N" contained in a deed as the letter "W." So, if he had not testified at all in the case, the law would presume that the deed was correctly recorded, for the reason the law presumes an officer properly performs his duty. But that is not all of the testimony upon that question. Mr. Underwood was called as a witness in the case, and he testified that in his judgment the letter was a "W," and for that reason he recorded it as such. If the weight of that evidence has not been overcome by the respondents, then we must hold that the deed never conveyed the north half of the northeast quarter of said section 7, whatever may have been the intention of N. B. Pickenpaugh.

The testimony of Claud Pickenpaugh and that of Mr. Valentine is relied upon to overbalance the evidence for appellants upon this point. We will discuss their testimony separately.

In weighing Claud's testimony, we must not overlook the relationship that exists between him and N. B. and Jacob W. Pickenpaugh, his father and grandfather, for the reason that they have greater interests depending upon the result of this litigation than he has. His own personal interest in the case must also be considered, as well as his whole testimony in the case, and his conduct and connections with the fraudulent transactions heretofore pointed out. According to his testimony, his interest involved in this suit is worth about $1,000, and his fraudulent conduct hereinbefore pointed out is not a very high certificate of commendation to this court. In testifying regarding the change in the deed, Claud said he "presumed the letter erased was an 'N,' and that he thought it was"; and the mere fact he had the deed changed shows that he thought the letter was a "W," and that he thought other people would so consider it, and for that reason he wanted to destroy all ocular evidence of the fact that there had been a mistake made in drafting the deed, and that fact could be best done by erasing the letter, which the recorder says was a "W," and thereby throw doubt in the mind of the court as to what the letter really was, and then rely entirely upon parol testimony to overcome the testimony and the official act of Mr. Underwood, the recorder. His conduct also shows a fraudulent design on the part of himself and father from the time this deed was executed to cover up and conceal the latter's property from his creditors, for the reason that he had the change made without the knowledge or consent of his father. He knew the deed was conceived in sin and delivered in fraud, and when he discovered the mistake and realized that one 40 of his father's land had not been disposed of, and by that mistake it had been left exposed to seizure and sale by his father's creditors, he hastens to the scrivener who drew the deed, without the knowledge or consent of his father, and had him change it, believing that was the only way the judgment lien could be cut out, and thereby give his deed a preference over the lien; knowing all the while that such act would be in furtherance of that design, and that his father would approve his conduct, without question, just as he did when informed of the change—he had the deed altered in furtherance thereof. When we view Claud's testimony in the light of those facts, and consider his interest in the case and his relations to the other parties to this litigation, we are not loath in saying that it is wholly unworthy of credence.

As to the testimony of Mr. Valentine, we have but little to say. He seems to be a man of some intelligence and judgment. From his title and official connection with this litigation, we judge he is a justice of the peace, and must be somewhat familiar with the ordinary forms of conveyancing and rules of evidence, and should have known the legal effect of a change made in a deed in the absence of the maker, and especially after the validity of the deed had been called in question by legal proceedings, as was the fact in this instance. Good judgment and fair dealing between man and man should have suggested to him the impropriety of his making erasures in the deed, but notwithstanding those facts, when Claud brought the deed to him and told him what the recorder of deeds had done, according to Claud's version, the following occurred: "Q. Is that what you and your father told Valentine to write in the deed? A. Yes, sir; and he told me when I took the deed to him the letter was an 'N.' Q. Did you see and read the deed? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the letter? A. I presume it was an 'N.' That's what I thought it was; and he said positively it was: said it was as plain as the nose on a man's face."

Now, if the letter erased was as plain as the nose on a man's face, was was the object of Mr. Valentine's erasing it and writing in its place the word "north"? That is a very suspicious fact to be considered in weighing his testimony, especially after the title of 40 acres of land hinged upon the fact whether the letter was an "N" or a "W." If he was honest in this conviction that the letter was an "N" and not a "W," but thought there might be doubt in the minds of other persons as to what the letter really was, then it seems to me common sense and common honesty would have suggested to him a new deed, giving the correct description of the land and reciting therein the fact that it was made for the purpose of making certain that which was doubtful in the deed in question; or if he did not care to go to the trouble of making a new deed, but wanted to be fair in the premises, why did he not first obtain the consent of the maker of the deed, and then simply draw a red line through the letter, and then write the word "north" above the line and indicate its proper place by a caret. By following either of the plans suggested, the doubt could have been made certain without destroying the existence of the very thing that was in question, and thereby place it beyond the power of the court or any one else to view and determine with ocular certainty what the letter in fact was; but by erasing the letter he compelled the court to depend entirely upon parol testimony in determining that fact. The deed itself, of course, in its present condition is no evidence whatever tending to prove that the letter was in fact an "N" and not a "W," but, upon the contrary, the alteration of the deed should be considered as a badge of fraud; and before any court would be justified in finding that an officer had erroneously recorded a deed which had been changed after its recordation, and especially after litigation had arisen regarding the very matter which is involved in the alleged error, the evidence should be clear, convincing, and overwhelming, leaving no room for a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the error. And we have no hesitancy in saying that the evidence in this case falls far short of that standard and weight.

With great pains we have carefully read this long record, fully weighed the evidence, and, after duly considering all of the legal propositions involved, we are clearly of the opinion that respondent, N. B. Pickenpaugh, disposed of his property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and especially Harber & Knight and Childers Bros.; and that his father and son, Jacob W. Pickenpaugh and Claud A. Pickenpaugh, knew of and were parties to his fraudulent purpose, and accepted the deeds mentioned in the record from him to them for the purpose of assisting him in carrying out the fraudulent designs.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the findings and judgment of the trial court were for the wrong parties, and that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the trial court to set aside its findings and judgment in favor of respondents, and enter a judgment for appellant, setting aside and canceling the deed, dated August 28, 1903, signed by N. B. Pickenpaugh and wife, conveying the land involved in this case to Claud A. Pickenpaugh, and to make such other orders, judgment, and decrees as may be just and proper in the premises; and to proceed according to due course of law and try the case upon the second count of the petition. It is so ordered. All concur.

CHILDERS v. PICKENPAUGH et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
March 31, 1909. Rehearing Denied
April 13, 1909.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 269*) — PLEADING—NECESSITY—ISSUES.

While as a general rule a homestead right must be pleaded to be available, yet a general denial to the petition seeking to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent against creditors authorizes proof of the fact that the land conveyed was a homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 791, 793; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

2. HOMESTEAD (§ 200*)—SETTING ASIDE—EFFECT.

A judgment debtor may relieve himself of the preliminary action of appraisers setting out to him a homestead out of his property, by appealing to the court issuing the execution, and on proper showing have the report of the appraisers set aside, and where the report is set aside the judgment debtor is left where he was before the appraisers acted, but where his exceptions are overruled and the report confirmed, the homestead limits become fixed, at least until there is a reassignment by reason of increase in value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-377; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 201*)—SETTING ASIDE—EFFECT.

Where a judgment debtor fails to pay the debt and fails to except to the act of the appraisers setting out to him a homestead out of his property, and the execution with the report of appraisers and report of sale is filed, the assignment of homestead to him is complete and the bounds of the homestead are fixed.

4. HOMESTEAD (§ 201*)—SETTING ASIDE—EFFECT.

Where an execution debtor pays the execution before sale and return, the land is relieved from the levy and from all the incidents thereof, including the act of the appraisers in setting out to him a homestead, and in such case no complete assignment of the homestead results.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

5. HOMESTEAD (§ 103*)—LIABILITIES—JUDGMENT AGAINST—LIEN.

A judgment against one occupying land in excess of his homestead exemption becomes a lien on the surplus from the rendition of the judgment, and such lien is not postponed until assignment of the homestead after a subsequent levy of execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 157, 158; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

6. HOMESTEAD (§ 201*)—SETTING ASIDE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

An execution debtor who takes no steps to set aside the setting off to him of a homestead by the officer holding an execution against him and the appraisers cannot collaterally attack the setting aside of the homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 379; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County; Geo. W. Wanamaker, Judge.

Action by William H. Childers against Napoleon B. Pickenpaugh and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

E. M. Harber, A. G. Knight, and N. A. Franklin, for appellant. Edward Higbee, Lorenzo Jones, and B. L. Robinson, for respondents.

GRAVES, J. This is a companion case of Childers v. N. B. Pickenpaugh and C. A. Pickenpaugh (decided at this term of the court) 118 S. W. 453. The two causes were tried together in the court below, and submitted to the court upon the same evidence. The evidence has been set out by WOODSON, J., at length in the other case, and a repetition thereof herein would be superfluous. One additional question in this case requires specific mention of some of the facts. From the evidence it appears that, on the same day a judgment for \$1,750 and costs was rendered against N. B. Pickenpaugh by the circuit court of Putnam county in favor of Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., the said N. B. Pickenpaugh made a deed to the northwest quarter of section 7, in township 65, of range 20, Putnam county, Mo., to his father, J. W. Pickenpaugh. This deed was delivered to the father, in the state of Iowa, at some time between 9 and 12 o'clock at night of April 26, 1904. On April 26th the judgment was rendered, so that there was a judgment prior to the delivery of the deed. The deed was not recorded until later. N. B. Pickenpaugh had originally 480 acres of land. Of this, 380 acres was in township 65 of range 20; thus: The southwest $\frac{1}{4}$ (fractional) of section 6, containing 120 acres or a little more; the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ (fractional) of section 7, containing 120 acres or a little more; the north $\frac{1}{2}$ of the northeast $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7, containing 80 acres; and the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ of the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 8, containing 40 acres. The other 120 acres was in section 36 of township 66, range 21. The 80 and 40 above described is the land involved in the companion suit, being the land alleged to have been sold to the son, C. A. Pickenpaugh. The south 80 acres of the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ (fractional) of section 7 is the land involved here.

On April 10, 1903, the National Bank of Unionville procured a judgment in the circuit court of Putnam county against N. B. Pickenpaugh and John H. Bishop for \$261.63, upon which execution was issued, and the sheriff, finding no personal property, proceeded to levy upon lands. The sheriff's return shows that the debtor Pickenpaugh refused, after notice, to select his homestead, and he selected three appraisers, who set out his homestead. The return shows that this was done on May 28, 1903, and that as and for his homestead there was set off the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ (fractional) of section 7, and other land in the southwest $\frac{1}{4}$ (fractional) of section 6, and then levied upon the remainder of the lands in said township 65. Under this levy the lands were advertised for sale on August 27, 1903. The return then further says: "I further state that the foregoing property was duly advertised for sale by R. L. Gray, sheriff, to be sold on Thursday, August 27th, 1903, but that the defendant, N. B. Pickenpaugh, on August 26th, 1903, paid to me, successor of the late sheriff R. L. Gray, cash to the amount of \$310.11, which I applied as follows: (Items omitted.) And I return this amount as satisfied. (Signature of sheriff.)" The word "amount" is evidently a misprint in the abstract. It should be "execution," for the sum paid was the full amount of debt and costs called for by the execution. This execution being fully satisfied, no further proceedings were had thereunder. On the day of its satisfaction, August 26, 1903, the deed to C. A. Pickenpaugh to the 80 and 40 above described was made under the circumstances fully described and set out in Judge WOODSON'S opinion.

After Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. got their judgment, an execution was issued, and the sheriff, finding no personal property, proceeded to levy upon the lands. Before doing so he notified Pickenpaugh of his exemption rights, but he refused to point out or select the homestead. The house in which he lived was on the land in section 6. Upon his refusal to designate his homestead the sheriff appointed three appraisers as required by law, who, after taking the required oath, set off to him as his homestead the following, as described in their certificate: "The fractional southwest quarter of section six (6) and the north forty acres of the north west fractional quarter of section seven (7) all in township sixty-five (65) range twenty (20) being in quantity the amount of 160 acres all situated in Putnam county, Missouri, and that we appraise the same as so designated and fixed by us to be of the value of one thousand dollars over and above incumbrances." After this land was set off as a homestead, the sheriff levied upon all of the remaining lands formerly held by N. B. Pickenpaugh, including the 120 acres in section 36, mentioned supra. Sale was had, and the lands levied upon were purchased at said sale by the plaintiff herein, William H. Childers, one of the firm of Childers Bros.

By the first count of the petition herein the plaintiff seeks to set aside the deed to J. W. Pickenpaugh on the ground that it was fraudulently made to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of N. B. Pickenpaugh, and especially Harber & Knight and Childers Bros., and that J. W. Pickenpaugh knew of and participated in such fraud. The second count was one in ejectment, laying ouster as of September 8, 1905, alleging the monthly rents to be $20, and damages $50, with prayer for judgment for possession as well as for the damages and monthly rents aforesaid. Upon a trial before the court, judgment went for the defendants and against plaintiff for costs. From this judgment, after unsuccessful motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment, the plaintiff duly appealed to this court.

The evidence pro and con upon the question of fraud is fully set out in the companion case of William H. Childers v. N. B. Pickenpaugh and C. A. Pickenpaugh, to which we make reference, as both cases were tried upon the same facts. This sufficiently states this case.

1. In the companion case, WOODSON, J., has discussed fully all the facts as they bear upon the question of fraud. He discusses the mysterious and unexplained disappearance of a large quantity of live stock owned by N. B. Pickenpaugh just before the $1,750 judgment. He discusses fully the alleged sale of the 120 acres of land to the son, C. A. Pickenpaugh, and in paragraph 3 of the opinion discusses the transactions involved in this suit. He reaches the conclusions that both of these sales were made to defraud creditors, especially Harber & Knight and Childers Bros. In his conclusions upon the question of fraud, we heartily concur. And in this case the trial court was in error in not setting aside the deed to J. W. Pickenpaugh involved in this case, unless it be for reasons urged, which we discuss next.

2. By counsel for the defendants it is contended that all the land involved in this suit had been set off to N. B. Pickenpaugh as his homestead, in the case of National Bank of Unionville v. N. B. Pickenpaugh and John H. Bishop, and that a conveyance thereof could not be in fraud of creditors. To this the plaintiff replies by saying (1) that no former setting out of this land as a homestead is pleaded; (2) that under the facts in evidence there never was a completed setting out of the homestead in the Bank Case; and (3) that Pickenpaugh having refused to select and point out his homestead when the sheriff notified him of his rights under the execution on the judgment for $1,750, and thus compelled and induced the sheriff to appoint appraisers to appraise and fix the boundaries of a homestead, he is precluded from now disputing the homestead so set out by the appraisers in this collateral way. It might be well to here state that the answers of the defendants were (1) a general denial, and (2) a plea to the effect that the sale was one made in good faith and not to defraud creditors.

That this former homestead, if in fact and law there was such, should have been specifically pleaded, we think is true in most cases. In Ency. of Plead. & Prac. vol. 10, p. 81, the rule is thus stated: "Wherever in an action property is sought to be recovered out of which a homestead is to be claimed, the right of homestead exemption should be set up in the pleading." To this, however, the respondents urge that the evidence as to the first assignment of a homestead went in without objection, and therefore plaintiff cannot complain of the action of the trial court, if in fact the trial court found that here was no fraud in the conveyance. In cases of alleged fraud the evidence is permitted to take a broad range, and we are not inclined to think that the general rule above announced has been applied to this character of a case.

The real issue here was, as stated in the petition, that said deed was made "for the purpose of cheating, hindering, and delaying said parties named and others in the collection of their claims and demands, and for the purpose of defrauding, cheating, hindering, and delaying his said creditors, and without any good or valuable consideration therefor." To this specific charge of fraud the defendants interposed the answer above indicated. The general denial put in issue the question of fraud. Now, it occurs to us that even under a general denial the defendants could show any state of facts which would rebut or disprove the charge of fraud, and one way of doing that would be to show that the property was of such character that there could not, either in law or fact, be a fraud perpetrated in the conveyance thereof. In our judgment, whilst as a general rule a homestead right must be pleaded, yet in those cases where the gravamen of the petition is fraud, then a general denial is sufficient to authorize a proof of a previously assigned homestead, as disproving the charge of fraud.

There is more difficulty in the second instance of the plaintiff, i. e., that there never was a completed assignment of this homestead under the bank judgment. Had there been a sale under this bank judgment and the execution returned showing the homestead assignment, there would be no question, but such are not the facts. The amount of the execution was paid and the execution returned satisfied. This payment took all the property levied upon out of the meshes of the law. This payment left the defendant in that suit in status quo as to all of his property. We take it that there are two ways in which a judgment debtor can relieve himself of the preliminary act of the appraisers in meting out to him a homestead out of his property: First, he can go to the court issuing the process and complain, and upon a showing have the report of the appraisers set aside. In Ency. of Plead. & Prac. vol. 10, p. 75, it is said: "Exceptions to the report of commissioners assigning homestead should be made to the court from which process issued, and to which the assignment is to be returned; and such report cannot be impeached in a collateral proceeding." The author cites in support thereof, among other cases, the case of Lallement v. Detert, 96 Mo. 182, 9 S. W. 568. If the report is set aside, the judgment debtor is left just where he was before the preliminary act of the appraisers. If, on the other hand, his exceptions were overruled and the report confirmed, the homestead limits become fixed, at least until there is a reassignment by reason of increase in value. Or, if the judgment debtor fails to pay the debt and fails to except to the action of the appraisers and the execution with report of appraisers and report of sale is filed, then such assignment of homestead is complete and the metes of the homestead fixed. It therefore appears that the completion of the homestead assignment depends upon his conduct after the preliminary step is taken by the appraisers. But in the second place, the judgment debtor can obviate the completed assignment of the homestead by his own act, independent of the court, as fully as he could by exceptions filed in the court. He can pay the judgment or execution debt and thus fully relieve his land not only of the levy under the execution, but all other incident steps taken under the execution and levy. When he pays the full amount of the execution, the executor becomes functus officio, and his land is relieved from the levy and all the incidents leading up to and connected with the levy, including the preliminary act of the appraisers. When he has discharged the debt, before sale and before return of the execution, he and his property are left just as if no execution had issued or any steps been taken thereunder. We therefore conclude that there was no complete assignment of a homestead. By a completed assignment of homestead is contemplated the action of the sheriff, the appraisers, and the court. Macke v. Byrd, 131 Mo. 682, 33 S. W. 448, 52 Am. St. Rep. 649.

The judgment under which plaintiff bought was entered April 26, 1904. No execution was issued until May 7, 1905, and no attempt to levy under the writ was made until August 9, 1905. From this it is argued that no lien attached to any part of the homestead premises, of at least 360 acres, until the assignment of the homestead had been made. In support of this we are cited to Macke v. Byrd, supra. The court in banc has just gone over this question in the recent case of White v. Spencer (not yet officially reported) 117 S. W. 20, in which case we disapprove of the broad language of the Macke-Byrd Case, and hold that a lien attaches to the surplus in quantity from the rendition of judgment. This point will have to be disallowed.

Under the judgment for $1,750, the defendant had his homestead duly appraised and set off by the officer and the appraisers. He took no steps in court or otherwise to thwart this action in that case, and such act cannot be collaterally attacked in this case.

Lallemont v. Detert, 96 Mo. 182, 9 S. W. 568.

It is not necessary to discuss other questions raised. From what has been said it follows that this case should be reversed and remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment for plaintiff canceling the deed as to the land involved, made by N. B. Pickenpaugh to J. W. Pickenpaugh, and proceed with the further hearing of this cause under the second count of the petition. It is so ordered. All concur.

McMAHAN et al. v. HUBBARD et al.
(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
March 30, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 459*)—CONSTRUCTION—PRESUMPTIONS AGAINST INTESTACY.

The general intention in a will to dispose of all of testator's property is given weight in determining what was intended by a particular devise, that may admit of enlargement or limitation; and the court, in pursuing the general presumption against intestacy, will supply, transform, or change the words in a will, so that the manifest intent will not be defeated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 978; Dec. Dig. § 459.*]

2. WILLS (§ 489*)—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION.

To determine the object of testator's bounty, or the subject of disposition, or the quantity of interest intended to be given, the court may inquire into every material fact relating to the person interested under the will and the property which is the subject of disposition, and to the circumstances of testator and of his family.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

3. WILLS (§ 490*)—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION.

Where testator devised land described as part of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, etc., without mentioning any section, and part of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, parol evidence was admissible to show what lands testator had at the times of the making of his will and at his death, for the purpose of showing that the lands described without the designation of the section would dispose of lands in section 28, which he owned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1047-1057; Dec. Dig. § 490.*]

4. WILLS (§ 560*)—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION.

Testator devised lands described as part of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, etc., without giving any designated section, and a part of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33. He declared that he made the gift to his wife, daughter, and adopted son, to give them ample support. The evidence showed that testator owned lands in section 28, which would be disposed of by the description in the will, provided section 28 was added thereto, and he owned no lands in section 33, except those described in the will. Held, that the words "section 33," in the will, would be confined to the land described as the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, so that the will disposed of testator's lands in section 28.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1216-1220; Dec. Dig. § 560.*]

5. WILLS (§ 488*)—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION.

Parol evidence is admissible to show a latent ambiguity in a will, which may be removed by extrinsic evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1024, 1025, 1033-1036; Dec. Dig. § 488.*]

6. WILLS (§ 662*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONDITIONS—PERFORMANCE.

Testator devised lands to his wife, daughter, and adopted son, and declared that the gift to the son was conditioned on his remaining with testator's wife until he was 21 years of age and behaving himself toward her as a son. The wife objected to the adopted son marrying when he did, but they were soon reconciled, and he continued to live on the farm and cultivate the land, and he was at the wife's house every day, furnishing her fuel and keeping up the farm. The wife was satisfied with his conduct toward her. Held, that the adopted son fulfilled the condition imposed and was entitled to the devise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1537; Dec. Dig. § 662.*]

7. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 14*)—PENDENCY OF OTHER ACTION.

A suit to determine title to land, claimed by plaintiffs under a will and codicil admitted to probate, was tried without objection or request for a continuance, though the answer alleged the pendency of a suit by defendants to contest the codicil. Service of process in such suit had not been made on plaintiffs. During the trial an order for an alias summons on plaintiffs was obtained, and defendants only raised the pendency of the suit as a defense to the merits. Held, that the court properly refused to abate the suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. § 108; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

8. WILLS (§ 354*)—PROBATE.

Where the original will and codicil were written on the same sheet of paper, to which was attached the certificate of the probate judge, certifying that the judge had examined the instrument, and had heard the evidence of the subscribing witnesses, and adjudged the same to be the will of testator, the court properly ruled that the court had probated both the will and the codicil.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 354.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Newton County; F. C. Johnston, Judge.

Action by Dora McMahan and others against Nannie E. Hubbard and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Hubbard appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Sheppard and John T. Sturgis, for appellant. Horace Ruark, James H. Pratt, and George Hubbert, for appellees.

GANTT, P. J. This action was commenced in the circuit court of Newton county to determine the title to certain lands in said county. The plaintiffs claimed title to the lands in controversy under and by virtue of items 3 and 11 of the last will and testament of John McMahan, deceased, who is the common source of title, and the first section of the codicil to said will. The said provisions of the will are in these words:

"3. In order that my wife, my daughter

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Leah, and my adopted son William McMahan may have ample support, I give and bequeath unto them, the following described land, viz.: Seven acres, part of S. W. quarter of S. E. quarter, also N. W. quarter of S. E. quarter, also the E. one-half S. W. quarter and that part of the W. half S. W. quarter lying east of the present fence running on the east side of said tract. Also the twenty-three acres, being part of N. E. quarter of N. W. quarter of section 33. All the above land in township 25 of range 31."

"11. All the property herein bequeathed shall descend to the heirs of the bodies of those to whom it is bequeathed, provided said heirs are born in lawful wedlock and should any of my legatees die without heirs of their body as above stated, then all the property bequeathed to them shall descend to my legal heirs."

Codicil: "In explanation of section 3, where the bequeath is to my wife and daughter Leah and adopted son William McMahan, at the death of my wife, the real estate herein mentioned is to descend to my daughter Leah and William McMahan (adopted son)."

The plaintiffs, who are the wife and child of William McMahan, deceased, alleged in their petition that the land intended to be described and conveyed by the third clause of the said will to the testator's wife, daughter Leah, and adopted son William McMahan, is the land in controversy herein, and that by mistake the scrivener, in writing the will, failed to designate that all of said land described in said third item of the will is in section 28, except the last described tract of 23 acres, which is properly described as being in section 33.

The defendants in their answer allege that the said John McMahan made no disposition in his last will of the part of the land in controversy, which is located in section 28; that as to this land he died intestate. The defendants also said in their answer that all the bequests and gifts made to the said William McMahan by the said will were made upon the following terms and conditions, set forth in the seventh item of said will in the following language, viz.:

"7. All the bequests made to him are conditioned that he remain with his adopted mother until he is twenty-one years of age and behaves himself toward her as a dutiful son."

And it is asserted that the said William McMahan failed and refused to comply with the said terms or provisions of said will, and by his conduct and action forfeited any and all bequests under the terms and provisions of said will. The cause was tried in the circuit court of Newton county, and at the trial it was agreed that John McMahan died on the — day of —, 1888, and that he left surviving him his widow, Elizabeth McMahan, who died on the 29th of July, 1904; that he also left surviving him as his only heir at law J. Raphael McMahan, who is a son by a former marriage, his daughter Leah McMahan, now Leah Goin, and his daughter Nannie E. Hubbard; that William McMahan, mentioned in the will as his adopted son, died on or about the 25th of December, 1901, leaving as his heirs his widow, Dora McMahan, and his children, Logan, Floyd, Noble, and Duard McMahan, all plaintiffs herein; that the defendant Commodore Thomas is the only child of Leah Goin.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs tended to show that the testator, John McMahan, at the time he executed his will, and at the time of his death, and for many years prior thereto, owned the land in suit in section 28, township 25, range 31, and neither at the time of the execution of his will, nor at any other time did he own any land in section 33, except the 23-acre tract described in said will as being a part of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33 and the 40-acre tract west of said 23 acres, which he devised to his son J. R. McMahan in the ninth item of the will. The evidence also tended to show that, if section 33 should be held to be a part of the description of all the land described in item 3 of the will, then all of it, except the 23-acre tract, was at the time the said will was executed and at the time of the death of the testator owned by T. B. Durham and James Hubbard. A plat of section 33 and of a part of section 28 will accompany this opinion. The plaintiffs are claiming title to that part of the land shown by said plat which is inclosed in the red dotted lines. [Indicated by heavy black lines in plat.]

The evidence clearly demonstrated that the land in which the plaintiffs claim an interest in this suit belonged to John McMahan at the time his will was executed and at the time of his death, and that that part of said land contained in section 28 would have been the identical land described in item 3 of the will, if the scrivener, who drew the will, had inserted the words "section 28" just after the words "and that part of the W. half S. W. quarter." The testimony disclosed that the lands owned by John McMahan as his home farm was a compact body of land, mostly in section 28, and the balance in section 33, immediately south. The house in which he and his family lived was and is on the part of the farm in section 28, and was occupied by his widow until her death in 1904. His wife, daughter Leah, and adopted son were the members of his family, living at home when the will was made. In his will he expressed the intention of providing that his family should have "ample support," and to this end devised 180 acres of land by description. To his daughter Nannie Hubbard he gave land which was not a part of the home farm, to his son J. R. McMahan, who was married and living on the land given him by the will, he gave three 40-acre tracts, extending north and south along, and constituting, the western part of the farm.

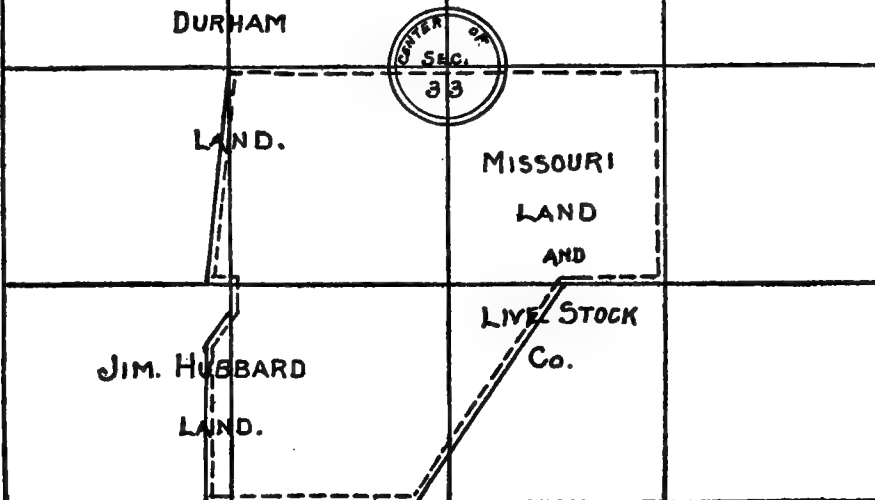

FIG. 2, SHOWING MISDESCRIPTION.

Two of these 40-acre tracts are in section 28, and one in section 33, and are correctly described in the will. After deducting these special devises to his daughter Nannie Hubbard and his son J. R., there was left the 130 acres with the residence on it.

The evidence also showed there was at that time, and yet is, a fence dividing the land occupied by and given to J. R. McMahan from the balance of the home place. This fence was somewhat irregular, and did not follow the subdivision lines, but ran east of the same, cutting off a few acres of land from the J. R. McMahan tracts, to wit, the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33 and W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 28. This fence was in the mind of the testator when he made his will, as he says he gives to his son J. R. McMahan the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 28, "west of the present fence" and the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33 "lying west of the present cross-fence." In item 3 he devises to the plaintiffs "that part of the W. half S. W. quarter lying east of the present fence running on the east side of said tract," but omits the number of the section. The testator also owned at that time, in section 28, a 7-acre tract, part of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and this he also devised to his wife, daughter, and adopted son, but omitted the section also in that description.

1. Among the cardinal rules often invoked by this court in the construction of wills is the presumption that the testator intended to dispose of his whole estate. This presumption seems to amount to this: Where there is a general intention appearing in the will to thereby make a complete disposition of all of the testator's property, such general intent is allowed weight in determining what was intended by a particular devise that may admit of enlargement or limitation. Watson v. Watson, 110 Mo., loc. cit. 171, 19 S. W. 543. Whatever may be the rule in other states, it is well established in this state that in pursuing the general presumption, and to prevent the happening of the incongruous condition of the estate passing partly by will and partly by descent, words may be supplied, transformed, or changed in the will, so "that the instrument may not perish and the manifest intent of the parties be not defeated by the palpable error of the scrivener. Thomson v. Thomson, 115 Mo., loc. cit. 67, 21 S. W. 1085, 1128; Briant v. Garrison, 150 Mo., loc. cit. 668, 52 S. W. 361; Rines v. Mansfield, 96 Mo. 398, 9 S. W. 798; Presnell v. Headley, 141 Mo. 184, 43 S. W. 373; Ro Bards v. Brown, 167 Mo. 447, 67 S. W. 245." It is also well settled in this state that for the purpose of determining the object of the testator's bounty, or the subject of disposition, or the quantity of interest intended to be given by his will, the court may inquire into every material fact relating to the person who claims to be interested under the will and the property which is claimed as a subject of disposition, and to the circumstances of the testator and of his family and affairs, for the purpose of enabling it to identify the person or thing intended by the testator or to determine the quantity of interest he has given by his will. Riggs v. Myers, 20 Mo. 229. In the last-mentioned case a will described land devised as the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 4 in township 60, range 38, in Holt county, Mo., the devisee to have the privilege of using water of the big spring, with free access to and from it as he might wish; and it was held by this court that parol evidence that the corresponding quarter sections of township 59 in the same range and county were intended to be devised was admissible, it appearing that the big spring was upon the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 4, township 59, and that the testator never owned or claimed any land in section 4 of township 60. Willard v. Darrah, 168 Mo. 660, 68 S. W. 1023, 90 Am. St. Rep. 468. Under this adjudication we think the court properly admitted parol evidence to show what lands the testator in this case had at the time of making his will and at the time of his death; and when this evidence is considered we think the will, taken as a whole, shows a clearly expressed purpose on the part of John McMahan to dispose of all his property, real and personal; and we think it is also a fair presumption that, as he owned no other real estate, outside of his home place, except that which he devised to his son J. R. and his daughter Nannie Hubbard, there can be little doubt that he intended to give to his wife and his daughter Leah and his adopted son this home place. He was devising his own estate, and he did not intend to give away anything which did not belong to him; and yet, if the contention of the defendants is true, he would have been devising the land which belonged to his neighbors Durham and Hubbard and the Missouri Land & Live Stock Company, which he did not own at the time.

Again, to sustain the defendants, we must reach the conclusion that the testator meant to die intestate as to a very large part of his estate; a conclusion which, we have seen, the law would never presume, especially where the decedent makes a will, as John McMahan did in this case. In the third item of the will the testator says that he makes provision for his wife and daughter Leah and his adopted son, to have "ample support" out of the lands which he devised to them. Certainly he could not have, for one moment, supposed that he provided an "ample support" for them out of the 23 acres of land in section 33, and yet he must have known that this was all the land he owned in section 33 at that time. The bare statement of the proposition shows that it is a most unreasonable and unnatural construction of the language used by the testator. He had described 130 acres of land, only 23 acres of which was in section 33. It is readily seen that the real point in controversy in this case is whether it was competent for the circuit court to admit parol evidence to show that the description of the land devised to the wife and daughter Leah and their adopted son, if section 33 was a part of said description, was not owned by the testator, and thereby show that the description was false, if it should be held that all the said lands were in section 33. While there has been great conflict in the authorities as to how far a court can go in receiving testimony to show that the words used in a will are an incorrect description of land devised, we think the rule announced by Judge Scott in Riggs v. Myers, 20 Mo. 243, has become the settled law of this state, and such evidence is admissible to show a latent ambiguity, and when this is done the rule is well settled that a latent ambiguity may be removed by extrinsic evidence. In Willard v. Darrah, 168 Mo., loc. cit. 670, 68 S. W. 1023, 90 Am. St. Rep. 468, this court approved the rule laid down in 2 Underhill on the Law of Wills, § 910, in these words: "In every case the court is entitled to be placed in possession of all the information which is available of the circumstances of the estate and family of the testator when he made his will, to the end that the court may be in his situation as nearly as may be, and may interpret and understand the will as he would if he were alive. When the evidence of extrinsic circumstances is all in, it may appear that a description in the will which was intended by the testator to apply to one object or thing is applicable, with more or less certainty, to several objects or things. This is a case of latent ambiguity, and parol evidence is then received to ascertain which person or thing was intended by the testator. Where the ambiguity is latent, it is created by evidence of extrinsic facts, and the same evidence is admissible to remove it." In Page on Wills, § 819, it is said: "Where the testator describes the property devised by township, range, section, and quarter section, but does not locate it in the correct section or range, or the like, the weight of authority is that extrinsic evidence is admissible to show exactly what real estate the testator owned. Under this view, if he owns any real estate which corresponds in part to the description in the will, the court will reject the incorrect part of the description and will pass the realty conveyed by the correct description."

In the very exhaustive discussion of this question by the Supreme Court of Indiana in Pate v. Dushong, 161 Ind. 533, 69 N. E. 291, 63 L. R. A. 593, 100 Am. St. Rep. 287, that court cited with approval the decision of this court in Riggs v. Myers, 20 Mo. 239, and numerous other cases which supported the text of Page above cited. The court added: "There are some cases which seem to hold that, when the evidence of the circumstances, situation, surrounding and property owned by the testator at the time he made his will shows that the testator did not own the land as described in his will, but owned other land to which a part of the description might properly apply, no latent ambiguity was disclosed, unless the words 'my land,' or other words stating in effect that the testator owned the land devised, are contained in the will. The rule established by the weight of the authorities and the better reason, however, is that such evidence does disclose a latent ambiguity, whether words stating in effect that the testator owned the lands devised are used or not; and if by rejecting the false description, or the false part thereof, sufficient remains, when considered from the position of the testator, to identify the land intended with reasonable certainty, the same will pass under the will to the devisee. It is true that often rejecting the false description, or the false part thereof, the words 'my real estate,' or words of like import, if used by the testator in making the devise, would be of great force in identifying the land intended, and might alone or in connection with the true part of the description, if any, pass the land to the devisee, in cases where, if the words were not used, the devise would fail for want of a description sufficient to identify the land. The enforcement of this rule does not reform or add any words to a will, for this cannot be done, but enables the court to construe the will after rejecting the false part of the description and thus carry into effect the intention of the testator as expressed therein." A leading case on this subject is Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 210, 6 Sup. Ct. 617, 710, 29 L. Ed. 860. The testator gave to his children a lot described as lot numbered 6 in square 403, together with the improvements thereon erected. The parol evidence disclosed that the testator did not have or own lot 6 in square 403, and that the same had no improvements thereon; but he did own lot 8 in square 406, which had a house thereon, and it was held that this raised a latent ambiguity, and the evidence, taken in connection with the context of the will, was sufficient to show there was an error in the description, and the lot really devised was lot 8 in square 406. Numerous other cases might be cited, but would subserve no good purpose.

Now, applying the foregoing principles to the case in hand, it is not necessary for this court to supply the words "section 28" as applied to the description of the lands preceding the 23-acre tract. All that is necessary is to confine the words "section 33" to the 23-acre tract, in immediate connection with which it is used, and this we do because the evidence abundantly established that the testator did own 7 acres, part of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and the east half to which that description would specifically apply, in section 28; and so, by rejecting the words "section 33" as to these last described lands, and applying the evidence which shows that these lands constituted the home place of the testator, we find that they are correctly described, except that the section is omitted from their description, and there is sufficient description to identify these lands, and they passed under the will of John McMahan to his wife, daughter Leah and adopted son. This conclusion fully accords with the presumption that the testator intended to devise all of his estate, and not leave this valuable tract of land wholly undisposed of, and because, moreover, it accords with his desire to provide an "ample support" for these devisees, whereas a different construction would render this expressed intention wholly inoperative.

2. But it is insisted by the defendants that the seventh clause in the will created a condition precedent, and that no interest passed to or vested in the said William McMahan by clause 3 of the will, because it did not appear that he had complied with the conditions, set out in clause 7, that "he should remain with his adopted mother until he was twenty-one years of age and behave toward her as a dutiful son." Now, as to this contention the court found as a matter of fact that William McMahan was over 21 years of age at the time of his marriage, and the evidence abundantly established that finding. The only way in which it was claimed that he violated this condition is that he married before he was of that age; but all the testimony shows that he was an exemplary young man, hard worker, sober and industrious, with no bad habits. While there was some evidence tending to show that his foster mother objected to his marrying when he did, the evidence establishes that they were soon reconciled, and that he continued to live on the farm, although in another house, and cultivated the land, and took care of the crops and her stock; that he was at her house every day, and furnished her her fuel and kept up the farm. The evidence tends clearly to show that the foster mother at least was entirely satisfied with his conduct towards her. We do not, under these circumstances, think it is necessary to go at any length into the learning on the subject as to whether this condition was a precedent or a subsequent one, for in either event William McMahan fulfilled it.

3. The answer set up that there was then pending a suit to contest the codicil to this will of John McMahan. The evidence tended to show that, while such a suit had been filed, no service had been had on the defendants in that case, who are the plaintiffs in this case. This plea was in the nature of a plea in abatement to the trial of this cause. But the record of this case shows that when it was reached it was tried without any objection or a request for continuance; and during the trial of this case the plaintiffs in that case obtained an order for an alias summons on these plaintiffs, and only raised the pendency of that suit as a defense to the merits of this case. The point now made is that it was error for the circuit court in this case to attempt to adjudicate the title while the contest of the codicil to the will was pending. We think the court committed no error in refusing to abate this suit until the trial of the alleged contest over the codicil. No service had been had on the defendants in that case, who are the plaintiffs in this case, and they were not in court. Moreover, the defendants went to trial without objection in this case. It was perfectly competent for the circuit court in this case to find, as it did find, that the original will and codicil had both been probated by the probate court of Newton county in 1888. The original will and the codicil thereto were written upon the same sheet of paper, and it has attached thereto the certificate of the probate judge of Newton county, certifying that the judge of Newton county had examined the said instrument, and had heard the evidence of the subscribing witnesses, and adjudged the same to be the last will and testament of John McMahan. The court very properly, we think, ruled that the probate court probated both the will and the codicil, as they were both written upon one piece of paper and were presented to the probate court at one and the same time for probate. If the court rejected the codicil, it was its duty to grant a certificate of rejection; but, taken together, we think the probate court granted a certificate of probate of the whole will, including the codicil.

We have carefully gone through various other objections as to the admissibility of testimony and the rejection of the same, but in our opinion there was no error in this respect, but, if any at all, of a technical nature, which was not such as would call for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 429*) — SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — "FRONTAGE."

Rev. St. 1899, §§ 6266-6271 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 3133, 3134), authorizing a special tax on the lots "on any street" for the improvement of the street, and providing for the apportionment of the cost upon the several lots according to the "frontage," contemplate that the property shall front on the street improved, and a city paving a street together with the area at the place of intersection with another street cannot levy a special tax on property abutting on the latter street; the word "frontage" being but an expression of the front-foot rule, under which no other property than that abutting on the street improved can be assessed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 57*)—STATUTORY AUTHORITY.

A municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as are granted in express words or are necessarily fairly implied in or incident to such as are expressly granted, and the court in determining whether a certain power has been given to a city must resolve every doubt against the power and in favor of the citizen.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Livingston County; Francis H. Trimble, Judge.

Action by the City of Chillicothe, on the relation of Jim E. Meek, against G. G. Henry. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kitt & Taylor, for appellant. B. B. Gill & Son, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This action is to enforce the lien of a special tax bill against the property of the defendant fronting on Elm street, in the city of Chillicothe, a city under 10,000 inhabitants and incorporated by special charter. The trial court adjudged the bill to be invalid. The city, by ordinance, directed the paving of 24 feet in width, of that part of Calhoun street lying between Broadway and Locust streets, except where it intersected with other streets, at which intersections the paving, after allowing for parkway and sidewalk space, was to be the full width of Calhoun street. The effect of this was to pave the center of the intersecting street, 24 feet in width, across Calhoun street, or, to state it differently, to pave Calhoun street its full width across the intersecting street; the result being that, if afterwards the city should conclude to pave Elm street, the place of intersection with Calhoun street would be already paved.

The controversy here is over the intersection of Elm and Calhoun streets. The lot sought to be charged is in the block fronting on both streets; but the lot itself is on Elm street alone, 400 feet from Calhoun street. The plaintiff affirms the right to a tax bill for paving the intersection against the lot, although not abutting on Calhoun, while defendant claims that his lot, not being on that street, cannot be charged. The power to make an assessment against the private property of the citizens must be found in the statute. If it is not, the attempt at taxation must fail. The statute claimed to justify the bill in controversy is sections 6266-6271, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 3133, 3134). The first section provides that the council of every city under special charter of less than 10,000 inhabitants (Chillicothe being of that class) shall have power by ordinance to levy a special tax on the "lot or lots on any street, alley, avenue or public highway within such city, town or village, for the purpose of paving, graveling or macadamizing and guttering and curbing all or a part of such streets," etc. Section 6268 provides that, "when such work shall be completed, the improvements committee, city engineer or other officer having the work in charge, shall compute the costs thereof and apportion the part or proportion levied against the owner or occupier as aforesaid among the several lots or parcels of land to be charged therewith and charge each lot or parcel of property with its proper share of such costs according to the frontage of the property." That section further provides that the city council "if it deems it just and proper may levy and collect on the owner or occupier as aforesaid, a special tax sufficient to defray only a part or proportion of the costs of the paving * * * aforesaid, leaving the part or proportion of the costs not levied against said owner or occupier to be paid by such city * * * and in such event special tax bills shall issue as aforesaid for only the part or proportion levied against the owner or occupier." Considering the sections together, as was done by the learned trial judge, it is apparent that the statute contemplates that the property to be charged is the property with its frontage on the street to be paved; that is to say, the abutting property. "Frontage" in the connection used in the statute is but an expression of the "front-foot rule," and under such rule no other property than that abutting on the street improved can be assessed. Elliott on Streets, §§ 555, 559. Calhoun street was the street ordered to be paved, while, as already stated, the property here sought to be charged fronts on Elm street, and, instead of any part of it being on Calhoun street, it is 400 feet away. It has not been the understanding in this state that such property could be assessed under the front-foot rule unless provision is made therefor. In Sedalla v. Coleman, 82 Mo. App. 560, we sustained tax bills on lots situated in the adjoining block, as the one here is situated. But that was under a statute for cities of the third class, containing just what the present statute lacks; that is to say, special power and provision was made for tax bills against specified property not abutting on the street improved to pay for paving intersections.

Plaintiff insists on a line of argument like this: That the space of intersection of streets is on both streets, and that, therefore, the paving of this intersection is a paving of Elm street as well as Calhoun, and that, therefore, this property is "on" and has a "frontage" on a street which is improved, and thereby fills the requirement of the statute that the property taxed must be on the street improved. But authority to take private property without the consent of the owner ought to be more direct and less "round about" than that. It is said by plaintiff that, unless the property on Elm street is made to pay for the paving of a part of the intersection at Calhoun, when Elm comes to be paved, it will be found that an intersection has been already provided without cost to the property on that street. It has been found to be true that no plan or scheme of taxation can be devised that will work out absolute equality of burden with mathematical exactness under all conditions. It may be the Legislature has considered that, when Elm street comes to be paved, it will be in the condition of Calhoun, and also cross-intersecting streets which have not been paved, when it will have to bear the burden it now escapes, and in this way (all the streets being improved at different times) matters will be equalized, as near as may be, throughout the city. Or it may be that the lawmakers meant to leave it in the power of the city to omit intersections from a charge against the property abutting on the street improved and put the charge for that part of the work against the city at large, as indicated by the last quotation from section 6268, supra. These are only suggestions with no pretense of decision thereon; and, however that may be, it is certain that there is absence of power to burden the property in question with a part of the cost for a paving authorized by ordinance for Calhoun street. The argument made by plaintiff in favor of his view of the law is in the face of that fundamental rule of municipal law which is that, in deciding any question whether certain power or authority has been given to a municipality, every doubt must be resolved against the power and in favor of the citizen. City of St. Louis v. Bell Tel. Co., 96 Mo., loc. cit. 628, 10 S. W. 197, 2 L. R. A. 278, 9 Am. St. Rep. 370; City of St. Louis v. Kaime, 180 Mo. 309, 322, 79 S. W. 140. And such argument is also met by that other rule of interpretation of such statutes, which is that municipal corporations can exercise only such powers as are granted in express words or are necessarily fairly implied in or incident to such as are expressly granted. City ex rel. v. Eddy, 123 Mo., loc. cit. 557, 27 S. W. 471. It is claimed by plaintiff that, since the answer of defendant was merely a general denial, the defense made was not admissible. The defense was not what is known in pleading as new matter, arising since the cause of action, which must be specially pleaded. The defense goes to show that there has never been a cause of action, and that the asserted power to authorize the taxation of Elm street property never existed. This view of the pleadings in such cases was considered at length in Cushing v. Powell, 130 Mo. App. 576, 109 S. W. 1054.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

TARR v. CRUMP.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
March 29, 1909. Rehearing Denied
April 19, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 549*)—EXCEPTIONS—REVIEW.

The bill of exceptions must show that exceptions were taken to the denial of motions for new trial and in arrest, and the fact that the record proper shows that exceptions were saved to the denial is insufficient to require review on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2450; Dec. Dig. § 549.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 501*)—EXCEPTIONS—REVIEW.

To preserve exceptions to rulings on motions for leave to file a reply to the answer setting up new matter and to strike out the reply, exceptions must be preserved in the bill of exceptions to the overruling of the motion for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2301; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 959*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

Refusal or allowance of a reply to an answer setting up new matter, being discretionary with the trial court, will not be reviewed on appeal, unless abused.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County; E. W. Hinton, Special Judge.

Action by Weldon Y. Tarr against George W. Crump. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Booth and E. C. Anderson for appellant. Arthur Bruton, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. The plaintiff and defendant were partners in the coal business. This action was instituted for a settlement and dissolution of the partnership, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff for $104.12.

The record proper, as presented to us in the abstract, shows motions for new trial and in arrest were overruled by the trial court and that exceptions were saved. But that is not the place to show that exceptions were taken. The place for that is in the bill of exceptions itself. The bill presented here does not show any exception in that respect, and we are thus left as if no bill of exceptions had been preserved.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

But defendant contends on the record proper—that is, on the face of the pleadings—plaintiff was not entitled to judgment. The basis of the contention is that the answer set up new matter which, if true, entitled him to judgment, and that the plaintiff confessed its truth by failing to file a reply. The question was raised in the trial court during the trial. The bill of exceptions on the subject is hard to understand. Near the beginning of the bill it is shown that objections to certain evidence for the reason that matters alleged in the answer, asserted to be sufficient to defeat plaintiff's claim, were not denied by a reply and should be taken as confessed. Plaintiff then asked leave to file a reply. Defendant objected. The court gave leave to file it, subject to objections, and afterwards such objections were sustained, and then the bill recites: "Said reply is then filed." Defendant then asked and was granted leave to file motion to strike it out. That motion was overruled, and defendant excepted, and the trial proceeded. But there was a failure to preserve such exception by the failure to properly preserve exceptions to overruling the motion for new trial, as already explained.

Then the trial and evidence in full is recited, and at the end of the bill it appears that: "Leave given yesterday to file reply; said leave given subject to objections made by counsel for defendant. Objections to filing reply sustained." It thus appears that a reply was permitted, and not permitted. If there was a reply, the defendant's ground of objection fails. If there was none, the action of the court in refusing to permit one to be filed, as already shown, is not before us. Roden v. Helm, 192 Mo. 71, 90 S. W. 798. Besides, either refusal or permission to allow a reply to be filed was discretionary with the trial court, and the record does not disclose anything indicating an abuse of that discretion.

The record before us does not warrant an interference with the judgment, and it is affirmed. All concur.

SNYDER v. CRUTCHER et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Feb. 23, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 20, 1909.)

1. REFERENCE (§ 8*)—COMPULSORY REFERENCE—WHEN AUTHORIZED.

An action for money paid out in violation of the usury law and for attorney's fees awarded by the act of 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 172; Ann. St. 1906, § 3708), as an additional penalty for exacting usury, though involving numerous payments and their application on account of interest, does not involve a long account within the statute relating to reference, and the court cannot direct a compulsory reference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 13-23; Dec. Dig. § 8*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 141*)—JURISDICTION OF COURT ON APPEAL.

A controversy beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace is beyond the jurisdiction of the circuit court on appeal to it from the justice's court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 472-474; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 47*)—JURISDICTION.

Since the cancellation of instruments and an order for their surrender is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of equity, a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction of a suit for the cancellation of notes and for an order for their surrender.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 184; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

4. USURY (§ 110*)—FORFEITURES—PENALTIES—PERSONS LIABLE.

A person who loaned the money, who received all the interest paid, and who owns the notes given for the loan, is the only necessary or proper party in an action at law to recover usurious interest with the penalty imposed by the act of 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 172; Ann. St. 1906, § 3708), and a third person to whom the notes were made payable is not a proper or necessary party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 266*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

One who has neither appealed nor saved exceptions to the refusal of the court to disregard exceptions to the report of the referee cannot urge in the appellate court that the trial court erred in failing to disregard the exceptions to the report.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1044*)—REVIEW—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—COMPULSORY REFERENCE.

The error of the court in directing a compulsory reference, and thereby depriving a party of his right to trial by jury, is reversible.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Jas. T. Neville, Judge.

Action by C. L. Snyder against L. F. and L. A. Crutcher. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

This action was originally commenced before a justice of the peace in Greene county. The statement filed with the justice set out, in substance: That plaintiff, borrowing from the defendant L. F. Crutcher various sums of money, evidenced by various notes, had been charged and had paid by way of interest various amounts, which he claims were usurious; that plaintiff had given to the other defendant, L. A. Crutcher, a note for substantially the same debt, the exchange or substitution of one note for the other being made, as it is alleged, by L. F. Crutcher, who was the father of L. A. Crutcher, to avoid the statute against usury, adopted in 1905; that the note last referred to was without consideration other than that attached to the note given to L. F. Crutcher; that L. F.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Ann. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Crutcher was the real owner and holder thereof; and that plaintiff had made all payments on the notes to L. F. Crutcher. Plaintiff demanded judgment against the defendant L. F. Crutcher for the amount paid him over and above lawful interest, which plaintiff avers was $66.35, and plaintiff demanded that, if L. F. Crutcher has the note, he produce the same in court before the justice for cancellation, or, if the defendant L. A. Crutcher has the note, then that he be ordered to produce it before the justice, and that the justice order that the same be canceled. There is the further demand that $50 be taxed as costs in this suit as a reasonable attorney's fee in favor of the plaintiff against both defendants. It appears that at the trial before the justice, the defendants answered as follows: "Come now the defendants and say they did not owe the plaintiff any sum whatever. But for counterclaim against the plaintiff says he is indebted to L. F. Crutcher in the sum of $38.50, with 8 per cent. interest from January 9, 1905, as shown by his promissory note of said date, for which amount he prays judgment."

The justice appears to have rendered a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $66.75 as debt and $50 as attorney's fee and costs of suit. It does not clearly appear whether the judgment for the debt was against one or both of the defendants. An appeal was duly prosecuted by the defendants to the Greene county circuit court, where, on February —, 1907, plaintiff filed an amended petition, in which he took up this matter of the $38.50 note, set up by L. F. Crutcher as a counterclaim before the justice, and averred that it was given for $35 actually borrowed, and that it had been surrendered and merged into a note for $32.50, this latter note representing the $35 which it was claimed had been borrowed and for which the $38.50 note had been given and also interest in advance added, as well as for $40 additional money then borrowed, and that the note for $38.50 had been canceled and paid by the giving of this note, but that the plaintiff forgot to take up the $38.50 note. The remainder of this amended statement is practically the same as that filed with the justice; it being claimed, however, that the overpayment was $63.20, for which he prayed judgment, and the plaintiff again stating that all his transactions were with L. F. Crutcher, although the name of L. A. Crutcher was used. And it is then averred, in effect, as before, that one or other of the defendants have the $32.50 note, and plaintiff prayed the court to require either or both of them to produce the note for cancellation, and $50 attorney's fee is demanded under the statute. Acts 1905, p. 172. On February 11th the defendants moved to strike out this amended petition because it changed the cause of action and set up different causes than that before the justice, which motion was overruled, and defendants, on the 21st of February, 1907, filed an answer to the amended petition, in which answer they deny owing any sum whatever to plaintiff, while L. F. Crutcher sets up, as a counterclaim in his favor, the $38.50 note above referred to, and the defendant L. A. Crutcher sets up a counterclaim on a note for $20, which he claims was given to him by plaintiff on the 1st of September, 1905. Plaintiff thereupon, on May 13, 1907, filed a second amended petition, in which he takes up the matter of the $38.50 note and avers that he had only borrowed $35 on it, and also takes up the execution of the $32.50 note substantially as stated before, and then takes up the matter of the $20 note, which he avers was for money borrowed of L. F. Crutcher, although the note appears to be in the name of L. A. Crutcher. This petition again pleads usury and prays judgment against the defendants for the cancellation and surrender of the notes and for an attorney's fee of $50, as in each of the other statements or petitions. On the same day, that is, May 13, 1907, defendants filed their answer to this second amended petition, in which they deny that they owe plaintiff anything whatever, while L. F. Crutcher sets up the $38.50 note as a counterclaim, and L. A. Crutcher sets up the $20 note as a counterclaim.

On May 14, 1907, plaintiff filed his second amended petition, which is as follows: "Now comes the plaintiff in the above-entitled cause, and for amended petition states: That on January 9, 1905, plaintiff borrowed of defendant L. F. Crutcher the sum of $35, executing therefor a blank note, specifying no amount, as was required by said defendant, and also executing to said defendant an assignment of future wages with power of attorney to collect the same for a period of three years, from the Frisco Railroad Company, plaintiff's employer. That said assignment was required of plaintiff by said defendant L. F. Crutcher to secure said loan. That said assignment and said note was executed by plaintiff as aforesaid, and mailed to defendant L. F. Crutcher at Springfield, Mo., from Willow Springs, Mo., where plaintiff was at that time employed as yardmaster. That thereafter, without plaintiff's knowledge, defendant filled in said note for the sum of $38.50, as it now appears. That the plaintiff received the $35 in the shape of a bank draft, mailed to him by said defendant, together with a letter of transmittal, and notifying plaintiff that 10 per cent. interest would be due on January 21st following. Said letter of transmittal was dated January 10, 1905. That on January 27, 1905, plaintiff borrowed the further sum of $40 of defendant L. F. Crutcher, and signed and delivered to him a note for $82.50, which defendant L. F. Crutcher explained as follows: For the $35 loaned January 9th, and for the $40 then furnished, and 10 per cent. advance interest $7.50; a total of $82.50. Plaintiff signed said note at the demand of defendant L.

F. Crutcher, who produced the first note, declaring it canceled and paid by the giving of the said second note. That although paid in this way, plaintiff forgot to take away said first note, but left it lying on defendant's table. That said note has been fraudulently retained by said plaintiff (defendant?), who, well knowing the same to be fully paid, seeks to make it a counterclaim herein. That plaintiff thereafter returned to Willow Springs to his employment there, and upon demands of plaintiff (defendant?) paid, through his agent, to defendant L. F. Crutcher as follows: On or about February 23, 1905, $8.25; on or about March 23, 1905, $8.25; on or about April 23, 1905, $8.25; or on about May 23, 1905, $8.25—a total of $33, which should have gone on said note as credits, and leaving actually due by plaintiff to defendant, of the $75 actually loaned, the sum only of $44. That in August, 1905, while plaintiff was in Springfield on a visit, defendant L. F. Crutcher presented to him for his signature a new note for the sum of $82.50, but made payable to his son L. A. Crutcher. That said L. A. Crutcher was not present, and that no money passed between plaintiff and L. F. Crutcher, but that said L. F. Crutcher explained that this was an exchange of notes made necessary by the new usury law, and that henceforth the payee would be his son L. A. Crutcher, while he (L. F. Crutcher) would merely be security. That plaintiff thereupon, and at the demand of said L. F. Crutcher, signed said new note and delivered the same to him, who returned the other $82.50 note to him, which is filed herewith. That the said last note was executed for the reasons aforesaid, and that plaintiff received no money whatever from either of the defendants at that time or since as a consideration. That thereupon defendant L. F. Crutcher demanded and collected of plaintiff, as interest monthly, as follows: In August, 1905, $10. That on or about September 1, 1905, plaintiff borrowed the sum of $18 from defendant L. F. Crutcher, and delivered to him a note for $20, due on demand, and bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. That plaintiff believes the note he signed was made payable to L. A. Crutcher as it now appears, but that L. F. Crutcher produced the money, and consummated the loan, and really owns said note, as defendant L. A. Crutcher was not present at the time, and knew nothing of the transaction. That thereafter defendant L. F. Crutcher demanded, exacted, and collected of plaintiff, as interest on his indebtedness, the following sums at the following times: In September, 1905, $13; in October, 1905, $10; in November, 1905, $12; in December, 1905, $10; in January, 1906, $10; in February, 1906, $15; and on April 3, 1906, $10. That the total amount received of L. F. Crutcher on all notes held by him, made payable either to himself or to L. A. Crutcher, since January 9, 1905, is $93. That prior to June 14, 1905, plaintiff paid on said debt the total sum of $33. That when the Statute 3808, as amended in 1905, went into effect in June, 1905, plaintiff actually owed defendant L. F. Crutcher only the sum of $44; and since that time, to wit, on September 1, 1905, borrowed $18 more as aforesaid, making a total indebtedness since said law became effective of $62. That since said law became effective plaintiff, in compliance with the demands and exactions of defendant L. F. Crutcher, has paid to him, as interest, the sum of $110, and the same is an excess over and above the total of said debt and legal interest of $43.36, for which excess plaintiff prays judgment against defendants, and that all notes held by either of the defendants be produced for cancellation. Plaintiff further prays that there be taxed, as costs herein, an attorney's fee of $50 as authorized by section 3708, Rev. St. 1899 of Missouri, as amended by Act 1905, as appears in said 1905 Session Acts at pages 172 and 173 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2077)."

On June 12th defendants filed a motion to strike this amended petition from the files and to dismiss the case because the facts stated in this amended petition wholly changed the cause of action from that stated in the original petition and tried by the justice, and because different and new causes of action are stated in the amended petition. This was overruled. Defendants do not appear to have filed an answer to this last petition, but the cause appears to have been tried on the issue tendered by the last petition and the answer filed May 13th to the preceding one. The case coming on for trial, both parties announced ready. Plaintiff demanded a jury. One was called and sworn on voir dire, and while the examination of the jurors was proceeding, the court announced that the cause was one which should be referred. A referee was accordingly appointed "to hear and determine all the issues of law and fact." To this both plaintiff and defendants excepted; the defendants alone, however, preserving their exceptions by term bill duly filed.

The cause was heard before the referee; both parties appearing. The referee found for plaintiff, recommending judgment against L. F. Crutcher alone for $43.36, but that $50 as attorney's fee and costs be taxed against both defendants, and that the three notes be canceled. Exceptions and amended exceptions were filed to the report of the referee; the court giving leave from time to time to file them, except as to the last filing of amended exceptions, which latter appear to have been filed beyond the date extended by the court. It is not deemed necessary to set out the facts connected with the filing of these exceptions. It is stated in the abstract that the court overruled the exceptions, save as to the allowance of $50 attorney's fee, which it disallowed, but in all other respects it is recited in the abstract that the court confirmed the report of the referee. As the referee found only against L. F. Crutcher as liable for the excess interest, $43.36, finding that he was owner of all the notes and had received all the payments thereon, and found against both defendants for costs and attorney's fee, and also recommended the cancellation of the notes, the judgment, as recited in the transcript on file, hardly sustains this statement. It reads: "Now on this day comes parties plaintiff and defendants in the above cause, and said cause having been submitted to George W. Goad, referee, and the said referee having filed his report, the court having examined and fully heard said report, and being fully advised in the premises, and being satisfied that the said report is just and correct except as to $50 allowed as attorney fee which is by the court stricken off, it is ordered, considered, and decreed by the court that said report be in all things confirmed and approved except the $50 attorney fee. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the referee be allowed the sum of $75 for his services as such referee, and it is further ordered that the stenographer be allowed the sum of $99.45 for her services in the above cause, same to be taxed as costs. And the court doth find that the amount due and owing from the defendants to the plaintiff on the notes herein sued on to be the sum of $43.36 as debt and damages." Then comes the judgment proper: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the plaintiff C. L. Snyder have and recover of and from the defendants L. F. Crutcher and L. A. Crutcher the sum of $43.36 as debt and damages aforesaid, assessed by the court, together with all costs in this suit laid out and expended, for which execution may issue." That is to say, apparently confirming the report, when the matter in judgment is reached, it is against both defendants for $43.36, and for costs, as above taxed, and does not order cancellation of the notes. Motion for new trial being duly filed, overruled, and exceptions saved, defendants appealed.

REYNOLDS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). We have set out the pleadings and various steps in the case perhaps with unnecessary detail; but we have done that to call attention to what we cannot but regard as the unnecessary and costly evils resulting from an ill-advised reference of a very simple case, originating before, and clearly within the jurisdiction of, a justice of the peace and taken by appeal from his court to the circuit court. Here is a case of an action to recover money alleged to have been paid in violation of the laws of the state against usury and for the recovery of an attorney's fee awarded by the act of 1905 (Ann. St. 1906, § 3708) as an additional penalty for the exaction of usury. It is an action which under the old forms of pleading would be called an action "on the case." The facts to be proved in it, as shown by the petition on which it was before the circuit court, are: From whom did plaintiff borrow the money? Was a note for $38.50 given for $35 actually borrowed? Was the excess in that note usurious? Was that note merged in the note for $82.50? Was the latter note, to the order of L. A. Crutcher, a mere substitute for the former one in favor of L. F. Crutcher? Had the real owner of it, L. A. Crutcher, loaned any money to the plaintiff? How much had he loaned? What amount had plaintiff paid on the several notes? Was this amount in excess of the legal rate of interest? These were the substantive facts in the case to be tried. They presented no feature whatever of a long account within the meaning of the statute, although there may have been payments at several dates. These payments were the ordinary payments on account of interest, and the amount of them and the excess of them was a matter that any ordinary jury could have readily determined. The case, originally tried before a justice of the peace, does not seem, from anything in the record, to have been beyond his comprehension or his ability to solve in a simple and expeditious manner. Yet a case of this kind seems to have been converted into a proceeding in equity, and the very learned and accomplished referee has filed an elaborate report embodying his findings and conclusions of law, in the preparation of which he has evidently devoted much time and great learning. As a matter of course, the demand, contained in the statement filed before the justice and repeated in the circuit court, for a cancellation and delivery of the notes, was something beyond the power of the justice of the peace and beyond the power of the circuit court in an action coming to it on appeal from the justice's court. The cancellation of instruments and an order for their surrender is a matter peculiarly within the jurisdiction of courts of equity. So we entirely eliminate that phase of the case from all consideration. This left nothing before the justice of the peace or the circuit court but the ascertainment of certain disputed facts. With those crucial facts established, there was nothing left but the application of payments, which were never disputed, and the calculation of interest. This did not involve the taking of a long account, within the purview of the statute. Creve Cœur Lake Ice Co. v. Tamm, 138 Mo. 385, 39 S. W. 791; Kenneth Investment Co. v. Bank, 96 Mo. App. 125, loc. cit. 134, 70 S. W. 173. On the substantive facts in the case defendants were entitled to a jury. They did not waive it, but insisted on their right to it all through the proceeding. Furthermore, with this matter of the cancellation and return of the notes eliminated, there is no cause whatever stated against the defendant L. A. Crutcher. An examination of the petition, confirmed by the testimony in the case, and a reading of the report of the referee, shows that L. F. Crutcher was the man who loaned the money, who received all the interest, with whom all the transactions were had, and who is now the real owner of the notes, and, in an action at law, as this was, L. A. Crutcher was neither a proper nor necessary party. It was not alleged in any of the statements filed, and there is not a particle of proof to show, that he received a dollar of the money claimed to have been unlawfully exacted, or that he was the one who made the loans. But with this case, and on these facts, a large bill of costs has been run up, and much time of counsel and of officers of the court consumed. Repeating that this is a case properly within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, whose courts are established for the speedy determination of controversies—people's courts, as they are sometimes called—courts wherein no formal pleadings are required, cases coming into the circuit court from them should be very few and should be very exceptional to justify a reference. This case is not one of them and is not within the exception.

Many objections and exceptions were taken and saved to the admission and exclusion of testimony before the referee. It is also strenuously insisted by respondent that the exceptions to the report of the referee, having been filed more than four days after filing of report by the referee, and in fact after the time allowed by the court for filing exceptions had expired, should be disregarded. The plaintiff, who now urges this point, neither saved exceptions by term bill to this, nor has he appealed. Hence this point cannot be now considered. Tinsley v. Kemery, 170 Mo. 310, loc. cit. 316, 70 S. W. 691. Nor, in the view we take of the case, is it necessary or profitable to consider any of the other questions presented.

As much as we dislike to reverse cases on what appear to be technical rulings or on matters of mere practice, we are forced to do so in this case, for here technicality tends to substantial justice and to the preservation of a right held to be inalienable, a right of trial by jury.

The judgment of the honorable circuit court of Greene county is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BURKE v. GRAND LODGE, A. O. U. W. OF MISSOURI.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
March 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied
April 19, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 750*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT—ENFORCEMENT OF BY-LAWS.

A by-law of an insurance order providing for a forfeiture of the benefit certificate held by the member as a penalty for his failure to pay, when payable, the dues and assessments called for by his contract, is reasonable, and will be enforced by the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1895; Dec. Dig. § 750.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 755*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT—WAIVER OF GENERAL RULES BY SUBORDINATE LODGE.

Where the laws of the grand lodge do not permit a subordinate lodge or its officers to alter or waive any of the rules relating to the insurance contract, a custom of the subordinate lodge without the knowledge of the officers of the grand lodge, permitting members to remain delinquent in the payment of dues, and advancing from its treasury the amount of such dues, does not operate as a waiver of a forfeiture for nonpayment of dues.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1911; Dec. Dig. § 755.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 755*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT—BY-LAWS—WAIVER OF PROVISIONS.

Where a custom of a subordinate lodge of allowing members to remain delinquent in the payment of dues in violation of a general by-law, or in advancing such dues from the lodge funds, is brought to the notice of the officers of the grand lodge and receives approval, either express or implied, the general by-law must be regarded as waived or modified by the recognized custom.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Walter A. Powell, Judge.

Action by Margaret Anne Burke against the Grand Lodge, Ancient Order of United Workmen, of Missouri. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for defendant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry L. Jost and Frederick H. Bacon, for appellant. W. W. Colvin and W. S. Gabriel, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff, the widow of William F. Burke, deceased, brought this suit on a benefit certificate issued by defendant, a fraternal beneficiary society incorporated in this state. In 1897 Burke became a member of Summit Lodge No. 272 of said order at Kansas City, and defendant issued to him the benefit certificate in suit, by the terms of which the Grand Lodge promised to pay plaintiff, the beneficiary, $2,000 on the death of the member, on condition "that said William F. Burke shall in every particular while a member of said order comply with all the rules, laws, and requirements thereof now existing or hereafter enacted." Burke died December 28, 1905. Plaintiff contends that he was a member in good standing at the time of his death, while defendant claims, in its answer, that, on account of failure to pay an assessment duly made and payable on November 28, 1905, Burke was suspended and forfeited the benefit certificate. Further, it is claimed by defendant that, after said suspension and forfeiture, Burke voluntarily abandoned his membership in the order. The reply of plaintiff is a general denial. At the close of the evidence introduced by plaintiff, the court gave the jury a peremptory instruction to return a verdict for defendant. Plaintiff took a nonsuit with leave, and in due time filed a motion to set it aside. One of the grounds of the motion was newly discovered evidence. This ground was supported by affidavits. The court sustained the motion on this ground alone, and defendant appealed.

It is argued by counsel for defendant that, with the facts stated in these affidavits added to those adduced at the trial, plaintiff still has failed to show a right to recover on the certificate. In our statement we shall treat the facts appearing for the first time in the affidavits as though they were supported by evidence introduced at the trial. We do this because no point is made, nor does it appear, that the plaintiff was not diligent in the discovery of the new evidence, or that it was merely cumulative. The bill of exceptions recites that plaintiff "made out a prima facie case by the admission of the benefit certificate, the death on December 29, 1905, of William Francis Burke," and that defendant then assumed the burden of proof. After defendant offered evidence in support of the affirmative defenses interposed by its answer, plaintiff introduced her evidence on the issues thus raised, after which the court instructed a verdict for defendant. In the application for membership, dated April 19, 1897, Burke agreed "that compliance on my part with all the laws, regulations, and requirements which are, or may be hereafter, enacted by said order, is the express condition upon which I am entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund, and have and enjoy all the other benefits and privileges of said order."

It is admitted Burke was born November 17, 1857, and therefore was in his fortieth year when he became a member and received his certificate. The laws of the order required him to pay regular monthly assessments which in 1905 were $3.50 each. Of this sum 50 cents went to the local lodge for its expenses and $3 to the Grand Lodge on account of the "Guarantee Fund" out of which death benefits were paid. These fixed assessments were as regular as clockwork, and were due and payable by the member on the 28th day of each month. They were payable to the financier of the local lodge who was charged with the duty of forwarding, at stated times, the portions due the Grand Lodge. Law 197 of the order provided: "A failure or neglect of any member to pay any assessment on or before the 28th day of the month in which the same is payable to the financier of his subordinate lodge, or to the grand recorder, as provided by law, shall work ipso facto a suspension and forfeiture of all rights under any beneficiary certificate issued to him to whomsoever the same may be payable, and no action on the part of the lodge or any officer thereof shall be required as essential to such suspension and forfeitures. Any member suspended or expelled from the order for any cause whatever, forfeits all claim to the beneficiary fund during suspension or expulsion." It is admitted that Burke failed to pay the assessment due November 28, 1905, a month before his death, and that he was reported as suspended at the meeting of the local lodge on the night of December 7th, but plaintiff endeavors to avoid the forfeiture by showing that the right to claim it under the provisions of Law 197 was waived by defendant by reason of the practice of the local lodge, known to and acquiesced in by the managing officers of the Grand Lodge, of accepting payments of assessments long after they became due. The financier of Summit Lodge testified that Burke's assessments for March and April, 1905, were paid May 28th. Those for July, August, and September of that year were paid September 20th. Burke was not entered suspended for these delinquencies for the reason given by the witness that a member in good standing "stood up for him." In such cases it was the practice of the local lodge to pay the assessments due the Grand Lodge out of its own funds, and the member was not reported to the Grand Lodge as delinquent.

We quote from the financier's testimony: "We made a practice of carrying delinquent members without suspending them if a brother got up and stood good for them. The account of Mr. George Weissinger, page 11, shows that the dues for January, February, and March, 1905, were paid August 28th. I do not know who stood good for him. There should have been somebody. I never carried anybody unless there was. I have no record as to who did it. On page 11 it shows that the dues of Mr. J. M. Wallace for March were paid April 5th. He was not suspended for March because he was carried. Brother Reed was up there, and stood good for him. I was right there. The same party stood good for him for other months. It was not always some one who stood good—sometimes one and sometimes another. I never carried men unless some one stood good for them. They were suspended if no one would volunteer. By standing good, I mean they would pay for him and stood up for him, and not say that he was all right. I do not remember that Mr. Reed paid for these various delinquents. I did not suppose he stood good for all of them. I do not recollect all of them. Sometimes they may have said that they would pay the account. On page 110 C. D. Updegraff shows the June assessment was paid July 19th. I can tell exactly who stood up for him. It was B. L. Gould who paid for him. I expect he paid for all these delinquents in that list. It was very probable he was delinquent in June, August, November, and December, 1905, because Brother Gould paid for him a great many times. He paid the assessments as they came due. I presume the total amounts to something like $15. It was a common practice to carry these delinquents if there was anybody who stood good for it. * * * One of our duties is to keep the lodge alive, and we carried delinquents as far as we could. I cannot tell in the particular instances who stood for the delinquents. They did not say they were all right, said they would stand good for them, and we credited them. * * * One man was carried from January to August. It was done a great many times."

It appears from the testimony that the practice of granting these indulgences was very common. Further, it appears that it was not carried on secretly, but, to the contrary, was given some prominence in lodge meetings, partly for the purpose of building up the membership by encouraging the belief that a worthy member in sickness or misfortune would be treated benevolently, and not by the harsh rule provided in law 197. The witness, whose affidavit was given in support of the motion to set aside the nonsuit, states that the practice came under the personal observation of managing officers of the Grand Lodge at times when such officers visited meetings of the local lodge. On one of such occasions the Deputy Grand Master Workman spoke in open lodge, and praised the lodge "for its generosity in carrying its delinquents out of its general fund." The receiver of the lodge was the person to whom Burke generally paid his assessments, and was the member who "stood up for him" when he became delinquent from time to time. He refused to stand up for him when Burke was in his last illness and most needed the favor. He had promised Mrs. Burke, the plaintiff, that he would see that her husband was never suspended. He testified: "During these months [July, August, and September, 1905] I was responsible for the money. Mrs. Burke asked me to see that he was never suspended, and I did so. I told her that I would. I did not give notice to him or her or anybody when he was suspended. I do not give anybody notice. I did not tell her that I would not stand good any further."

Provisions in the laws of a fraternal beneficiary society for the enforcement of prompt payment of assessments levied for the support of the benefit fund are regarded by the courts as necessary to the proper maintenance of the order, and the accomplishment of one of the important and highly beneficent objects of its existence. A law of the order prescribing a forfeiture of the benefit certificate held by the member as a penalty for his failure to pay, when payable, dues and assessments provided by his contract, is reasonable, and will be reasonably enforced by the courts. Harvey v. Grand Lodge, 50 Mo. App. 472; Curtin v. Grand Lodge, 65 Mo. App. 297; Lavin v. Grand Lodge, 104 Mo. App. 1, 78 S. W. 325. Stipulations to insure the prompt payment of the benefit assessments constitute the substance and essence of an insurance contract of a beneficial association. Modern Woodmen v. Tevis, 117 Fed. 369, 54 O. C. A. 293.

Since the laws of defendant order did not permit subordinate lodges or their officers to alter or waive any of the general laws, especially those of the essence of its insurance contracts, we agree with defendant that the custom of the subordinate lodge of which Burke was a member of permitting members to remain delinquent in the payment of their dues and of preventing their suspension and the forfeiture of their insurance by paying their Grand Lodge assessments out of funds in their own treasury could not of itself, and without the knowledge and approbation express or implied of the Grand Lodge, operate as a waiver of the provisions for the forfeiture of the insurance and the suspension of the member appearing in general law 197. But we think if this custom was brought to the notice of managing officers of the Grand Lodge, and, instead of being reprobated, received either express approval or that approval which should be implied from silence, the general law must be regarded as modified by the recognized custom. Such is the view expressed by the Supreme Court in McMahon v. Maccabees, 151 Mo. 522, 52 S. W. 384, where it is said: "A fraternal society doing a limited life insurance business as the law permits may waive the provisions of its own law in regard to forfeiture of the insurance on account of failure to pay premiums within the strict requirement. 'The general rules of waiver and forfeiture are the same in association insurance as in ordinary insurance'—[citing cases]. A member of such society is presumed to know its laws, and the contract of insurance is to be construed as having been made under the limitations of those laws. But a member has a right to look to the general conduct of the society itself in respect of the observance of its laws, particularly those relating to his own duties, and, if the society by its conduct has induced him to fall into a habit of nonobservance of some of its requirements, it cannot without warning to him of a change of purpose inflict the penalty of failure of strict observance. A member dealing with a subordinate officer of the society, knowing his duties to be prescribed by law, has no right to rely upon the act of that officer, if he should attempt to waive a requirement which under the law he has no right to waive. But, when he has dealings of that kind with such officer, and those dealings are of such a nature that they must pass under the observation of those who have in charge the ultimate management of the company's affairs to such an extent as to justly induce the member to believe that the practice is approved by the company itself, the company is estopped to take advantage of the situation. It is essential to the life of these societies that the members pay the assessments promptly, as their laws require. As a general rule, it is cheap insurance, its cost is calculated at the lowest rate at which it can be carried, and, if the society is lax and its officers carry the sentimental feature of its organization too far into its business management, it is liable to fail of its beneficent purpose. But the duty of guarding against such misfortune is primarily on the officers who are intrusted with its management at the head, and, if they permit lax dealing of their subordinate officers to the degree of misleading a member, the responsibility must rest upon the society."

But it is argued by counsel for defendant that "the Grand Lodge had no power or control over the funds of the subordinate lodge belonging to its general fund. If the subordinate lodge had the power to use its own funds as it pleased whether with or without the knowledge or consent of the Grand Lodge, no such knowledge of how it used its funds could affect it in any way. The knowledge of such custom on the part of the Grand Lodge is as immaterial as it would be if it knew that a stranger was paying the assessments for a member. * * * It appears from the evidence that the assessments were always promptly paid to the Grand Lodge, and, so long as the assessments were paid to the Grand Lodge, it was absolutely immaterial who paid them." We do not sanction this proposition. The subordinate lodge, unlike a stranger, was under the supervision and control of the Grand Lodge. The Grand Lodge could interdict the custom and put the local lodge under ban if it disobeyed. It had the power, and exercised it, of regulating and controlling its subdivisions and their members. It would be unjust and inequitable to say that the Grand Lodge might receive the benefits from a custom in derogation of its laws, and then repudiate the obligations necessarily resulting from such custom. The effect of its approval of the custom was to say to Burke: "The Grand Lodge encourages the beneficent practice of your local lodge of preventing suspensions and forfeitures by giving aid from its treasury to its unfortunate but worthy members. You need not fear a forfeiture if you bring yourself within the pale of this custom." We have here all the elements essential to a waiver. The course of dealing of the subordinate lodge became the course of dealing of the head lodge. Burke had a right to rely on it, and to act on the supposition that he would not be summarily deprived of this important benefit without notice. On the hypothesis of facts presented by the evidence of plaintiff the automatic forfeiture of the insurance provided in law 197 was destroyed by the custom under consideration, and no suspension or forfeiture could be declared without notice to the member.

On the subject of the abandonment of the order by Burke, we find the evidence presents an issue of fact for the jury to solve. The court acted properly in setting aside the nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

DAHMER v. METROPOLITAN ST. RY. CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
March 29, 1909. Rehearing Denied
April 19, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 156*)—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

The court in passing on a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence must consider the proof in the light most favorable to the maintenance of the cause of action pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 353; Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 93*)—OPERATION OF CARS—CARE REQUIRED OF MOTORMAN.

A motorman, seeing that a traveler intends to cross the track ahead of the car, must make reasonable use of the means at hand to check the speed of the car, so that the traveler may cross in safety, irrespective of the traveler's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 197; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 93*)—USE OF STREETS.

A traveler and a motorman in charge of a street car are each rightfully on the public streets, and neither may require the other to make way for him, but each must employ reasonable care to avoid a collision, and, since the street car is the more dangerous vehicle, the humanitarian principle imposes on the motorman the additional duty of being watchful to discover the peril of travelers, and, on becoming aware of its existence, to make every reasonable effort to remove it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 197; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—COLLISIONS—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries in a collision with a street car, evidence held to require submission to the jury of the company's negligence for failing to exercise proper care after the discovery of a traveler's peril.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 244; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 882*)—INVITED ERROR—RIGHT TO COMPLAIN.

Under the rule that a party, though not bound by a position he is compelled to take by adverse rulings of the court, is bound by one he voluntarily assumes, a defendant voluntarily treating the issue of contributory negligence as one for the jury cannot complain of the submission of the issue, though plaintiff was guil-

6. DAMAGES (§ 131*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A traveler on a street was injured in a collision with a street car. Three ribs were broken, and he received some cuts and bruises. He paid his doctor $75, and at the time of the trial, over a year after the injury, he had not fully recovered. Held, that a verdict for $1,000 was not excessive.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; E. E. Porterfield, Judge.

Action by John E. Dahmer against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Lucas and F. G. Johnson, for appellant. Elliott & Ehinger and Ulmann & Miller, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the collision of an electric street car operated by defendant with the wagon in which plaintiff was riding. The cause of action is founded on the alleged negligence of defendant in the operation of the car. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,000.

The injury occurred on the morning of December 15, 1905, at the intersection of Fifteenth and Campbell streets, public thoroughfares in Kansas City. Campbell street runs north and south, and Fifteenth street east and west. There is a break in the continuity of the south line of Fifteenth street at this crossing. East of Campbell street, Fifteenth street is much wider than it is west of Campbell street. Along the middle of Fifteenth street defendant operates a double-track street railroad. The north track is used by west-bound cars, the south track by cars going east. Plaintiff drove north on Campbell street in a one-horse milk wagon, and intended to cross Fifteenth street and continue northward on Campbell. When he reached the south line of Fifteenth street, he looked to the east and saw a car coming west on the north track. He testified that the car at this time was east of Harrison street. If this statement is accurate, the car was from 450 to 500 feet east of the point of collision. Plaintiff drove on in a slow trot, which he described as being no faster than an ordinary walk. When his horse was about 25 feet from the north track, plaintiff looked again, and observed that the approaching car was about 250 feet from the crossing. He did not look again in that direction until his horse was on the north track. Then he discovered that a collision was imminent, and attempted to escape by hurrying the horse, but his efforts were unavailing. The car struck the wagon at about the front wheels with a force so violent that plaintiff was hurled through the window of the front vestibule, and sustained the injuries of which he complains. After the collision, the car ran about 125 feet before it was brought to a standstill. From the moment plaintiff entered Fifteenth street there was no obstruction to vision between the wagon and the car. Plaintiff knew of the approach of the car, and the motorman states that he observed the wagon. Witnesses for plaintiff stated that the car was going fast, but they did not attempt to give the rate of speed in miles per hour. The motorman testified that in approaching Campbell street the car ran at the rate of 12 to 14 miles per hour. There is substantial evidence introduced by plaintiff to the effect that the motorman made no effort to stop or check the speed of the car until the collision occurred. This is contradicted by the evidence of defendant, which tends to show that the motorman exerted himself to stop as soon as he became aware that plaintiff intended to attempt to cross ahead of the car. It is downgrade from Harrison to Campbell streets. The motorman testified that with a good rail the car might have been stopped in 100 feet, but that at the time in question the rails were frosty, and therefore not in good condition for making a quick stop. Pertinent to the issue of when the motorman should have known that plaintiff was in peril, we quote from the testimony of the motorman as follows: On direct examination: "I first saw the man driving across Fifteenth street, starting that way, and, as he got to the outgoing track—that is, the opposite track going out, we was on the inbound track—as he got there, the horse stopped just for an instant, and then he began whipping his horse across the track, and I applied the air. I did not have much time. The horse got across the track and the car struck the wagon, and it caused the driver to fall inside the front window of the car, and one or two passengers caught him and held him to keep him from falling in front of the car." On cross-examination: "Q. With reference to the north track, how far south of that track was the wagon when you first saw it? A. 20 or 25 feet. Q. 20 or 25 feet south of the north track? A. Yes, sir. Q. What rate of speed about was that horse going at that time? A. Just driving in an ordinary trot. Q. Sort of a dog trot? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was a slow gait? A. Yes, sir; an ordinary gait. Q. When you saw that wagon at that time about 20 or 25 feet south of the north track, how far east of the point of collision was your car at that time? A. I suppose about 50 feet, maybe further than that. I am not sure. Q. You say it was not any further east than that? A. I am not sure how far east it was. Q. Could it have been 150 feet east at that time? A. It might have been, I don't know." The petition alleges "that said injuries to plaintiff were caused by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, its agents, servants, and employes in charge of said car in running the said car into and against the wagon of this plaintiff after the said defendant, its agents, servants, and employes in charge of said car, saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, that the plaintiff was in a position of peril upon said track in time to have stopped said car, and have avoided said collision with plaintiff's wagon." The answer contains a general denial and the averment "that, if plaintiff received any injuries at the time mentioned in said petition, the same were caused by plaintiff's own fault and negligence."

First, it is insisted by defendant that its demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. In view of the facts and circumstances in proof most favorable to the maintenance of the cause of action pleaded (which is the view we must entertain in passing on the demurrer to the evidence), we think the negligence of defendant under the principle and rules of the "humanitarian" doctrine is apparent. From the facts that plaintiff ceased to look in the direction of the car when his horse arrived at a point about 25 feet from the track, and that he proceeded in a manner to indicate to an observant person in the situation of the motorman that he intended to cross ahead of the car, the motorman should have realized the existence of such purpose, and should have made reasonable use of the means at hand to check the speed of the car in order that plaintiff might cross in safety. This duty of the motorman was not removed nor affected by the consideration that plaintiff himself might be negligent. Both plaintiff and defendant were rightfully traveling on a public street. Neither had the right to require the other to make way for him. Each was bound to employ reasonable care to avoid a collision. But, since defendant possessed the more powerful and dangerous vehicle, the humanitarian principle imposed on it the additional duty of being watchful to discover the peril of plaintiff, no matter by whose fault that peril arose, and, on becoming aware of its existence, to make every reasonable effort to remove it. McKenzie v. Railway (Mo.) 115 S. W. 13; Cole v. Railway, 121 Mo. App. 605, 97 S. W. 555; Grout v. Railway, 125 Mo. App. 552, 102 S. W. 1026. Since the inference fairly may be drawn that the motorman should have observed that plaintiff was intending to cross ahead of the car when the horse was 25 feet from the track, facts in proof strongly tend to convict the motorman of being remiss in not attempting to reduce speed. He must have been at least 125 feet from the point of collision, and, had he employed reasonable care, it is fair to assume either that he could have stopped the car in that distance or so materially checked its speed that the collision would have been averted. Instead of doing this, witnesses for plaintiff say (and the fact that the car ran over 100 feet after the impact supports the statement) that the motorman put forth no effort to stop until the car was right at the wagon. We think the evidence most favorable to plaintiff was sufficient to take the case to the jury on the issue of "humanitarian" negligence, and therefore that the demurrer was properly overruled.

The instructions correctly declare the law of the case, and, rightly construed, do not enlarge the cause of action pleaded in the petition. The question of contributory negligence, though not put in issue by the pleadings (Ramp v. Railway [Mo. App.] 114 S. W. 59), was treated by both parties as an issue of fact to go to the jury, and, if it might be said that plaintiff was guilty in law of contributory negligence, we would not feel justified in reversing the judgment on account of the submission in plaintiff's instructions of the issue of contributory negligence. A defendant, though not bound by a position he is compelled to take by adverse rulings of the court, is bound by one he voluntarily assumes. We do not feel justified in pronouncing the verdict excessive. Plaintiff had three ribs broken, and received some cuts and bruises. He paid his doctor $75, and at the time of the trial (over a year after the injury) had not fully recovered. For such injuries a verdict of $1,000 does not bespeak passion or prejudice on the part of the jury.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County; Francis H. Trimble, Judge.

Action by R. S. Crohn, public administrator, against the Clay County State Bank. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Craven & Moore, for appellant. Clyde Taylor and W. E. Fowler, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiff is the public administrator of Jackson county, in charge of the estate of William H. Lowe, deceased. He brought this action to recover a deposit of $1,500 left by deceased with the defendant, a banking institution in a county adjoining Jackson. The judgment in the trial court was for the plaintiff. It appears that Lowe resided in the state of Iowa, and that he died in the state of Kansas in November, 1906, leaving also a deposit of $1,000 in a bank in Jackson county. In that month letters of administration were granted on his estate in his home county in Iowa to C. W. Huff, who duly qualified. In December, 1906, the defendant bank paid to Huff the amount of the deposit, and took his receipt as such administrator. Afterwards, in the same month, plaintiff, as public administrator, was put in charge of the estate by the probate court of Jackson county, Mo., for the purpose of administering thereon. He collected the deposit in Jackson county and then demanded that left with defendant, but the latter, having already paid it to the home administrator in Iowa, refused payment, and this action followed.

It is thus readily seen that the question involves the title of a foreign domiciliary administrator to personal effects of the deceased in a foreign state, and his right to collect debts owing to the deceased by debtors in such state. It is a familiar rule of law that title to personalty at the death of the owner vests in the administrator. But here the controversy to the property is between two administrators appointed in different jurisdictions and under the authority of different sovereignties. The title and authority of the Iowa administrator in property of a deceased, who resided in that state is governed by the laws of that state, which are without force in Missouri. The property in controversy was in the latter state, and, while it cannot be appropriated from the true or real owners, yet it is under the jurisdiction of the latter state, and can only be withdrawn therefrom in pursuance of Missouri laws. This rule is justified by the duty which a state owes its own citizens who may be creditors, as well as to itself in the way of taxation. Therefore, a creditor of a deceased who was a nonresident is given the right to ask an administration of property which may be found in this state. And it will not do to say there are no creditors, for within the period of limitations that could not well be known. Becraft v. Lewis, 41 Mo. App. 546. So it has come to be well-recognized law in this state that the foreign domiciliary administrator is without title to property in this state. Naylor v. Moffatt, 29 Mo. 126. "He cannot maintain a suit here for such property for the simple reason that he has no title to the property." Richardson v. Busch, 198 Mo. 174, 187, 95 S. W. 894, 115 Am. St. Rep. 472. To the same effect is In the Matter of Henry Ames & Co., 52 Mo. 290; Turner v. Campbell, 124 Mo. App. 133, 101 S. W. 119; Stevens v. Larwill, 110 Mo. App. 140, 84 S. W. 113; Becraft v. Lewis, supra.

But it is urged if the debtor pays the debt to the foreign administrator, as in this case, he should be protected, since the money has gone to where it must go in the end. That cannot be allowed to have any weight because of the utter lack of authority and title in such administrator. He cannot even assign a note of the deceased so as to enable the assignee to sue upon it in this state. McCarty v. Hall, 13 Mo. 480. And in Bartlett v. Hyde, 3 Mo. 490, there was a payment by the debtor to the foreign administrator, yet the court held that the administrator appointed here could force him to pay it again; the court remarking that it was not a question of hardship in a given case, but of absolute law. In keeping with that holding it will be found to be stated in McCarty v. Hall, supra, that the foreign administrator could not "release or control" debts owing by debtors residing in other states. Nor does the fact that an administrator's title is in reality that of a trustee for the heirs and for the foreign domiciliary administrator, as is recognized in Naylor v. Moffatt, 29 Mo., loc. cit. 128, and Richardson v. Busch, 198 Mo., loc. cit. 188, 95 S. W. 894, 115 Am. St. Rep. 472, affect the question; for, notwithstanding the administrative trusteeship for the benefit of such persons, yet creditors have a superior right to heirs (Hayes v. Fry, 110 Mo. App. 25, 83 S. W. 772), and, as resident creditors, they have a primary right to the protection of the laws of their own state in property of their decedent debtor which has been placed in such state, and to have it administered there instead of forcing them to the inconvenience of foreign jurisdictions.

There is a phase of this case which counsel for defendant has not permitted us to overlook, which is said not to appear in any of the other cases which have arisen in the courts of this state, and that is that here the defendant's payment to the Iowa administrator was before the plaintiff had been appointed to take charge of the estate by our probate court. But that that cannot affect the rule in this state is made apparent by looking to the reason upon which the rule is founded. The reason is that the foreign administrator has no title whatever. The fact that the title may be in abeyance pending the appointment of an administrator here does not arm the foreign administrator with any authority or cast upon him any title.

What we have written is in accord with the view of the learned trial judge as expressed by him in writing at the trial, a printed copy of which has been furnished us by counsel. It has been a valuable and serviceable guide to the conclusion we have reached.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

PER CURIAM. The points passed upon in this case have not been otherwise decided by the St. Louis Court of Appeals in Sommer v. Bank, 108 Mo. App. 490, 83 S. W. 1025, as suggested by defendant. Inference from remarks of the court outside the point of decision should not be drawn against express decisions of the Supreme Court. The decision was that no objection could be taken to the foreign administrator's capacity to sue, since it had been waived by a failure to demur. The last cases reannouncing the rule stated in the opinion, the first of which was therein cited, are those of Richardson v. Busch, 198 Mo. 174, 184, 185, 187, 95 S. W. 894, 115 Am. St. Rep. 472, and De La Vergne v. Richardson, 198 Mo. 189, 95 S. W. 898. Unless we are to put ourselves in conflict with those cases, as well as the others cited in the opinion, we must deny the motion.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Geo. H. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Kingman-St. Louis Implement Company against the Bantley Bros. Hardware Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Plaintiff, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, but licensed to do business in this state, having its chief offices and place of business in the city of St. Louis, instituted suit in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis on an account, the principal and interest of which amounted to $90.48, this being the balance claimed, with interest, due on the purchase price of certain wagons sold by plaintiff to the defendant. In the petition it is stated that the cause of action arose in the city of St. Louis; that the contract out of which the account arose was made in the city of St. Louis; that the contract was accepted in the city of St. Louis; and that the amount payable thereon was payable in that city. It is also alleged that the defendant corporation has its principal office and place of business in the city of Lebanon, Laclede county, Mo., that its president and chief officers reside in that city, and that notwithstanding the cause of action arose wholly within the city of St. Louis the defendant, its officers and agents, reside in the city of Lebanon. Wherefore plaintiff prayed summons for the defendant, directed to the sheriff of Laclede county, also praying judgment for $90.48, with interest and costs. The summons issued to the sheriff of the city of St. Louis was returned not found. Thereupon summons issued to the sheriff of Laclede county, which was returned properly served upon the president of the defendant in Laclede county. The answer set up a plea to the jurisdiction of the St. Louis circuit court over the cause of action, averring the residence of the defendant in Laclede county, its incorporation under the laws of this state; that it had never had an office or agent for the transaction of its business in St. Louis, and that all the transactions complained of and set forth in the petition were carried on at its usual place of business at Lebanon, in Laclede county, and that whatever cause of action, if any plaintiff had, accrued in the city of Lebanon, county of Laclede, state of Missouri, and not in the city of St. Louis; that the contract upon which the balance was claimed to be due was made and entered into in Lebanon; that all of the accounts between plaintiff and defendant were payable in Lebanon; and that all the transactions and dealings between plaintiff and defendant arose and were carried on at Lebanon and not in the City of St. Louis. Further answering, defendant denied each and every allegation in the petition, except as otherwise admitted in the foregoing paragraph of the answer, and denied that it was indebted to plaintiff in the sum claimed or any other sum.

At the trial what is called a "farm wagon contract" was introduced in evidence by plaintiff, which is addressed to Kingman-St. Louis Implement Company, St. Louis, Mo., and dated at Lebanon, Mo., May 20, 1905. By this contract defendant ordered of plaintiff 25 Bain wagons, at a set price, to be shipped by the 'Frisco Railroad to Lebanon, Mo. It is set out in the contract that the buyer "agrees to pay as above in par funds at St. Louis." It is further provided that the title to the goods shipped to the buyer is to remain in plaintiff until it receives the money therefor, and that no agreements, conditions, or stipulations, verbal or otherwise, save those mentioned in the order, will be recognized. The contract concludes in this way: "This order is taken subject to the approval of Kingman-St. Louis Implement Company. If notice to the contrary is not given within 30 days after the receipt of order at its office in St. Louis, Mo., it will be understood that the order is accepted." There was also introduced in evidence a bill of lading, by which it appears that a car load of wagons was shipped from Kenosha, Wis., to the defendant at Lebanon, Mo., the shipment going from Kenosha via the Chicago & Northwestern to Chicago, thence from Chicago via the Chicago & Eastern Illinois to Thebes, and from Thebes to Lebanon via the 'Frisco. The shipper named in the bill of lading was the Bain Wagon Company, Limited; the bill of lading being dated at Milwaukee, Wis., the defendant being the consignee named.

The only witness introduced was the credit man of the plaintiff, who testified that he had charge of the books of the plaintiff from 1905 on, and at that time—that is, in 1905—had the title of cashier. Shown the sales contract referred to, he identified it as one of the papers found in the office of plaintiff at St. Louis, and he testified that it came to plaintiff through the mail in the regular way, being received by plaintiff at St. Louis, and that he "had answered it." Shown the account, he testified that the balance due on it was $90.48; that payments had been credited on the account, which was originally for $1,335, and that they had been received at the office of plaintiff in St. Louis; that they came in the form of checks which were deposited by plaintiff in its bank in St. Louis. He identified the bill of lading as issued to the Bain Wagon Company, and said that, as the goods were charged to plaintiff, the Bain Wagon Company had sent the bill of lading to that company. On cross-examination witness stated that mail received at the office of plaintiff in St. Louis was opened by the manager or assistant manager. At the date of this transaction the manager was a Mr. Burns. This farm wagon contract was found among the papers of the plaintiff, and that that is all he knows about it. It was in the handwriting, he testified, of one Jones, who was a traveling salesman for plaintiff at the date of the contract, traveling in the territory embracing Lebanon. Jones had taken the order at Lebanon and mailed it to the plaintiff; that is, Jones had been in Lebanon, went to see the defendant company or its president to sell them goods, made this contract, and mailed it to the house at St. Louis. The contract is on one of their usual blanks. Payments were made by checks mailed from Lebanon, Mo., by the defendant, were local checks as he remembers; that is, checks drawn on the bank at Lebanon and deposited by plaintiff, in the customary and usual way of business, in its bank at St. Louis, and were transmitted by the St. Louis to the Lebanon bank for payment, as he supposes. On redirect examination this witness said he did not know anything about the farm wagon contract in the case, could not make out the signature on it, could not say whether anything of that kind was ever mailed to the office of plaintiff or received at the office of the plaintiff, and had never seen the contract or anything like it until shown it at the trial. Referring to his ledger, which he had with him, and asked if there was anything to identify the transaction by the ledger, he said that the only thing he could see was the same amount of wagons that were called for in the contract and the same terms. There were 25 wagons ordered under this contract, and it is for the balance due on them that the suit is brought. It was admitted that the plaintiff was licensed to do business in this state as a foreign corporation. This is all the testimony in the case.

The trial was before the court without a jury. The defendant asked a declaration to the effect that, under the law and evidence, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover and the finding should be for defendant. This was refused, finding for plaintiff and judgment accordingly. Motion for new trial was duly filed, overruled, and exception saved. Defendant appeals.

Morton Jourdan, for appellant. Sturdevant & Sturdevant, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). Ordinarily we would be bound by the finding of the court on the facts, and that would compel an affirmance. It is not submitted to us on that theory, however, by either party; the contention being that the trial court erred in law on the question of jurisdiction over the cause of action. It is contended by plaintiff that by appearing and participating in the trial, and by filing an answer which joined with the plea in abatement one in bar, the defendant lost the benefit of the former. It will be observed that it is distinctly averred in the petition that the contract was made in St. Louis, that the cause of action originated in St. Louis, and that, therefore, the venue of the cause was in that city. With this allegation in the petition the defendant could not demur. The only way that it could possibly reach it under our Code was by answer, and it did that, denying the jurisdictional averments. It coupled that plea with a denial of the indebtedness and went to trial, practically not disputing the debt, but resting on that part of its answer which denied jurisdiction. While there has been a great deal of contention over this form of pleading, we are all of the opinion that the decision of our Supreme Court in the case of Little v. Harrington, 71 Mo. 390, settles this case. In that decision Judge Sherwood, speaking for the court and referring to the provision of the statute that "the only pleading on the part of the defendant is either a demurrer or an answer" (Rev. St. 1899, § 596 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 622]), and to the subsequent provision in section 605 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 635), that "the defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have, whether they be such as have been heretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both," quotes from Bliss on Code Pleading, § 345, to the effect that matter in abatement is as much a defense to the pending action as matter in bar; and to say that the defendant may reserve the latter until a trial shall have been had upon the issues in regard to the former would interpolate what is not in the statute, and would be inconsistent with its plain and simple requirements. Referring to Rippstein v. Insurance Co., 57 Mo. 88, and Fordyce v. Hathorn, 57 Mo. 120, as holding to the contrary, the court overrules them as founded on the common-law rule existing in this state before the adoption of the Code, but abrogated by the Code.

In Coombs Commission Co. v. Block, 130 Mo. 668, 32 S. W. 1139, the question again came up, and the doctrine announced in Little v. Harrington, supra, was approved and followed; the Rippstein and Fordyce Cases being referred to as disapproved in that case. In Johnson v. Detrick, 152 Mo., loc. cit. 253, 53 S. W. 891, it was laid down that a plea to the jurisdiction, even when coupled with a plea to the merits, is permissible under our Code, and that the latter plea does not as at common law waive the former. In Meyer v. Insurance Co., 184 Mo. 481, loc. cit. 437, 83 S. W. 479, 480, Judge Marshall, speaking for Division No. 1, holds that under the present practice in our state "a defendant can unite in the same pleading a plea to the jurisdiction as to the person as well as to the subject-matter with a plea to the merits, and that he does not thereby waive the question of jurisdiction of the court"; and the cases from Little v. Harrington, supra, to Kenner v. Doe Run Lead Co., 141 Mo., loc. cit. 251, 42 S. W. 683, are cited in support of the proposition. In Little Rock Trust Co. v. S. M. & A. Ry. Co., 195 Mo. 669, loc. cit. 682, 93 S. W. 944, the same judge, that question being again before that same Division of the Supreme Court, announces the rule as settled in this state in the same way. The latest decision of our Supreme Court on this question of pleading is that of Thomasson v. Mer. Town Mut. Ins. Co. (Mo.) 116 S. W. 1092; an opinion delivered in Division No. 2 by Judge Gantt (not yet officially reported). This case went to the Supreme Court on certification from this court. See 114 Mo. App. 109, 89 S. W. 564, 1135. The Supreme Court adopted the view of the majority of the judges of this court. See, also, Wicecarver v. Mer. Town Mut. Ins. Co. (filed by the St. Louis Court of Appeals March 23, 1909, not yet officially reported) 117 S. W. 698.

Counsel for plaintiff quote from Judge Marshall that "consent cannot confer jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and that objection may be made at any time during the progress of the case, or even afterwards if the record discloses such want of jurisdiction. But consent can confer jurisdiction of the person, and, where a defendant fails to make timely objection to the jurisdiction as to his person, he waives that objection." Little Rock Trust Co. v. Railway, 195 Mo. 669, loc. cit. 683, 93 S. W. 944. The last sentence is underscored by counsel, they claiming that these italicized words bring the decision of Meyer v. Insurance Company within the rule of waiver which they invoke. The learned counsel have not told us to which Meyer Case they refer. That case has been before this court twice. We are somewhat at loss to determine which of the two is meant. However, when first before this court, reported in 92 Mo. App. 392, 69 S. W. 638, it was certified to the Supreme Court, as this court held that the appearance of the defendant involved in taking an appeal from the justice's judgment was such an appearance as constituted a waiver of a right to object to the jurisdiction of the justice; it being thought that this was in conflict with the decision of the Kansas City Court of Appeals in Trimble & Fyfe v. Elkin, 88 Mo. App. 229. The Supreme Court, on the case reaching it, held that there was no conflict, and that this court had overlooked the fact that it was the settled law under our Code that "a defendant must make all his defenses in the same answer, whether such defenses as heretofore denominated dilatory, in abatement, or in bar." Meyer v. Insurance Co., 184 Mo. 481, loc. cit. 488, 83 S. W. 479. Judge Marshall then further states in the Meyer Case (loc. cit. 488) that the error consisted in holding that by taking an appeal from the justice of the peace, after the justice had ruled against it on its plea to the jurisdiction, the defendant waived the plea to the jurisdiction, and that the defendant never waived that plea, but has always properly made and preserved the question. This court subsequently in a case of the same title (Meyer v. Insurance Co., 95 Mo. App. 721, 69 S. W. 689) held that a plea to the jurisdiction of the court over defendant's person may be joined in the same answer with the plea to the merits of the action. The distinction drawn by the decisions is this: Where the defect of jurisdiction over the person or subject-matter appears on the face of the record proper, the defense must be raised by demurrer. If the defect is want of jurisdiction over the person, and that appears on the face of the record, by pleading over, or by appearing and participating in the further defense of the case, as by appearing at the taking of depositions, taking a continuance, taking leave to plead, the defect is waived. But, if the defect is one arising in pais, one which is not disclosed by the pleadings, then it must be taken advantage of by answer, as in the nature of a plea in abatement; and in that answer pleas in bar, counterclaims, or any other proper defenses may be united, separately stated, without waiving the defense of want of jurisdiction over the person or the subject-matter. An examination of the testimony in the case satisfies us that the contract in question was made and was to be performed in Laclede county, and that the proper venue of the action was in that county, and not in St. Louis, and that the learned trial judge was in error in law as well as in his finding on the facts, if his decision is to be taken as founded on the facts. To reverse the case and refuse to remand, it would be depriving plaintiff of all opportunity of recovering what seems to be justly due it. Therefore we reverse and remand the case to give an opportunity to plaintiff, if it sees proper to do so, to take a nonsuit.

The judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded; all concurring.

A traveler approaching railroad tracks in a switchyard at a public crossing may presume, in the absence of signals, that he may proceed in safety, since an ordinary observer cannot know when a switch engine in a switchyard will begin to move, or, moving, when it will halt, unless the engineer rings the bell before starting, and continues to ring it until the engine stops.

2. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED OF TRAVELERS.

Whether a traveler on a public street was negligent in crossing railroad tracks within switchyards, precluding a recovery for injuries in a collision with a switch engine, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

3. RAILROADS (§ 347*)—CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED OF TRAVELERS.

The fact that a traveler on a public street in the act of crossing railroad tracks within switchyards heard some one shout is immaterial on the issue of his contributory negligence, unless he heard the shouting and understood its purport.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Hugh Dabbs, Judge.

Action by J. F. Dunwoody against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. P. B. Jackson, for appellant. P. D. Decker and Geo. J. Grayston, for respondent.

BROADBUSH, P. J. This is an action to recover damages on the ground of the alleged negligence of defendant, whereby plaintiff was injured.

The facts are as follows: On May 25,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

1907, while plaintiff, who was riding in his automobile, was attempting to cross defendant's tracks on Wall street, in the city of Joplin, the machine was struck by defendant's switch engine, whereby defendant was injured and his automobile damaged. At the place in question Wall street runs north and south, and crosses the switchyards of the defendant and the Missouri Pacific Railroad at Tenth street. Altogether there are about eight of these tracks. The plaintiff was driving on Wall street south, when he came to Tenth street, and stopped to let out a boy who was riding with him, but he failed to pay any particular attention to his surroundings; he being familiar with the location. At that time a Missouri Pacific passenger train was standing on the main track west of the crossing, the engine of which had been uncoupled and moved to the east side of the crossing, heading east, with the rear end of the tank in close proximity to the east line of Wall street, and leaving a space between the cars and the engine of 88 feet. As plaintiff approached the main track, he stopped his automobile about 23 feet distant, near the center of Wall street. About the time he stopped, he heard some one halloo, but, not knowing for what purpose, proceeded across the main track in the space between the Missouri Pacific engine and cars and onto the next track, when his automobile was struck by defendant's engine moving west over the crossing. The evidence tended to show that from his position, when he stopped, his view was intercepted by the Missouri Pacific engine, and that he did not see it in time after he started to avoid the collision. Prior to this time, if he had looked, he could have seen the engine moving west toward the crossing. There was evidence pro and con as to whether the bell of the engine was rung. It seems that the persons on the back of the engine, which was backing at the time, saw plaintiff and hallooted to him as a warning not to start across the tracks, and plaintiff testified that he heard the shouts, but did not know and understand what was said or meant. The judgment was for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

The right of plaintiff to recover is the principal question raised by defendant. Its position is stated thus: "It was the duty of the plaintiff in approaching the crossing in question to use every possible precaution necessary for his own protection. The law requires that he should both look and listen for the approach of trains, and, if necessary, that he should have stopped; and, if he was located in any place where his view of the track was obstructed, then it was his duty to have gotten out of his automobile and gone to a place where he could have ascertained with certainty whether or not there was an engine or train approaching. If the plaintiff had exercised the care that the law required, he could not have failed to have discovered the approaching train in time to have avoided the accident. The necessary conclusion, therefore, is that either he did not use the necessary care to discover the approach of the engine, or that, having discovered it, he attempted to cross in front of it." In Schmidt v. Railroad, 191 Mo., loc. cit. 229, 90 S. W. 186, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 196, the court states the general rule that "the measure of precaution to be observed by a traveler often depends upon the circumstances and surroundings. The general rule is that in knowingly approaching the track of a railroad, he must use his sense of sight or hearing to ascertain if there be danger. If the view is so obstructed that he cannot see, he should carefully listen. The circumstances may not require that he both look and listen, but common prudence requires that he do either one or the other, and a failure to do so renders his act negligence in law." It is held where the traveler could, when within 25 feet of the crossing, have seen a train approaching at a distance of from 200 to 450 feet, but, without looking, went upon the crossing and was struck, he could not recover. The court quoted from Elliott on Railroads in part as follows: "A traveler who knows that a train is due must take care to avoid it, and this knowledge imposes upon him a somewhat higher exercise of care than if he was not in possession of such knowledge. Principle requires that in such a case a person who attempts to cross the track should be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law if there was an obstruction to sight or hearing, since no one can be said to exercise ordinary care who voluntarily encounters a danger that he knows is imminent, unless the situation and conditions are such as to enable him to see that he can proceed with safety." Sanguinette v. Railroad, 196 Mo. 466, 95 S. W. 886. The case did not require the application of the rule as quoted, and therefore it may be, strictly speaking, treated as obiter dictum. However, in a similar case on principle, the court holds that the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence is for the jury. Kenney v. Railroad, 105 Mo. 270, 15 S. W. 983, 16 S. W. 837. And whether or not the decision referred to is to be treated as obiter dictum it has no particular application to this case, as the circumstances and surroundings are materially different. The plaintiff's automobile was not struck by a train which was due at the time, as in the case quoted, and therefore no danger was to be apprehended from that cause, but he was struck by a switch engine in the switchyards of two railroads in a city, and at a public crossing. It is common experience that an ordinary observer cannot know when he sees a switch engine on the tracks under such conditions when it will begin to move, or, if moving, when it will halt, unless the engineer in charge rings his bell before starting and continues to ring it until the engine stops. And we believe this is the universal custom governing the movement of switch engines. And, unless such rule is strictly complied with, a street crossing of the switchyards of a railroad in a city would prove a snare of the most dangerous character, and would practically deprive the public of the use of the street. Therefore a traveler approaching such a crossing has the right to presume, in the absence of the sound of a switch engine's bell, that he may proceed in safety. And whether he has exercised proper care is usually a question for the jury. But a traveler on a public street in crossing the tracks of a railroad within its switchyards may be guilty of such contributory negligence as would preclude his right to recover as a matter of law under certain circumstances and surroundings.

With these principles in view, we think there is not much difficulty in arriving at a proper determination of the controlling question in this case. The plaintiff was traveling on a public street, where he had the right to go. His view of the different tracks was fairly unobstructed with the exception of the cars and engine of the Missouri Pacific Railroad. Before he reached the latter track, he stopped and looked, but was unable to see the engine which struck him because it was moving behind the Missouri Pacific engine. It is contended that, had he looked east just before he stopped, he could have seen the latter engine moving west in the direction of the crossing, and should therefore have stopped until it passed. As it turned out, this was what he should have done. But under the circumstances it was a question for the jury to say whether or not, in the absence of the ringing of the bell, he was justified in proceeding on the crossing.

The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the men on the moving engine shouted to the plaintiff when he was far enough away to have avoided the collision, and that the plaintiff heard the shouting and stopped or checked his automobile, then afterwards proceeded towards the crossing and collided with the defendant's engine, and that such collision would not have occurred if he had remained at the place when he heard the shouting, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict will be for defendant." The court refused so to instruct the jury, and rightfully. The mere fact that plaintiff heard some one shouting, unless he understood it as a warning for him not to proceed, served no useful purpose. The court modified the instruction, and told the jury that, if plaintiff heard the shouting and understood its purport, he could not recover, and gave it to the jury as so modified.

These are the only questions of importance raised on the appeal. For the reasons given, the cause is affirmed. All concur.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 85*)—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

An employé suing his employer for negligence must show that the employer failed in the performance of some duty owing him as his employer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE.

An employé was injured while unloading crates of linoleum and storing them in a warehouse, by being struck by a cleat which had become loosened and protruded outward. The cleats frequently became detached while the crates were being handled, and the employés were instructed to nail loose cleats or take them off. Both the employés and the superintendent at times nailed the loose cleats or took them off. Held, as a matter of law, to show that the employer was not guilty of actionable negligence.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 236*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CARE REQUIRED OF SERVANT.

A servant must use reasonable care to avoid danger to be apprehended from defects and conditions which are open to observation, and which can, by the use of ordinary care, be avoided by him as well as by his master.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; C. A. Mosman, Judge.

Action by John M. Courter against the Tootle, Wheeler & Motter Mercantile Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sam. I. Motter and Brown & Dolman, for appellant. Rusk & Stringfellow, for respondent.

BROADDUS, P. J. This is a suit against defendant, a corporation engaged in the wholesale dry goods business, for damages alleged to have been the result of defendant's negligence. On or about the 20th day of April, 1906, the plaintiff was engaged with three other employés in unloading from a car crates of linoleum and storing them in defendant's warehouse. These crates were 12 feet long, 14 inches in diameter, and weighed from 550 to 700 pounds. They were constructed by using two pine boards, each 14 inches square, one at each end of a roll of linoleum. The ends of two boards, each 14 inches wide, were nailed to the opposite edges of these boards. The roll of linoleum was then placed between these boards, and to secure them in place short pieces of pine about 6 inches wide, six or eight in number, were nailed at intervals across the open sides. In the language of the description given in the briefs, "the structure looked like a common tree box, closed at the ends, with a roll of linoleum inside instead of a tree." The dimensions of the warehouse were 80 by 100 feet, and, according to the evidence, the warehouse was imperfectly lighted. The crates were stored in piles 4 feet high. On the occasion in question the plaintiff with the other employes was engaged in piling crates of the description named upon a pile that had been made some time previously. The crates were carried to the place desired upon a truck. The manner of depositing them was for two men to place a flat iron bar about 3 feet long under one end of the crate, and by this means to lift that end up to a level with the top of the pile, and put one end of the iron bar on the top of the pile, and then the man at the other end of the bar would hold on to it and support that end of the crate. The man that had raised the inside end of the iron bar to the top of the pile would then go to the other end of the crate, and help the two there to raise it, and then all hands would roll it on the pile. While the plaintiff was lifting the end of the bar next to the pile of crates, he was struck near the hip bone by one of the cleats in the pile, which had become loosened and protruded outward, and was injured. It was shown that these cleats frequently became detached while the crates were being handled, and the employes were instructed by defendant's superintendent that, when they saw one that was loose, to nail it back, and, if that could not be done satisfactorily, to take it off. And it was shown that both the employes and the superintendent at times nailed these cleats when they observed that they were loose, or took them off when they deemed that proper, and that it was a thing which frequently happened, and the matter would be remedied by any one of them when it came under his notice. Such was the usual course pursued in the handling of these crates, and with which plaintiff was familiar. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appealed. Several questions are raised on the appeal, but we will confine our discussion to the one that we think is decisive of the case.

The defendant by proper instruction raised the question of the right of plaintiff to recover on the pleadings and evidence. The court entertained the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the showing he had made, and overruled defendant's demurrer. It is elementary law, in cases of negligence arising between employe and employer, that plaintiff must, as a condition precedent to his right to recover, show that defendant failed in the performance of some duty owing him as his employer. Glasscock v. Dry Goods Co., 106 Mo. App. 657, 80 S. W. 364; Ryan v. McCully, 123 Mo. 636, 27 S. W. 533; Gurley v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 104 Mo., loc. cit. 223, 16 S. W. 11. We are of the opinion that plaintiff failed to show that defendant was derelict in the performance of any duty whose nonperformance would authorize a recovery. It appears from the plaintiff's own evidence that it was as much the duty of employes as that of defendant to guard against injury to be anticipated from the cleats that might become detached from the crates. These loosened cleats could not be seriously regarded as a menace to the safety of the defendant's employes. There are many ways in which a person may be injured from causes wholly unexpected, and therefore not to be anticipated, for which the law affords no compensation. If it were otherwise, the undertaking of an employer would be that of an insurer for the safety of his servant. And we have not yet reached that stage in our jurisprudence where the entire care for the safety of the servant devolves on the master, and the safety of the servant is not to be intrusted to his own reasonable and independent action. It is the duty of a servant, which he owes to himself, as well as to his master, to use reasonable care to avoid danger to be apprehended from defects and conditions which are as open to observation to the one as to the other, and which he can, by the use of ordinary care, avoid or remedy, as well as can his master. Beckman v. Brewing Ass'n, 98 Mo. App. 555, 72 S. W. 710; Glasscock v. Dry Goods Co., 106 Mo. App. 657, 80 S. W. 364. The manner of doing the work was ordinarily a reasonably safe one, which the defendant had the right to pursue, and the risks of danger attending it were assumed by plaintiff by reason of his employment. It was not shown that the want of sufficient light in the warehouse had any causal connection with the plaintiff's injury.

Reversed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; James H. Slover, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth A. Bosch against F. W. Miller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed on rehearing, on condition that plaintiff remit an award of punitive damages.

Marley & Swearingen, for appellant. Milton Campbell, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Action to recover actual and punitive damages for the malicious prosecution of civil suits brought and prosecuted by defendant against plaintiff without probable cause. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs for $1,620 actual and $1,630 punitive damages. Defendant appealed.

The first cause of the litigation waged by defendant against plaintiff was a warranty deed executed and delivered to plaintiff by Mari Metz, her grandmother, on the 12th day of March, 1903. The deed recited a consideration of $2,500, and by its terms conveyed to the grantee the fee-simple title to residence property in Kansas City owned by the grantor of the value of $2,500. Following the description of the property, this clause appears: "This deed is subject to the charges for the care and subsistence of the grantor, Mari Metz, and such charges and the care of her grandmother, Mari Metz, are assumed by the grantee herein named." The deed was acknowledged March 13, 1903, and was filed for record four days later. The grantor, who was an aged widow, died intestate in Kansas City in October, 1905. For a number of years preceding her death, she resided on the premises described in the deed with her daughter, Mary Bosch, and the latter's family, including the plaintiff, who was engaged in artistic work and teaching, and from her income, which exceeded $100 per month, contributed to the maintenance of the family, including her grandmother. Defendant, who was a son of Mari Metz and an uncle of plaintiff, was married and lived with his family in Kansas City. He was away from home when his mother died, but returned in time to attend the funeral. A few days later he and his wife called on his sister, Mrs. Bosch, to ascertain the condition of his mother's estate. He was referred to plaintiff, who informed him that the residence property had been deeded to her. She showed him the deed, and a stormy scene ensued. Defendant forcibly expressed his surprise and anger at being thus disinherited by his mother and said the "deed was not worth the paper it was written on." He insisted that the property be divided equally between him and his sister, Mrs. Bosch. There is substantial evidence to the effect that he bombarded his niece with hostile questions and observations, and that his demeanor was so overbearing and truculent that she became afraid of him. He succeeded in extorting from her the admission that the conveyance, though absolute in form, was made to her as trustee, but she would not admit that her uncle was one of the beneficiaries of that trust, and maintained that her grandmother had given her the full right to dispose of the property as she might think best. Defendant then left and went to his lawyer, to whom he stated that plaintiff had a deed to the property which was executed and delivered with the understanding that she should hold the property as trustee for the equal benefit of him and his sister. The lawyer advised defendant to procure from plaintiff a declaration of trust in writing and prepared an instrument of that character. Armed with this document, defendant returned to plaintiff and endeavored to obtain its execution by her. She refused on the ground that the instrument did not state the true facts; that her grandmother had not executed the deed with the understanding that plaintiff should be burdened with the execution of an express trust. The interview was stormy, and defendant was abusive, but did not offer physical violence. Finally, to end the scene, and out of fear that worse things might ensue, plaintiff signed the following instrument prepared by defendant: "Kansas City, Mo., October 30, 1905. This is to certify that when Mari A. Metz made a deed to me for the property at 3018 East Twelfth street, Kansas City, Mo., she said this deed was not intended to make me the owner of this property, but was to put it in my name as trustee." Plaintiff was not present when her grandmother executed the deed. A lawyer was called in by Mrs. Metz, and in the presence of witnesses she informed him of her wishes. He drew the deed in strict conformity with her instructions, and she informed herself of the contents of the instrument before she signed it. Nothing was said about a trust, nor was such subject mentioned when, afterward, the deed was delivered to plaintiff. Defendant took the statement signed by plaintiff to his lawyer and was advised, in effect, that it did not improve his position. Defendant testified: "Q. And what did you say to him? A. I said they refused to sign the original yellow slip that he had written (the declaration of trust prepared by the lawyer), and I finally rewrote that, and here it is. And he looked at it and he said 'That is a question as to whether she holds it in trust, or whether she is the real owner according to the deed.' He said: 'The way it is now she can transfer it to anybody, and you will have a fight on your hands. I would advise you to bring a suit merely to prevent her from transferring the property.' Q. He advised you to bring a suit merely to prevent her from getting rid of the property? A. Until we could get a compromise. I was still in hopes of it after suit was brought." Defendant's testimony relative to what plaintiff said when he tried to induce her to sign the declaration drawn by the lawyer is as follows: "She said that she was trustee, and she would decide whether and when I would get any of that property or my heirs, and that she didn't want that inserted until she saw an attorney."

The next step of defendant was to bring suit in the circuit court on December 3, 1905, against plaintiff and her mother to obtain the cancellation of the deed on the ground of fraud in its procurement. The petition in that suit alleged that Mari Metz was 83 years old, was weak and infirm in body and mind, and that defendants (plaintiff here) unduly influenced her, and by false and fraudulent practices and promises induced her to execute an absolute conveyance of the property under the belief that she was conveying it in trust for the equal benefit of her son (defendant here) and her daughter, Mary Bosch. The characterization in that petition of the conduct of plaintiff and her mother is as vigorous and harsh as one would expect to find in a suit of that nature. No consideration was shown for their good name or feelings. Shortly after bringing that suit, defendant called on plaintiff at her studio. The conversation that ensued thus is stated by plaintiff: "He came up to the studio and asked me what I was going to do about the affair. I told him I didn't intend to do anything—that what he had done, he had put us in court, and it would stay there. He said didn't I have enough of court. I said I didn't know anything about it. He said, 'If you sign over to your mother and me, I will drop the whole thing.' I said: 'Grandma made the deed as she wished to, and to this I will stand. I have no money to fight in court but what I am earning, but if you want to go to court, you can.' He said: 'I have a thousand dollars I will spend for satisfaction.' And he said: 'I won't have one lawyer. I will have two or three. I will do all I can to have satisfaction.'" In due time plaintiff (here) filed an answer, and the case was called for trial May 29, 1906. Defendant was not ready, and, being unable to obtain a witness, dismissed the suit. On the same day his attorney brought another suit by filing a petition in substance the same as the petition in the former case. Plaintiff answered, and the cause came on for trial November 26, 1906. Defendant voluntarily dismissed that suit and immediately brought another of the same character. Again plaintiff answered and prepared for trial. Defendant failed to appear when the case was called March 28, 1907, and it was dismissed for want of prosecution. This ended defendant's attempts to force plaintiff into a compromise. Plaintiff incurred great pecuniary loss in attorney's fees and in the expense incidental to preparing for the trial of the three suits. She lost time from her business and suffered in mind from the unjust accusations. The evidence shows that her grandmother was in good health mentally and physically when she executed the deed, that plaintiff exerted no influence to procure a conveyance of the property, and that the deed, in fact, expressed the true intent of the grantor. No objection was made to the competency of plaintiff as a witness, as defendant had caused her deposition to be taken in one of the suits.

The facts we have stated are those most favorable to plaintiff, and the view of the case they present is the one we shall adopt in disposing of the contention of defendant that the court should have peremptorily directed a verdict in his favor. The rule has been adopted in this state that an action for damages will lie in cases where the plaintiff has been compelled to defend himself against a civil action of a defamatory nature maliciously brought and maintained without probable cause. This rule has not been universally recognized in other jurisdictions, but it appears to have the approval of some of the best text-writers. In Bishop on Noncontract Law, § 222, the author thus speaks of it: "The element of defamation of character—slander or libel—is sometimes looked upon as justifying an action for malicious prosecution. It is clearly laid down that slander may be propagated by a false suit. And it has been intimated that in such circumstances an aggrieved person may elect the one of the two remedies he prefers. Not a great proportion of the cases practically assume this aspect, but the doctrine is just in principle, and it is occasionally met with in the books." In Smith v. Burrus, 106 Mo., loc. cit. 98, 16 S. W. 881, 13 L. R. A. 59, 27 Am. St. Rep. 329, the Supreme Court say: "The authorities are in conflict as to whether a petition states a cause of action which merely alleges that a civil action brought and prosecuted maliciously, and without probable cause, has been terminated in favor of the defendant; many of the authorities maintaining that no cause of action exists unless such civil process be accompanied by arrest of the person or seizure of the property, and that the plaintiff in such original action in contemplation of law is sufficiently punished by the payment of costs. This view has received the sanction of Judge Cooley (Law of Torts [2d Ed.] 217 et seq., and cases cited). But there are numerous and able decisions in opposition to this view, and it is difficult to combat the force of the reasoning they employ. It is difficult to see why the right of a plaintiff who, as defendant, has been sued in a civil action maliciously and without probable cause, and who has been put to great expense in consequence thereof, should be altered or at all affected merely by the incident of his property having been attached or his person seized; for in either case the damage, the expense and costs of defending a suit whether instituted by ca. sa. or attachment or by civil summons, would be the same. And it is clear that the recovery of costs would not, under our practice, reimburse him for his attorney's fees, something which and other incidental expenses he does not recover under the English practice. The cases on both sides of this subject have been extensively collated and exhaustively reviewed by John D. Lawson in 21 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 281, 353, and the conclusion reached that the better doctrine is that which allows an action to be maintained as well where property, etc., has not been seized as where it has. The authorities also are well reviewed in 14 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, Tit. 'Malicious Pros.,' p. 82 et seq., and notes. Besides, this court in Brady v. Ervin, 48 Mo. 533, adopted the view that an action for malicious prosecution may be maintained where the original action was begun by civil summons alone."

Malice in the prosecution of a defamatory suit may be inferred from the existence of want of probable cause, though it is said that the existence of a want of probable cause cannot be inferred from evidence of malice. A good definition of "probable cause" is that to be found in section 239, Bishop on Noncontract Law: "Probable cause—or, as the expression oftener is, reasonable and probable cause—is any such combination of facts and proofs as may fairly lead the reasonable mind to the belief (and the person relying on it must believe) that, in the absence of hitherto unknown qualifying or rebutting evidence, the prosecution or other suit ought to be successful." Where the facts are not in dispute, the question of a want of probable cause is one of law for the court; otherwise it is a mixed question of law and fact. In the present case, material facts are in controversy, and the first question to confront us is whether the facts most favorable to plaintiff justify a reasonable inference that defendant instituted and prosecuted his suits against plaintiff without probable cause. We think they do. The warranty deed executed by Mrs. Metz by its terms conveyed a fee-simple title to plaintiff. The creation of an express trust for the benefit of defendant in connection with that conveyance could be proved only by writing. It could not be proved by parol. Section 3416, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1949); Lane v. Ewing, 31 Mo. 75, 77 Am. Dec. 632; Hell v. Hell, 184 Mo. 665, 84 S. W. 45. The trust which defendant endeavored to have declared by plaintiff was an express, not a resulting, trust. Therefore it fell under the purview of section 3416, and not of section 3417 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1950), which relates to trusts arising by implication of law.

Evidently such was the opinion of defendant's lawyer, who advised that a declaration of trust in writing be secured from plaintiff. Defendant knew when he brought the first suit that he could not prove the existence of an express trust by oral evidence, and, further, he knew, for his lawyer so advised him, that the written statement he wrested from plaintiff amounted to nothing so far as proving a trust was concerned. Further, he must have known that he could procure no evidence to support a charge of fraud in the procurement of the deed. His own testimony shows affirmatively that he brought the suit, not from a belief that he had a meritorious cause, but merely in the hope of forcing his adversary to a compromise. His counsel did not advise him that he had a meritorious case, and therefore he is in no position to invoke the protection of the advice of counsel. He had no reason to believe that the prosecution of the suits "ought to be successful in the absence of hitherto unknown qualifying or rebutting evidence," and his entire lack of confidence in the justice of his cause is demonstrated by his conduct in making no effort worthy the name to prepare for trial, and in dismissing the suits when brought to bay only to refile them to the further vexation and annoyance of his niece, whose good name he ruthlessly attacked from no better motive than the hope of unjustly gaining some pecuniary advantage to himself. Want of probable cause is abundantly shown by the evidence, and, as we have said, malice may be inferred from it. Plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury, and the demurrer to the evidence was properly overruled.

We find but one error in the record. In the instruction given at the request of plaintiff on the measure of damages, the subject of punitive damages was treated as follows: "And if the jury find that the said F. W. Miller prosecuted his said several actions against plaintiff without probable cause and maliciously, as defined in these instructions read to you, then the jury shall separately determine and award in favor of plaintiff and against defendant such additional sum, if any, as punishment for his malicious suits, if you so find, as to the jury may appear just and proper, not however beyond the sum of $2,740. The total verdict in plaintiff's favor, if you so find, must not exceed the sum of $5,000." It will be observed that, on finding that defendant prosecuted the several suits maliciously and without probable cause, the direction to assess punitive damages was mandatory. This was clearly erroneous. The awarding of such damages should always be left to the discretion of the jury. The rule applicable is stated by the Supreme Court in the following extract from the opinion in Carson v. Smith, 133 Mo. 606, 34 S. W. 855: "It is insisted by defendant that this instruction is erroneous, in that it tells the jury absolutely that plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages. By it the jury are told that if they find from the evidence that the taking and sale of plaintiff's property, under the attachment against Logan, was malicious, and that the bringing of said attachment was without probable cause, then plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages, which the jury will allow him, in addition to the value of the goods. The rule announced by recent decisions of this court is that it lies within the discretion of the jury as to whether or not punitive damages will be allowed in any case, and is not a question for the court. Callahan v. Ingram, 122 Mo. 372, 26 S. W. 1020, 43 Am. St. Rep. 583; Nicholson v. Rogers, 129 Mo. 136, 31 S. W. 260. This is in accord with the decided weight of authority.

1 Sedgwick on Damages (8th Ed.) § 387; 2 Thompson on Trials, § 2065; Hawk v. Ridgway, 33 Ill. 473; Railroad v. Rector, 104 Ill. 296; Railroad v. Brooks' Adm'r, 83 Ky. 129, 4 Am. St. Rep. 135; Railroad v. Kendrick, 40 Miss. 374, 90 Am. Dec. 332; Railroad v. Burke, 53 Miss. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 689; Jerome v. Smith, 48 Vt. 230, 21 Am. Rep. 125; Boardman v. Goldsmith, 48 Vt. 403; Snow v. Carpenter, 49 Vt. 426; Bergmann v. Jones, 94 N. Y. 51. And the rule is the same in all cases of tort, when wantonness, recklessness, oppression, or express malice is shown. Under such circumstances, the jury is allowed to award exemplary damages, not only to compensate the sufferer, but to punish the offender. Franz v. Hilterbrand, 45 Mo. 121; Engle v. Jones, 51 Mo. 316; Morgan v. Durfee, 69 Mo. 409, 33 Am. Rep. 508; Bruce v. Ulery, 79 Mo. 322; Brown v. Plank Road Co., 89 Mo. 152, 1 S. W. 129; Fulkerson v. Murdock, 53 Mo. App. 151. This instruction is clearly erroneous."

For this error, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

On Rehearing.

A re-examination of this case convinces us that the decisive issues were fully and correctly decided in the opinion filed, and the motions for rehearing are overruled.

In view of the expressed desire of plaintiff to enter a remittitur of the punitive damages, we have decided to set aside the order reversing the judgment and remanding the cause. If within 10 days the plaintiff shall file a remittitur in the amount awarded by the jury as punitive damages, the judgment will be affirmed; otherwise it will be reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

4. TRIAL (§ 296*) — INSTRUCTIONS — ERROR CURED.

In an action for injury to a railway passenger, any error in an instruction that if the company carelessly and negligently caused other cars to strike a coach, etc., in failing to define "carelessly" and "negligently," was cured by an instruction that a mere sudden jolt of the cars was not negligent, and that unless the trainmen were negligent in making the coupling, or the machinery, etc., was out of order, plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Stoddard County; J. L. Fort, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Leach against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The plaintiff in this case brought her action for personal injuries received while a passenger on a freight train of the defendant, to which was attached a passenger coach, into which she was escorted by the conductor of the train, and against which coach, while on the track, other cars were backed with such violence, as it is claimed, as to throw her forward across the seat and injure her internally. Charging negligence in the operation of the train, she sues for $15,000 damages. At a trial before the court and jury she was awarded $1,000. Various errors are assigned to the giving and refusal of instructions, and it is insisted that there was no evidence whatever in the case to sustain the verdict. Among other instructions, given at the instance of the plaintiff, is this, in part, in instructing on the measure of damages, namely, that the jury should assess plaintiff's damages at such sum, not exceeding $15,000, as from the evidence they might believe to be a fair compensation for the injuries sustained by her on account of the collision; this instruction closing with these words: "And that in estimating such damages you should take into consideration the physical pain and mental anguish occasioned by her injuries, if the jury find that she was injured, the fact, if you so find from the evidence, that her injuries are permanent, and their future effect upon her health, if from the evidence you believe it will be affected thereby, and, further, any loss of earnings during the remainder of her life." This covers all contained in the instructions as to the rule for estimating the damage. It is objected to this instruction that it submits to the jury the question of loss of earnings by plaintiff during the remainder of her life, and that there was no evidence whatever showing what earnings she had theretofore been receiving, or would lose by reason of her injuries. The testimony on this point, as set out in the brief of plaintiff's counsel is this: "Q. I will ask you if you are able now, or have been since you got this injury, to do your work? A. No, sir; I have not been able to do anything. Q. I will ask you, if before you received this shock, you was able to do your work, and a healthy woman for your age? A. Yes, sir; I was able to do my work, and make my own living for myself and daughter, and I was sound in body and mind and in good health. Q. Now, I will ask if this injury has totally incapacitated you from making your living? A. Yes, sir. Q. What had you been doing prior to this time? A. Sometimes for several years I have been keeping a rooming house, renting rooms." This is all the evidence touching the matter of earnings claimed by counsel for plaintiff to be in the case.

Jas. Orchard, for appellant. K. C. Spence, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). We regret that we are compelled to reverse this case on this point, but it is too important a point, in cases of this kind, to be overlooked. When the plaintiff insists on damages for loss of time and earnings, she must be put to the proof of the value of her time and the amount of her earnings. An instruction submitting to the jury a rule for the estimation of damages, which includes in it the element of loss of earnings when there is no foundation for it, is reversible error. Wallack v. St. Louis Transit Co., 123 Mo. App. 160, loc. cit. 167, 100 S. W. 496. This is the only error we discover in the record.

Complaint is made by the appellant, defendant below, of the refusal by the court of the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that, if you believe and find from the evidence that it was the custom of defendant to draw the coach down to the depot and let the passengers alight, then switch the coach back on the 'Y,' and do the switching, and, after the switching was completed, to bring the coach back to the depot for passengers to board it, and that this rule was adopted on the date in question, and that the plaintiff boarded defendant's passenger coach before the switching and before being invited, and before said coach was brought back to the depot after the switching, then the company is not liable, and you will return a verdict for the defendant." That instruction was properly refused. In support of it the learned counsel for the appellant advance the proposition that, this being a mixed train, part freight, part passenger, the plaintiff, as a passenger on it, assumed the dangers or perils which are necessarily incident to that mode of conveyance, and they cite several cases which are claimed to be in support of this proposition. We do not think that the contention of counsel is correct, nor that the cases support them. While passengers carried in a mixed train—that is, in a coach attached to a freight train—are not to expect all the conveniences and comforts that are furnished those riding in regularly made up passenger trains, they are entitled to be carried with as high a degree of safety as is compatible with the management of a "mixed" train.

Complaint is made that the court, in its instruction given at the instance of plaintiff, instructed the jury that, if the agents and employes of defendant "carelessly and negligently caused other cars to be run against and violently strike the coach in which plaintiff was seated, and that in consequence of such collision of cars she was injured, your verdict should be for plaintiff." It is complained of this instruction that the terms "carelessly and negligently," were used without defining what carelessness and negligence consisted of, and in support of this contention reference is made to the case of Magrane v. Railway, 183 Mo., loc. cit. 132, 81 S. W. 1160. It was said in that case, at that place, that: "The only adverse criticism to be passed on those instructions is that they submit to the jury the question of negligence of the defendant in the matter without instructing the jury as to what constitutes negligence." But the court expressly refused to reverse on account of this, and it was a mere criticism of verbiage, without condemning the body of the instruction itself. Furthermore, in the case at bar, at the instance of the defendant, this instruction was given: "The court instructs the jury that the mere fact, if it is a fact, that there was a sudden jolt or jar of the cars, which threw the plaintiff from her seat, is not sufficient to constitute negligence; and, unless you find from all the evidence in this case that the men in charge of the train were guilty of negligence in making the coupling, or that the machinery or appliances were out of order, which produced the jolt or jar, your verdict must be for the defendant." Whatever criticism may be indulged in as to the failure of the court to define the terms "carelessly and negligently," as used in the instruction given at the instance of plaintiff, was cured by this.

For error in the instruction as to the measure of damages, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered, all concurring.

STATE v. CARIOT et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 6, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 101*)—JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSE.

Rev. St. 1899, art. 18, § 13 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 4908), vests exclusive original jurisdiction of misdemeanors committed in the city of St. Louis in the St. Louis court of criminal correction. Section 19 (page 4911) provides that no indictment shall be found for any misdemeanor committed in St. Louis, but that the same shall be presented to the court of criminal correction by information. Held, that the St.

Louis court of criminal correction obtained no jurisdiction to try a misdemeanor committed in St. Louis by the transfer of an information filed in the circuit court of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction; Hiram N. Moore, Judge.

Minion Carlot having been duly called in the St. Louis court of criminal correction to answer an offense, and not appearing, the recognizance given for his appearance was declared forfeited, and a writ of scire facias ordered against him as principal and against Joseph A. Duffy, as his surety. Duffy moved to quash the scire facias, and, his motion having been overruled, he appeals. Reversed.

In this case, on the 26th of October, 1904, an information was filed in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, criminal division, by W. Scott Hancock, assistant circuit attorney of that city, in which information it is set out that one Carlot stood charged with violating an ordinance of the city in a certain cause and proceeding pending before a police justice of that city and against one Minion Carlot; that one Nellie Keating was a competent and material witness against said Carlot, who had been duly notified to appear before the police justice to testify to her knowledge of the facts relating to the violation of the ordinance, and that Carlot, well knowing the premises, and that Nellie Keating was then and there a competent and material witness, did willfully and corruptly attempt to give her a certain sum of money as a bribe for the purpose and with the intent to induce her to withhold her testimony in the cause and to depart from the city of St. Louis, and not to appear as a witness for and on behalf of the city of St. Louis. Upon the filing of this information, Carlot was arrested, and entered into a bond, approved by a judge of the circuit court, for his appearance before either of the divisions of the circuit court (Divisions 8 or 9), having jurisdiction of criminal causes, to answer the information. On the 20th of December this information was certified from the division of the circuit court having jurisdiction of criminal causes at the time into the St. Louis court of criminal correction. The defendant appeared in the latter court to answer and entered into recognizance in that court for his appearance until discharged; appellant being his surety. The case was continued from time to time, and, when called for trial, Carlot not appearing and being duly called, the recognizance was declared forfeited and a writ of scire facias ordered against Carlot as principal and against Duffy as his surety. In due time Duffy appeared and moved to quash the scire facias, alleging many grounds, among others lack of jurisdiction. This motion being overruled, Duffy, duly saving exceptions, has appealed to this court.

F. A. C. McManus, for appellant. J. D. Dalton, for the State.

REYNOLDS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). There is only one error assigned necessary to be noted. The offense charged is averred to have been committed in the city of St. Louis, and it is a misdemeanor. The circuit courts of the city of St. Louis when sitting as courts for the disposal of criminal causes have no jurisdiction over misdemeanors. Section 13 of the article relating to the St. Louis court of criminal correction (see Rev. St. 1899, p. 2544, art. 18, § 43 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 4900]) vests "exclusive original jurisdiction of all misdemeanors under the laws of the state, committed in St. Louis city, the punishment whereof is by fine or imprisonment in the county jail, or both," etc., in the court of criminal correction. In section 19 (page 4911) of the same act it is provided that "no indictment shall hereafter be found for any misdemeanor under the laws of this state, committed in the city of St. Louis, the punishment whereof is by fine or imprisonment in the county jail or both, or by any forfeiture, but the same shall be presented to the court of criminal correction by information." Section 18 (page 4910) provides "that the prosecuting attorney of that court shall attend to and prosecute all suits brought therein." For a rather full discussion and exposition of the powers of the St. Louis court of criminal correction, see State ex rel. v. Foster, 187 Mo. 590, 86 S. W. 245.

In certifying the information to the court of criminal correction, the clerk of the circuit court for criminal causes certifies to it as an "indictment." He and the court were evidently proceeding upon the assumption that it was an indictment, and, acting upon that assumption and under the provisions of section 2494, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1495), certified and transmitted the case to the court of criminal correction. As we have seen, this was not an indictment. The offense being a misdemeanor proceeded upon by information, and as proceedings by information for misdemeanors of this class occurring in the city of St. Louis can only be instituted and prosecuted in the court of criminal correction, that court could obtain no jurisdiction of this case by transfer from the circuit court. The recognizance was therefore entered into in a cause not in court. It follows that it was void, and the scire facias issued and judgment entered thereon are nullities.

The judgment of the court of criminal correction is reversed. All concur.

STATE v. CARIOT et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 6, 1909.)

Appeal from St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction; H. N. Moore, Judge.

Minion Cariot having been duly called in the St. Louis court of criminal correction to answer an offense, and not appearing, the recognizance given for his appearance was declared forfeited, and a writ of scire facias ordered against him as principal and against Joseph A. Duffy as his surety. Duffy moved to quash the scire facias, and, his motion having been overruled, he appeals. Reversed.

F. A. C. McManus, for appellant. J. D. Dalton, for the State.

REYNOLDS, P. J. This case is practically identical in all respects with that under the same title (No. 10,689, 118 S. W. 512); the only difference between the two cases being that in this case the person alleged to have been bribed is one Katie Bordsenick.

For the reasons set out in the opinion in No. 10,689, the judgment of the court of criminal correction is reversed. All concur.

GILLESPIE v. BEEDY et al.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

PARTNERSHIP (§ 56*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held not to show that a defendant was a partner of codefendants, or that he held himself out to plaintiff to be such.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; E. E. Porterfield, Judge.

Action by Sarah F. Gillespie against J. C. Beedy and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the mentioned defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Calvin and J. B. Hamner, for appellant. Frank Yeoman, for respondent.

BROADBUSH, P. J. This suit was instituted in a justice's court, where it was tried and judgment had, from which an appeal was taken to the circuit court, where it was tried anew, and plaintiff obtained judgment and defendant Beedy appealed to this court.

The plaintiff sues defendants as copartners. The plaintiff claims that on or about the 15th day of March, 1904, the defendants as such partners employed plaintiff as a mail carrier on the star route mail service from Myersville to South Pass City, Wyo.; that they owe plaintiff for service performed for the last 15 days of March, 1904, in the sum of $116.86, and 6 per cent. interest on the same for 2½ years; and that they are indebted to her in the further sum of $79.71, with interest, amounting to $11.85, for the full amount of the quarter's pay due one M. M. Gillespie for said mail service, an order for which had been duly assigned to her. The defendant Beedy, before the trial of the cause in the justice's court, filed an affidavit denying the existence of the alleged partnership.

It appears from the testimony that during the year 1903 Hansberger and Crenshaw, defendants, through their agent, E. C. McKinney, secured a contract with the government for the carrying of the mail from South Pass City to Myersville, Wyo. McKinney made a contract with M. M. Gillespie in their behalf, whereby the latter agreed to carry the mail over said route for the consideration of $700, quarterly payments, for his services. The said mail contract with the government was made in the name of McKinney, and the quarterly vouchers issued by the government were issued to McKinney, which were turned over by him to defendants Hansberger and Crenshaw, who cashed them under a power of attorney from McKinney.

Before assuming his duties under his contract, M. M. Gillespie was introduced by Beedy's codefendants to Beedy, who as agent for his daughter, Nellie A. Beedy, had money to lend. He borrowed from defendant Beedy $900, to secure the payment of which he executed a chattel mortgage upon certain personal property, which he used in connection with the business of carrying the mail, and a mortgage upon some real estate situate in Kansas City. In March, 1904, on account of domestic troubles, M. M. Gillespie ceased to carry the mails, and his wife, the plaintiff herein, undertook the service under a contract similar to that of her husband. When he left the service he assigned to her a portion of one quarter's pay then due, but which Hansberger and Crenshaw refused to pay on the ground that they had been compelled to pay it to her husband. Plaintiff complied with her contract in carrying mail, but, not having been paid therefor, she instituted this action against all three of the defendants as partners. The only question raised on the appeal is whether the defendant Beedy is a partner with Hansberger and Crenshaw.

Hansberger, Crenshaw, and Beedy all testified that the latter was not a partner, and it must be admitted there is no positive evidence that he was such. The contract between McKinney and M. M. Gillespie contained a proviso that the former was to deposit with Barber & Barber of Kansas City a check for the sum of $600 as security for payment to Gillespie of each quarterly payment when the money should be received from the government. The contract contains also the following: "There are certain notes given to N. A. Beedy of different amounts, in the total amount $900, which are secured on real estate owned by the party of the second part. Said notes are payable at different intervals and whenever the note due on any quarter during this agreement it shall be deducted with the interest thereon from the amount of pay due the party of the second part for the quarter," etc. It was shown that Beedy and Gillespie, after the contract had been entered into, talked together in reference to it, and then went into the office of Barber & Barber and deposited it with them for safe-keeping. Beedy testified that he had no knowledge of the contents of said contract. This may be true; but it does not seem reasonable that McKinney would have made such provision in his favor without his knowledge and consent.

In addition to said recitations, plaintiff relies upon certain letters she received from Beedy in answer to letters she wrote to him about the business. One, dated March 3, 1904, if it be construed by detaching certain expressions from the context, might be considered as evidence tending to show that he was holding himself out as a partner in the business; but, if construed as a whole, it does not indicate such an intention. He tells plaintiff plainly that he has no right to say what shall be done with the route, "and that the loan on the property and the advance on your mail pay was a private matter of mine, which I suppose you are aware of." Other letters introduced, read in connection with the fact that he had lent the money of his daughter to M. M. Gillespie to enable him to purchase an outfit to carry the mail, account for the interest defendant manifested in plaintiff's undertaking to carry out the original contract made by her husband. The evidence as a whole is to the effect that plaintiff merely stepped into the shoes of the husband to complete his contract for carrying the mail, and that she had no contract with Beedy to that effect; and the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence is that whatever defendant Beedy did or said was of an advisory character, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, and with a view to his own individual interest, or that of his daughter.

Beedy, apparently, belonged merely to that class of persons with abundant means who may be found connected more or less with the business affairs of persons who are in need of money and are willing to pay a good rate of interest to secure it. This view of the case accounts for his action in the premises. We are satisfied that there was no evidence whatever that he was a partner of his codefendants, and that there was no substantial evidence that he held himself out to the plaintiff as such, but that, on the contrary, he notified plaintiff in plain terms that he had no authority to act for his codefendants.

Reversed. All concur.

MUT. INS. CO.

1. INSURANCE (§ 626*)—ACTION ON POLICY—SERVICE OF PROCESS—"PRINCIPAL OFFICE."

Under Rev. St. 1899, § 8092 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3843), requiring service of process on town mutual fire insurance companies to be made on some corporate officer at defendant's "principal office," service at defendant's "usual business office" is insufficient.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5539.]

2. APPEARANCE (§ 24*)—WAIVER OF DEFECTIVE SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Though the service on defendant corporation was defective on its face, defendant appeared specially to demur on the grounds that the petition and record disclosed no jurisdiction, and that no cause of action was stated. The demurrer being overruled, defendant filed an answer in two counts, one stating that the appearance was specially for the purpose of challenging the jurisdiction of the court, and one a general denial of the petition. An amended answer disclaimed a general appearance, and asked an abatement of the action for defective service of process, and this was repeated in a general denial of the allegations of the petition. Held, that defendant thus waived the defective service.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County; A. H. Waller, Judge.

Action by H. H. Lohoefer against the Mercantile Town Mutual Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. B. Sebastian and Barclay, Shields & Fauntleroy, for appellant. N. T. Gentry, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This is an action on a fire insurance policy; the defendant being a town mutual insurance company organized under article 11, c. 119, §§ 8084-8103, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 3840-3847). The judgment in the trial court was for the plaintiff.

The matter presented for our consideration relates to a question of jurisdiction of the defendant. A consideration of the question involves a construction of the statute and the sheriff's return of service of the summons, and also whether there was a waiver of proper service by appearance of the defendant. The action was brought in Boone county and the service of the summons was in city of St. Louis. The following is the return indorsed thereon: "Served this writ in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, on the within named defendant the Mercantile Town Mutual Insurance Company (a corporation), this 10th day of November, 1904, by delivering a copy of the writ and petition as furnished by the clerk to J. W. Daugherty, secretary of the said defendant corporation, he being in said defendant's usual business office and in charge thereof. The president or other chief officer of said defendant could not be found in the city of St. Louis at the time of service. Joseph F. Dickmann, Sheriff, by R. Cahill, Deputy. Fee $1.15."

The statute (section 8092, Rev. St. 1899 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 3843]), governing service on town mutual fire insurance companies, provides that "suits may be instituted in the circuit court of any county in this state where the cause of action originated against any company operating under the provisions of this article or where such company has its principal office, and whenever any suit shall be so instituted against any such company, a certified copy of the original petition and summons shall be served on the president or secretary, or other chief officer in charge of the principal office of such company, by the acting sheriff of the county in which such company may have its principal office. If such company have its principal office in the city of St. Louis, then the acting sheriff of the city of St. Louis shall serve the process herein mentioned. And service when so made and proven by the return thereof, shall be deemed service on any such company proceeded against." It will be noticed that the return shows the summons was served on the secretary in charge of "defendant's usual business office," instead of the "principal office," as required by the statute. We are satisfied that the service at the "usual business office" was not a service at the "principal office" of the defendant, and for that reason no jurisdiction of the defendant was obtained by such service. Thomasson v. Insurance Co., 114 Mo. App. 109, 89 S. W. 564, 1135. Service on the "nearest agent" of a railroad company will not meet the requirement of a statute that it shall be had on "the nearest station agent." Haley v. Railway Co., 80 Mo. 112; Blanton v. Jamison, 8 Mo. 52. It was held in Gamasche v. Smythe, 60 Mo. App. 161, in an opinion by Judge Rombauer, that the condition of service of the character here considered must be strictly complied with, and that no inferences will be made in its favor, but rather will be taken against it to the full extent "which its departure from the description of the statute will warrant." Several instances furnished by decisions of the Supreme Court are cited in that case by way of illustration of the correctness of the view taken as to the particularity required in such service.

The question is presented whether jurisdiction of the body corporate has been waived. The defendant came into court and filed a demurrer, claiming therein to appear for no other purpose. The grounds of demurrer were that the petition and record disclosed that the court had no jurisdiction of the defendant, and on the ground that the petition did not state a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant then filed an answer in two counts. The first stated an appearance for the special purpose of challenging the jurisdiction of the court. The second was a general denial of the plaintiff's petition. Afterwards the defendant filed an amended answer disclaiming a general appearance, and alleging that the court had no jurisdiction over the defendant, for the reason that the service of process was insufficient, and therefore asked that the action be abated. And then again made a general denial of the allegations of the petition, but repeated its statement that thus answering was not a waiver of its matter in abatement. Under the view stated by Judge Valliant in Newcomb v. Railway Co., 182 Mo. 687, 81 S. W. 1069, followed by the St. Louis Court of Appeals in Thomasson v. Insurance Co., 114 Mo. App. 109, 89 S. W. 564, 1135, we must hold that the defendant waived the insufficient service.

We do not regard the other points made by defendant in regard to defects in the petition and as to the action of the trial court in the matter of setting the cause for hearing after sustaining motion for new trial as of substantial merit.

The foregoing was written just after the cause was submitted in March, 1906, when it was suggested that as the case of Thomasson v. Insurance Co., supra, with similar question, was pending in the Supreme Court on a certificate from the St. Louis Court of Appeals, we should withhold it to await the action of the Supreme Court. We have now been furnished with a copy of the opinion of the latter court by Judge Gantt in which the views expressed by Judge Norton of the St. Louis Court of Appeals and by us herein are approved.

We therefore promulgate this opinion, and direct the affirmance of the judgment. All concur.

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 3*)—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—NECESSITY OF ADMINISTRATION.

Where a husband and wife mortgage their homestead, and the husband dies, and there is no estate for administration, it is unnecessary to have an administrator appointed and made a party to an action to foreclose the mortgage, as any surplus at the foreclosure sale would go to the widow, though Rev. St. 1899, c. 52, § 4346 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2392), requires that in case of the death of the mortgagor his personal representative shall be made defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 7-9; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 427*)—FORECLOSURE—NECESSARY PARTIES.

The widow of a mortgagor should be made a party to an action to foreclose, though during the lifetime of the mortgagor it would be unnecessary to join the wife in the foreclosure suit.

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 146*)—INTEREST OF SURVIVING WIFE—CONVEYANCE—ESTATE CONVEYED.

Where a widow's right of dower is extinguished by reason of the preponderance in value of her homestead right, and she conveys her homestead right to her children, who are the only heirs of the owner and entitled to the land after the expiration of the widow's rights, the entire fee to the land merges in them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 257; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

4. MORTGAGES (§ 534*)—FORECLOSURE—TITLE OF PURCHASER.

A foreclosure sale under a mortgage covering the entire fee, including dower, homestead, and the remainder which would descend to the heirs of the mortgagor, passes the fee to the purchaser.

5. HOMESTEAD (§ 121*)—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—RIGHT OF WIDOW TO SURPLUS.

Where mortgaged property is of greater value than the homestead right of the widow and the mortgage combined, the widow is entitled to the surplus on the foreclosure sale of the property after the death of her husband.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Moniteau County; Wm. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by H. B. Hardy, administrator of James T. Atkinson, deceased, against Sarah C. Atkinson and others. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edmund Burke, for appellants. Moore & Williams, for respondent.

BROADBUSH, P. J. The appeal in this case is from the action of the court in overruling defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's petition.

The recitations of the petition in substance are that in September, 1898, one W. J. Atkinson executed his promissory note payable to James T. Atkinson or order for the sum of $500 due one day after date, bearing 7 per cent. interest per annum; that the said W. J. Atkinson with his wife, the defendant Sarah C., for the purpose of securing the payment of the note, executed a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage with J. El. Lander as trustee, conveying to the latter for the use of the said James Atkinson as beneficiary certain real estate, described, upon the usual conditions in such instruments; and that, when the debt and interest was paid, the instrument was to be void otherwise to remain in full force and effect. It is alleged that the said W. J. Atkinson failed to pay any part of said note and interest; that, after its execution, the said W. J. Atkinson died on the 25th day of December, 1898, intestate; that he left no property subject to administration and no administration was had on his estate; that on the 14th day of January, 1899, defendant Sarah C., his widow, filed a motion in the probate court of Moniteau county, stating that the personal property of the said W. J. did not exceed $94 in value, and praying that an order be made refusing letters of administration; that the court upon hearing the motion made an order that no letters of administration should be granted on said estate, and all the property of deceased was turned over to the said Sarah C. as widow; that the said W. J. at the time of his death occupied the dwelling on the land described with his family, and that said real estate constituted his homestead and that of his widow and his minor children during their minority; that, after the death of the said W. J., the defendant Sarah C. continued to occupy the said real estate up to the present time with the defendants Elva A. Howard and Sarah E. Atkinson, children of W. J. and Sarah C., who have obtained their majority; that said homestead was at all times and now is of less value than $1,500; that the said Sarah C. and daughters, Elva A. Howard and Sarah E. Atkinson, were and are the only heirs at law of the said W. J.; that the said Sarah C. as widow was entitled to life estate in the realty as her homestead, and that the other defendants are entitled to the remainder subject to said mortgage debt; and that plaintiff is informed that Sarah C. has made a quitclaim conveyance of her said homestead rights to her two daughters Sarah E. and Elva A. It is further alleged that the said James T. Atkinson died intestate, in Moniteau county, on the 12th day of December, 1905; that on the 19th day of December, 1905, the plaintiff as public administrator was appointed administrator of the said James T. Atkinson's estate and as such brings this suit, and that the trustee has moved from the state; that as no action as a strict action of law for foreclosure of said mortgage will lie under the facts of the case, and there can be no administrator appointed, the chancery powers of the court are invoked for a judgment of foreclosure in equity and for a sale of the property, which must be sold as a whole, and after the payment of the note and interest the balance of the proceeds be paid out under the orders of the court. To the petition defendants filed a demurrer, the purport of which is that the estate of the said W. J. in the land cannot be foreclosed unless it be represented by an administrator; and because the defendants are not necessary parties to the suit.

Section 4346, c. 52, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2392), concerning mortgage and deeds of trust, provides that: "In case of the death of the mortgagee or his assignee or of the mortgagor, whether before or after action brought, the personal representative of the deceased party shall be made plaintiff or defendant, as the case may require." McDonald v. Frost, 99 Mo. 44, 12 S. W. 363; Tierney v. Spiva, 97 Mo. 98, 10 S. W. 433. And it is held in such cases that the only necessary party to the suit is the administrator of the deceased. Hall v. Klepzig, 99 Mo. 83, 12 S. W. 372; Blevins v. Smith, 104 Mo., loc. cit. 615, 16 S. W. 213, 13 L. R. A. 441. And in Thornton v. Pigg, 24 Mo. 249, it is held that, although a wife should join with her husband in the execution of a mortgage, she is not a necessary party under the statute to foreclose a mortgage. See, also, Riddick v. Walsh, 15 Mo. 519. But this rule does not apply after the death of the husband as the wife's inchoate right to dower has by his death vested an estate as tenant for life. And it is said there is nothing inconsistent with the widow's rights to both dower and homestead in the same estate. Gragg v. Gragg, 65 Mo. 343. But she is entitled to her homestead first, and from the residue of the real estate she is entitled to dower, diminished by the amount of her interest in the homestead. Section 3621, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2042). It appears from the recitations of the petition that the widow's right of dower is extinguished by reason of the preponderance in value of her homestead right. The widow having conveyed her homestead right to her two children, the entire fee to the land merged in them; they being the remaindermen. 5 Words & Phrases, 4402; Bassett v. O'Brien, 149 Mo. 381, 51 S. W. 107.

The mortgage covered the entire fee, including dower, homestead, and the remainder, and a foreclosure would pass to the purchaser such fee. If there should be a surplus, it would go to the widow. It is held that, if the property be of greater value than the homestead and the mortgage combined, the widow is entitled to the surplus after a deduction of the amount of the mortgage. Hufschmidt v. Gross, 112 Mo. 649, 20 S. W. 679; Burroughs v. Howell County, 180 Mo. 642, 79 S. W. 682; Elstroth v. Young, 83 Mo. App. 253. Such being the law, notwithstanding the merger, the general creditors would have no interest in the estate. Consequently there was no necessity for an administrator.

Affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; John G. Park, Judge.

Action by L. O. Mitchell and another, copartners, against J. S. Chick and another, copartners. A verdict for defendants was directed. Plaintiffs took a nonsuit with leave, and, their motion to set it aside being overruled, appealed. Affirmed.

W. W. Calvin, for appellants. H. S. Conrad, for respondents.

JOHNSON, J. This suit was brought before a justice of the peace of Jackson county. The statement filed is in two counts. In the first it is alleged: That plaintiffs sold, assigned, and delivered to defendants an account of $242.85 they held against one J. G. Staley and, at the same time, executed and delivered to defendants their bank check for $7.15; that, in consideration of the sale of said account and the delivery of said check, defendants promised and agreed to pay plaintiffs $250 in money; and that defendants have failed and refused to pay said sum or any part thereof. In the second count plaintiffs allege that defendants received from them $250, and agreed to hold it as agents and stakeholders of plaintiffs on the following conditions: "That should one T. H. Pratt, Ex., not ratify a certain agreement of sale, entered into with plaintiffs, and in which agreement defendants were made and were the agents and stakeholders of plaintiffs, within ten days from the date thereof, August 6, 1906, then it was agreed and understood by and between the parties to said contract of sale, and was also agreed and understood by and between plaintiffs and defendants, that the money so left and deposited in hands of defendants was to be turned over and refunded to plaintiffs." Further, it is alleged that said Pratt failed and refused to ratify said contract of sale, and that defendants have failed and refused to return the deposit to plaintiffs. At the trial in the circuit court, where the cause was taken by appeal, the court peremptorily instructed the jury, at the conclusion of the evidence introduced by plaintiffs, to return a verdict for defendants. Plaintiffs took a nonsuit with leave, and, after their motion to set aside was overruled, appealed to this court.

Material facts disclosed by the evidence are as follows: In the summer of 1906, plaintiffs, who were partners engaged in the plumbing business in Kansas City, did the plumbing work for a building owned by Staley at No. 616 Olive street. The charge for all the work was $307.85. $125 was paid on the account by Staley, leaving due and unpaid the remainder of $242.85. The account was approved and marked "O. K." by Staley, the debtor, and plaintiffs were directed by him to present it at defendants' office in Kansas City for payment. Defendants were partners engaged in the business of real estate and loan agents. They employed one Colvin as an assistant in their loan business and one Calhoun as a salesman of real estate. Staley had applied to them for a loan on the property we have mentioned, but defendants could not make the loan and referred him to Colvin, who, it appears, was permitted by arrangement with defendants to transact loan business on his own account as well as for defendants. Colvin secured a loan on the property from a life insurance company, and we think the evidence shows conclusively that defendants had no connection with the transaction, though it was conducted by Colvin in their office. It appears that the proceeds of the loan were not sufficient to pay the entire cost of the improvements made by Staley on the property, and Colvin began, and conducted to an unsuccessful end, negotiations with the insurance company for another loan. During the progress of these negotiations, plaintiffs, at the direction of Staley, presented their account to Colvin for payment. From what they were told, plaintiffs inferred that defendants were the agents in charge of the loan; but, as we have said, defendants had nothing to do with it, and plaintiffs were referred to Colvin, who, apparently, was satisfied with the correctness of the account and assured plaintiffs that it would be paid in a few days. Plaintiffs called on Colvin several times about the payment of the account, and, becoming impatient, threatened to employ a lawyer. Finally, plaintiff Mitchell went to defendants' office on the 5th or 6th of August, 1906, to collect the account if possible. While there he was approached by Calhoun, who wished to interest him in the purchase of some real property owned by T. H. Pratt, as executor of an estate. Plaintiff said he would not purchase the property unless he could apply his account against Staley on the purchase price. Calhoun agreed that this might be done, and the parties reached an understanding. A written contract of sale was prepared, by the terms of which Mitchell bought the property for $3,630. It recites: "Of the purchase price, two hundred and fifty dollars has been paid and is deposited with J. S. Chick & Son, agents for the seller, and the balance is payable as follows," etc. It contains the stipulation: "All money is to be returned to Mr. Mitchell if the sale is not ratified by Mr. Pratt within ten days from this date." The contract was signed by Calhoun as agent for Pratt, executor, and by Mitchell as agent for his firm. The sale was not consummated for the reason that Pratt refused to ratify it. It is conceded that the sum of $250 mentioned in the contract as paid by plaintiffs was made up of the following items, viz.: First, a transfer in writing of the Staley account amounting, as we have said, to $242.85; and, second, a check of $7.15, drawn by plaintiffs on a bank in Kansas City and made payable to the order of defendants. The evidence tends to show that defendants were the agents of Pratt, the executor, and that Calhoun was acting as their salesman in entering into the contract of sale with Mitchell. Plaintiffs contend that these facts entitle them to recover $250 in money from defendants, while defendants, among their defenses, say that at best plaintiffs, on the refusal of Pratt to ratify the contract of sale, were entitled only to a return of their account against Staley and their check of $7.15. It is conceded that a return of the account and check was tendered plaintiffs before this suit was begun. Other facts appear in the record, but those stated suffice for a proper understanding of the case.

Counsel in their briefs discuss with much earnestness the questions of whether the cause of action pleaded in the first count of the statement falls within the operation of the statute of frauds and of whether Colvin and Calhoun were acting in the transactions of the loan to Staley and the sale of the real estate as the respective agents of defendants. We think the evidence shows that Colvin was not the agent of defendant in the matter of the loan, and that Calhoun was their agent in selling real estate.

We do not find it necessary to discuss the subject of the effect of the statute of frauds on the cause stated in the first count, for the reason that the evidence does not support the inference that defendants, acting through their agent, Calhoun, did anything more than to make a conditional purchase of the Staley account. Clearly it was the intention of the parties that defendants should accept the assignment of the account as so much cash paid on the purchase price of the real estate provided their principal, the executor, would ratify the contract of sale. They did not intend to make an absolute purchase of the account and took an assignment of it only as a part of the transaction of selling the real estate and as an inducement to plaintiffs to become purchasers thereof. When their principal rejected the contract of sale, the extent of their obligation was to return to plaintiffs the property they had received on account of the purchase price, viz., the Staley account and the check of $7.15. Since defendants tendered this property to plaintiffs before the commencement of this action and have kept the tender good, it follows that plaintiffs can have no right to recover under either count of the statement.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 567*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT LIEN—SPECIAL TAX BILL—ACTION—PLEADING.

Rev. St. 1890, § 5986 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3022), regulating cities of the fourth class, provides that special tax bills, and any action thereon, shall be prima facie evidence of the regularities of the proceedings for such special assessments, of the validity of the bill, of the doing of the work, and the liability of the property. Held, that under such section, construed in conjunction with the presumption that municipal authorities have proceeded according to law, a petition on a special tax bill, alleging that the duly authorized officers of the city had issued the bill to plaintiff, setting out its provisions, and that defendants are the owners of the land sought to be charged, was sufficient, without facts showing that the city had authority to pass the ordinance for the improvement in question.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County; Francis H. Trimble, Judge.

Action by the Barber Asphalt Paving Company and another against Kihleberg Karlsbad Bath Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Craven & Moore, for appellants. Scarritt, Scarritt & Jones, for respondents.

JOHNSON, J. This suit is for the enforcement of the lien of special tax bills issued by Excelsior Springs, a city of the fourth class, in payment of the cost of paving a public street. Defendants, the owners of the property against which the tax bills were issued, demurred to the petition on the grounds: First, that the petition fails to state a cause of action; and, second, that it does not show that the city "had any authority by law to pass its ordinance to pave the street therein mentioned, for the reason that said ordinance could only be passed after the proper publication of a resolution." The demurrer was overruled. Defendants declined to plead further, and, standing on the demurrer, brought the case here by appeal from the judgment rendered against them.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The petition is in three counts, but present purposes will be satisfied by a statement of the substance of one of them. It is alleged that an ordinance providing for the improvement was enacted and approved by the city; that pursuant thereto a contract was made by the city with plaintiff; that the work was completed in accordance with the terms of the ordinance and contract, and was accepted by the city; and that the assessment was levied, and the tax bill issued. There is an averment that "each and all of the requirements of the statutes and ordinance, in regard to the work and improvements and the tax bill herein referred to, were duly complied with." The tax bill is set out in hæc verba. It is conceded that the facts pleaded are sufficiently stated, but the objection urged against the petition is that it fails to state all of the facts constitutive of the cause of action. Defendants argue that it is just as essential that compliance with other statutory requirements relating to the levy of the assessment be shown in the petition as it is that the ordinance authorizing the improvement or the tax bill itself be pleaded; that each statutory step leading to the issuance of the tax bill is jurisdictional, and therefore is constitutive of a cause of action for the enforcement of the lien. Specific attention is directed to the omission from the petition of an allegation that a resolution was passed by the board of aldermen declaring the work necessary to be done, a step required by the provisions of the statute relating to cities of the fourth class. Section 5989, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3024). The courts of this state have held in a number of cases that, in actions on special tax bills, the plaintiff is not required to plead compliance with the preliminary steps leading to the issuance of the tax bill. "It is sufficient for the plaintiff to allege in the first instance that the officers of the municipality duly authorized so to do have issued to him the special tax bill on which he sues, setting out its provisions, and stating that the defendants named therein are the owners of the lot sought to be charged. Vleths v. Planet, etc., Co., 64 Mo. App. 207; Eyerma v. Payne, 28 Mo. App. 72; Lucas v. McCann, 50 Mo. App. 638; Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Wright's Trustees, 68 Mo. App. 144; Excelsior Springs Co. v. Ettenson, 120 Mo. App. 222, 96 S. W. 701; Hunt v. Hopkins, 66 Mo. 98; Duncan v. Kirtley, 54 Mo. App. 655.

But defendant contends that this rule of pleading had its origin in statutes which, as in the case of Hunt v. Hopkins, supra, specifically provided that "it shall be sufficient for plaintiff to plead the making and the issue of the tax bill sued on, giving the dates and contents thereof and assignment thereof in case of assignment," and that, in the absence of such statutory provision, the rule cannot obtain, but instead the general rule of pleading that the petition must contain a plain and concise statement of all of the constitutive facts must apply. The statutes relating to cities of the fourth class do not contain a provision similar to that quoted, but they do provide that "such special tax bills shall in any action thereon, be prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings for such special assessments, of the validity of the bill, of the doing of the work, and of the furnishing of the materials charged for and of the liability of the property to the charge stated in the bill." Section 5986, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3022). It is true this statute goes no further than to establish the character of a special tax bill as evidence, and does not deal with the question of pleading. Cushing v. Powell, 130 Mo. App. 576, 109 S. W. 1054. But, taken in conjunction with the initial presumption, indulged in cases of this nature, that the municipal authorities have proceeded in accordance with the law, and not in violation thereof (Paving Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo., loc. cit. 568, 38 S. W. 458; Excelsior Springs Co. v. Ettenson, supra), we think the statutory rule of pleading considered in some of the cases we have cited (e. g., Hunt v. Hopkins) should be regarded as but a legislative enactment of a general rule. "The suit is one upon the tax bill, and not for work and labor done." Vleths v. Planet Co., supra. If on its face the tax bill appears to be regular, presumptively it is valid. It proclaims the fact that it was issued in conformity with the law, and the burden always is on the defendant to overcome the presumption of validity by proof to the contrary. The petition is to be measured by the rule applied in the cases where the statutes deal specifically with the subject of pleading, and, thus measured, is found sufficient. The decision of this court in the recent case of Cushing v. Powell, supra, is not in conflict with the views expressed. Indeed, we said there, in effect, what we have said here: "The holder of the bill by legal intentment alleges the several steps necessary to a tax bill and its regularity, by alleging the issuance of the bill, and he proves that by introducing the bill." We do not consider that the case of City of Carthage v. Badgley, 73 Mo. App. 123, much relied on by defendants, sustains their contention. There the petition alleged facts which affirmatively disclosed the invalidity of the tax bill. Here all the allegations assert its validity.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 100*)—FRAUD—CONCEALMENT.

A statute provided that actions for fraud must be commenced within 5 years, but that the cause of action should not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the fraud by the aggrieved party at any time within 10 years. Held that, where plaintiff could have discovered the fraud at any time after its perpetration by examining the public record of an option under which defendant purchased the land in question, the fraud was an open one, so that defendant's mere silence was no excuse for plaintiff's failure to discover the fraud within the 5-year limitation, and that an action therefor, not brought within that time, was barred.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; A. E. Spencer, Special Judge.

Action by L. L. Scott and others against A. V. Boswell and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Perkins & Blair and A. L. Thomas, for appellants. Gardner & Cameron, for respondents.

BROADDUS, P. J. This is an action for fraud and deceit. The controversy grew out of a transaction in which plaintiffs and defendants became the purchasers of 83 acres of land situate in Jasper county, Mo. The land belonged to Mrs. Theresa Wink, who resided in Oklahoma. On the 12th day of October, 1899, she executed and delivered to the defendant Boswell what is known as an option contract, giving him the exclusive right to purchase said land at the price of $50 an acre, which option was to expire on the 6th day of January, 1900. This writing was filed for record in the recorder of deeds' office of Jasper county on the 4th day of December, 1899, and was duly recorded. On the 27th day of December, 1899, defendant Boswell exercised his said option right, purchased the land from Mrs. Wink for the sum of $4,150, and received from her a deed to the land for that consideration, which consideration was recited in the deed. The deed was filed for record on the 3d of January, 1900. On the 20th day of December, 1899, two days after he had received the deed from Mrs. Wink, Boswell with his wife conveyed an undivided three-twentieths of the land to plaintiff R. S. Doling; an undivided one-twentieth to plaintiff James S. Doling; an undivided three-twentieths to plaintiff W. W. Whaley; an undivided one-twentieth to plaintiff John F. Bryan; an undivided one-tenth to plaintiffs Scott & Bowker; and an undivided one-tenth to defendant John Patten. The matter remained in this condition until the year 1906, when the plaintiffs herein brought a partition suit in the circuit court of Jasper county against the defendants herein for a partition of the land, after which, by mutual agreement, it was divided between plaintiffs and defendants by exchange of deeds, by which division plaintiffs received 43 acres and defendants 40 acres thereof. After Boswell had received the option from Mrs. Wink and recorded the same, he met plaintiff Scott, and the two had a conversation, in which Boswell undertook to induce Scott to buy an interest in the land. Scott informed his partner, plaintiff Bowker, of said conversation, and the latter went to Joplin, and out to the land and examined it. On the 6th day of November, 1899, plaintiffs Scott & Bowker entered into a written contract, whereby they agreed to purchase from Boswell an undivided one-tenth of the land for $650. Some time after Boswell had obtained said option, he was in Springfield, Mo., when he met plaintiffs R. S. Doling and W. W. Whaley, and had a talk with them about the land. Afterwards they went to Joplin, and went out in company with plaintiff Bowker and Boswell, and examined the land; and afterwards they agreed to purchase the several undivided interests in the land, which were afterwards conveyed to them by Boswell, as stated. It does not appear that Boswell had any talk with the plaintiffs James M. Doling and John F. Bryan in person about the land, but it does appear that James S. Doling represented them in the transaction. It was not shown that defendant Patten had any connection with the plaintiffs in the transaction, and the court dismissed him from the proceedings. The plaintiff Bowker testified that he met Boswell in company with plaintiffs Doling and Whaley in Joplin, and had a talk about the land, in which Boswell said that there was an opportunity to buy the land from a widow woman who resided in the territory; that the land could be bought for $6,500, and that he regarded it as very cheap; that he was unable financially at the time to buy the entire tract himself, or put that much money in it; and that, "If we would go in with him and buy this land, we would divide it up into tenths. He would take a certain part of the tenths, three or four tenths, and if the rest of us would take the balance, we would go in and buy it." He testified that the other parties present agreed to take certain interests in the land, and that Boswell said that it would take some little time to get the deed and abstract made and see the title was all right, and as soon as that was done, that "he would notify us, and we could send our money to the bank" in Joplin, and that "we would have to bear our proper part" of the expenses, whatever they would be. Plaintiff Scott's evidence corresponded with that of witness Bowker in regard to Boswell's representations. James M. Doling testified that he represented R. S. Doling and Bryan in the transaction. Other evidence was introduced which showed conclusively that plaintiffs understood from defendant Boswell that he would buy the land at $6,500 for the mutual benefit of all parties, and that they entered into the arrangement with the understanding that they were to get it at what it cost. The defendant tendered evidence to prove that the land was of greater value than the price the plaintiffs paid for it. The court refused the tender. The plaintiffs did not learn that Boswell had the option on the land for the sum of $4,150 until more than 5 years after they purchased their respective interests, but less than 10 years thereafter. The plaintiffs recovered judgment, and defendant appealed.

The defendant raises several questions on his appeal, but we shall only consider the one that we believe is decisive of the case, to wit, the right of plaintiff to recover on the pleadings and testimony. The action was commenced more than 5 years after the date of the alleged fraud, but within 5 years from the alleged date of its discovery. The statute provides that actions for fraud shall be commenced within 5 years; "the cause of action in such case to be deemed not to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party at any time within ten years of the facts constituting the fraud." The petition alleges that the fraud was not discovered until 7 years after the purchase by plaintiffs of their respective interests. The suit was begun immediately thereafter. The contention of defendant is that, as there is no allegation and proof thereof that plaintiff used any diligence to discover the alleged fraud, and no allegation and proof thereof that defendant said or did anything to prevent the discovery of the alleged fraud, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. It is held that, where plaintiff was in possession of the means of discovering the fraud from the time of its perpetration, and did not use them, the concealment of the facts by defendant by mere silence was not enough to bar the recovery of the statute, and that the petition in such case must charge, and the evidence show, that it was by reason of something defendant did or said that the discovery of the fraud was not discovered sooner. Callan v. Callan, 175 Mo. 346, 74 S. W. 965. "A party seeking to avoid the bar of the statute on account of fraud must aver and show that he used due diligence to detect it; and, if he had the means of discovery in his power, he will be held to have known it." Shelby County v. Bragg, 135 Mo. 291, loc. cit. 300, 86 S. W. 602. Many other authorities might be cited to the same effect.

The plaintiff relies upon Bent v. Priest, 86 Mo. 475. But that was a case where the fraud practiced by an agent was accomplished in secret, and the court held that under such circumstances the cause of action did not accrue until the fraud was discovered. And the court used the following language in drawing the distinction between open and secret frauds, to wit: "If the substantial facts constituting the fraud, in cases like the one under consideration, were open, it is believed, under the equity rules, the statute of limitations would have applied at once, but if the facts were in their nature secret and unknown, it is believed the statute would not begin to run until they were discovered; there being no want of diligence on the part of the complainant." In this case, the alleged fraud was not of a secret nature, but an open one. It was a matter open to discovery to the plaintiffs at all times. At any time, by an inspection of the record, they could have learned from defendant's option deed the price he was to pay for the land, and, further, by inquiry of the owner of the land they could have learned that fact. And there is no evidence tending to show that defendant did or said anything to prevent a discovery of the fraud; besides, there are no allegations of diligence, or that defendant said or did anything to prevent discovery. It follows, therefore, that the court committed error in refusing to sustain defendant's demurrer to the evidence.

The cause is reversed. All concur.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 362*)—CONTRACTS FOR PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—DELAY IN PERFORMANCE.

Under a general ordinance defining the manner in which street improvements should be made, and providing that the acceptance of a bid shall be taken as an award of the contract for the work, and that the street committee shall contract for the completion of the work "within the time agreed upon," the time specified is of the essence of the contract, where it contains no provision for forfeiture if the work is not completed in time; but the city council may extend the time, and such extension will not invalidate special tax bills issued in payment of such improvements.

avenue to Meridian street. The validity of the tax bill is attacked by defendant on the ground that the time for the completion of the improvement was made of the essence of the contract between the city and the contractor, and the improvement was not completed until after the expiration of the time specified.

The ordinance authorizing the work was passed by the city council December 19, 1900, and is as follows:

"Section 1. That First street be improved by bringing to subgrade and macadamizing the same from Meridian street to Amander avenue, as provided by general ordinance No. 38, entitled 'An ordinance defining the manner in which the paving, macadamizing, curbing and guttering of streets, avenues, squares, alleys, or other highways or part thereof, shall be done, and the manner in which improvements shall be paid for.' Approved June 13, 1893.

"Sec. 2. The city engineer is hereby authorized and directed to advertise for bids in the Joplin Daily Globe for the bringing to subgrade and macadamizing First street from Meridian street to Amander avenue, according to the plans and specifications now on file in the office of the city clerk, and said work to be done under the supervision of the street committee and city engineer, as provided by general ordinance No. 38, and paid for in special tax bills, there being no money in the city treasury to pay for the same. Also that the bids will be opened by him, in the presence of the council, on the eighth day of January, 1901.

"Sec. 3. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval and publication."

The general ordinance to which reference is made provided: "The acceptance of a bid shall be taken as an award of the contract for the proposed work to the party making the same, and the street committee shall, without delay, enter into contract with such bidder, for the completion of such work according to the specifications for the same and within the time agreed upon." Pursuant to these ordinances, bids were advertised for, and the contract was awarded to W. H. Mahoney as the lowest and best bidder. A written contract between the city and Mahoney went into effect on the 14th day of January, 1900. It required the contractor to complete the improvement "within 75 days from the time this contract goes into effect," but provided no penalty or forfeit for a failure to complete the work in the time stated. The work was not finished in that time, but before its expiration the city council passed an ordinance extending the time 80 days. The cause was tried without a jury, judgment was entered for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. From the declarations of law given, it appears the court found as facts that the work was completed within the period fixed by the last-mentioned ordinance, and that the failure to complete it in the time stated in the contract was unavoidable, owing to unfavorable weather. The facts thus found, being supported by substantial evidence, are accepted by us as proved and bring us to the consideration of the vital questions of whether: First, the time of completion was of the essence of the contract; and, second, if it was, had the council the authority to extend the time by ordinance passed before the contract time expired?

Counsel for defendant present in their brief two propositions, viz.:

"(1) The contract provided that the work should be completed within 75 days from the time the contract went into effect, which was January 14, 1901. The contract contained no provision for a forfeiture in case the work was not completed in time. Therefore the general ordinance, together with the contract, made time of the essence of the contract, the same as though it was written in the contract. This is settled law in this state. City of Springfield, to Use, v. Davis, 80 Mo. App. 574. This case is cited approvingly in Heman v. Gilliam, 171 Mo. 258, 71 S. W. 163; Paving Co. v. Munn, 185 Mo. 552, 83 S. W. 1062; City of Springfield v. Schmook, 120 Mo. App. 41, 96 S. W. 257.

"(2) When time is of the essence of the contract, the city council has no authority to extend the time for completing the contract, and, if the work is not completed within the time mentioned in the contract, the tax bills issued in payment of the work are void. The provision that the work must be completed within the time is mandatory. Smith v. City of Westport, 105 Mo. App. 221, 79 S. W. 725; Spalding v. Forsee, 109 Mo. App. 675, 83 S. W. 540; Rose v. Trest-rail, 62 Mo. App. 352. The charter of cities of the third class provides that contracts for improving streets shall be let by competition bidding. Section 5860, Rev. St. 1899."

The soundness of the first of these propositions is conceded for argument, but the second must be disapproved on the ground that the Supreme Court ruled this precise point against the contention of defendant in Hund v. Rackliffe, 192 Mo. 312, 91 S. W. 500. It was said in the opinion: "No good reason has been given or is conceivable why the municipal assembly should not have power to extend the time for the completion of a contract beyond the period specified therefor in the original ordinance, if the extending ordinance is passed prior to the expiration of the time limited in the original ordinance." The writer is of the opinion that very good reasons supporting the opposite view are to be found in the cases cited by defendant; but, since we are bound to follow the last decision of the Supreme Court, we cannot do otherwise than to adopt and apply the rule just quoted. It is true that in the case before the Supreme Court the ordinance authorizing the improvement did not specify the time for its completion, nor was time made the subject of any general ordinance; but we do not feel justified in treating the quotation from the opinion as a mere dictum. "It will not do to denounce everything as unauthoritative dicta which might possibly have been omitted from an opinion." Williams v. Railroad, 106 Mo. App., loc. cit. 64, 79 S. W. 1167. Evidently the court intended to deliver an authoritative utterance, and we must so accept it. The point made by defendant against the action of the trial court in modifying the judgment has been considered and found to be without merit.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

BALL et al. v. REYBURN.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 143*)—"UNCONSCIONABLE CONTRACT."

An "unconscionable contract" for attorneys' fees is a fraud, and may be made so to appear by showing that it is such as no man in his senses, and not under a delusion, would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 143*)—CONTRACT FOR FEES—UNCONSCIONABLE CONTRACT.

Defendant, having resided on land abutting a street for a number of years, sued to enjoin the city from lowering the street grade, having expressed himself as determined to prevent it if it cost him "a thousand dollars." Held, that a contract employing an attorney to represent defendant in such action, and agreeing to pay $500 for his services, was not unconscionable, nor was the charge disproportionate to the service.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ray County; Francis H. Trimble, Judge.

Action by Lizzie S. Ball and another as executors of the will of James Ball, against Adam K. Reyburn. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Farris, Jr., and Jenkins & Black, for appellant. Lavelock & Kirkpatrick, for respondents.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiffs are the executors of the will of James Ball, and brought this action for fees alleged to have been earned by Ball as a practicing lawyer in Ray county. They recovered judgment in the trial court. The petition was in two counts, but the second one was abandoned, and the case left to stand on the first, which states the items of indebtedness, and that these had been stated and agreed upon in writing signed by the parties. The contract recites that defendant was indebted to Ball for certain service theretofore rendered, in a case with a coal mining company, in the sum of $200, of which he had paid $50; that he owed him $30 for indebtedness, not stated on what account. It further recites that defendant had employed Ball in a certain injunction case, brought to restrain the city of Richmond from changing and lowering the grade of a street in such city upon which defendant's property abutted, for which services he was to pay $500. There appears a credit of $40 on the contract, which leaves a balance appearing to be due of $640, the amount for which judgment is asked and rendered. We are asked to review the evidence in the record as though the case had been converted by defendant's answer into one in equity, and since in our opinion, considered as a case either at law or in equity, the judgment should be affirmed, we have examined it from the latter standpoint. The evidence shows beyond doubt that the written agreement was executed by defendant. It is conceded that the signature is his, but it is shown that the agreement was written by typewriter on two pages of paper, defendant signing at the close, on the last page, and it is claimed that the first page has been attached to it by ordinary "fasteners" after signing. The evidence does not sustain the claim.

The principal contention between the parties is over the charge of $500 for the injunction case against the city of Richmond. The charge is claimed to be so disproportionate to the importance of the case and the service rendered as to be unconscionable; and that the agreement for its payment should be set aside. An unconscionable bargain is a fraud, and it may be made to appear by showing that it is "such as no man in his senses, and not under delusion, would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other." Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. Sen. 125, 155. We have examined the evidence bearing upon this point, and have concluded, with the learned trial judge, that it does not justify us in refusing validity to the agreement. Defendant was a man able to care for himself, and to determine what effect the proposed action of the city he wished to enjoin would have on his property, and his feelings; he having resided at the place for a long number of years. It was shown that he expressed himself as determined to prevent it if it cost him "a thousand dollars." To permit an avoidance of the writing, on the evidence disclosed in the record, would make written contracts of too slight consequence for the proper security of business transactions.

As stated at the outset, the agreement acknowledged an indebtedness of $30, and a further indebtedness of $200 as a fee in a coal mining case, credited by a payment of $50, and we do not think the record shows that this was not owing. The integrity of the writing has not been successfully impeached, and we, therefore, give effect to its acknowledgments. We say this, whether it be considered in either of the three ways which have found expression in defendant's brief and argument, viz., a mere written acknowledgment, a composition and settlement, or a contract.

It is rightly said that we are not bound by the finding of the trial court in an equity case. But while that is true, the constant practice has been that, where the case is heard on oral testimony, the witnesses thereby facing the trial judge, we defer largely, on disputed matters, to his conclusions. Wilson v. Craig, 175 Mo., loc. cit. 403, 75 S. W. 419; Bank v. Murray, 88 Mo., loc. cit. 196; Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 Mo., loc. cit. 530, 6 S. W. 253; Benne v. Schnecko, 100 Mo., loc. cit. 257, 13 S. W. 82.

We have carefully considered the points and suggestions made in defendant's behalf, but we find ourselves without right to interfere with the judgment, and it is accordingly affirmed. All concur.

REICKERT v. HAMMOND PACKING CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—PREMISES—DIS-REPAIR.

Defendant packing company operated a steamroom for washing iron trees by a caustic soda bath. Plaintiff had been in charge of the room for two days before he was injured, but did not know that caustic was used, supposing the bath consisted only of steam and water. The floor of the washroom at the entrance to the steamroom had become worn and eaten by the solution, which escaped so as to form depressions which became filled with solution during the cleaning process; the sill and bottom of the door being likewise worn and eaten away, forming apertures through which the solution escaped to the floor of the washroom. Plaintiff wore no stockings, and his shoes had holes in the soles, so that, when he accidentally stepped into one of the pools of solution, his foot was severely burned, forming an ulcer which did not heal. Held, that defendant was negligent in allowing the place to fall into such disrepair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 179, 200; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 153*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FAILURE TO WARN.

Defendant was also negligent in failing to warn plaintiff of the danger he incurred from the caustic solution under such circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 314-317; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 101*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CARE REQUIRED BY MASTER.

A master is not an insurer of the servant's safety, but is only required to exercise reasonable or ordinary care to guard the servant against the risk of injury; the master not being liable for the risks that ordinarily and naturally belong to the service, though he must not increase such risks by his failure to observe ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 135, 172; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*)—INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—DANGERS "NECESSARILY" INCIDENT TO EMPLOYMENT.

In an action for injuries to a servant, the court charged that, if plaintiff was employed by defendant, plaintiff assumed all the dangers "necessarily" incident to such employment, but plaintiff did not assume any dangers arising from or caused by defendant's carelessness and negligence. Held, that "necessarily," as so used, meant inevitably, not to be avoided even by the exercise of the highest degree of care, and that the instruction was therefore erroneous as imposing on the master too high a degree of care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1168-1179; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Buchanan County; Henry M. Ramey, Judge.

Action by Ralph Reickert against the Hammond Packing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Vinton Pike, for plaintiff in error. Neville & Grier and Eli Holland, for defendant in error.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant, his employer. The answer is a general denial. The cause was tried to a jury and is here on writ of error from a judgment in favor of plaintiff.

Defendant is extensively engaged in the business of meat packing at St. Joseph. For two months or more prior to his injury plaintiff had been employed in the washroom of the oleomargarine department of defendant's packing establishment. Within this room was a smaller boxlike room, called the "steamroom," in which the iron trees used in hanging meat were cleaned. The trees were run into the steamroom from the washroom on a track. The door of the steamroom then was closed, and steam was turned into the room and onto the trees through perforated pipes. Caustic soda was mixed with the steam in a way to subject the trees to a bath of hot water strongly impregnated with caustic. The floor of the room was slightly concave to permit the drainage of the solution into a sewer inlet in the center of the floor. After the trees were treated to the bath 15 or 20 minutes, the workman in charge opened the door and by means of a hook pulled them out into the washroom. Squeegees were used to dry the floor. Plaintiff had been in charge of the steamroom for two days before his injury. He did not know that caustic was used in cleaning the trees, but supposed that the bath consisted only of steam and water. He wore no stockings, and his shoes were old and had holes in their soles. From the evidence introduced by plaintiff, it appears that the floor of the washroom at the entrance to the steamroom had become worn and eaten by the solution which escaped from the steamroom to an extent to form depressions which became filled with the solution during the cleaning process. The sill and bottom of the door likewise had become worn and eaten away, forming apertures through which the solution escaped to the floor of the washroom. Plaintiff had just opened the door for the purpose of removing the trees he had cleaned, when he accidentally stepped into one of the pools described. His foot was partly immersed in the solution and was severely burned by the caustic. A chronic sore resulted. The physician who began to treat plaintiff some four months after the injury testified that he found on the foot "an ancient ulcer caused by a caustic burn." He stated that a burn of this character produces "inflammation; low grade of inflammation, heals badly and slowly, sometimes don't heal at all." Plaintiff expended $75 for medical treatment, and at the time of the trial, which was more than a year after the injury, had not recovered. There is evidence that defendant did not inform plaintiff that caustic soda was being used in the steamroom nor advise him of its dangerous properties. Defendant had actual knowledge of the defective condition of the place a long time before the injury.

We have stated the case in its aspect most favorable to the cause of action asserted. There is much evidence in the record to impugn the credibility of plaintiff and his witnesses, but we find ourselves compelled to hold that the evidence adduced by him was substantial. This being the case, the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony were issues for the jury to solve. That the evidence of plaintiff tends to accuse defendant of negligence is indisputable. Considering the highly dangerous nature of the caustic used so lavishly, the dictates of care and humanity would impel an ordinarily careful and prudent master in the position of defendant to exercise reasonable care to maintain the door of the steamroom and the adjacent flooring of the washroom in a state of repair that would prevent the escape of the solution to places where it likely would come into contact with the bare skin of the operator. We are dealing here with a concealed, not a patent, danger. Plaintiff did not know the hidden risk he was required to encounter, and we think the evidence supports the inference that defendant was negligent in two respects: First, in allowing the place to fall into such ill repair that it became nothing short of a man-trap; and, second, in not informing plaintiff of the lurking danger. The demurrer to the evidence which defendant argues should have been given was properly overruled.

With one exception, all the assignments of error are found to be without merit. The exception relates to the second instruction given at the request of plaintiff which is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if plaintiff was employed by defendant, plaintiff assumed as a part of his employment all the dangers necessarily incident to such employment, but that plaintiff did not assume any dangers arising from or caused by the carelessness and negligence of defendant." The version of the injury given in the evidence of plaintiff is contradicted in all essential particulars by the evidence of defendant, which tends strongly to show that, if plaintiff were injured by coming into contact with the caustic, it was in a way to bespeak either his own negligence or one of the natural risks of the employment, as the proximate cause. If the definition in the instruction of the risks assumed by plaintiff enlarged the scope of defendant's duty to plaintiff, its servant, the error must be deemed prejudicial, in view of the fact that the solution of the question of whether the injury was caused by defendant's negligence or by one of the risks incidental to the employment depended on the solution of sharply contested issues of fact. The master is not the insurer of the servant, nor is he required to exercise extraordinary care to guard his servant against risk of injury. His duty is to exercise reasonable or ordinary care. For risks that ordinarily and naturally belong to the service, the master is not liable. He must not increase those risks by his failure to observe the degree of care and solicitude for the protection of his servant that would characterize the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person in his situation, and, should his failure to perform this duty result in injury to his servant, the latter may recover the damages sustained, provided the servant himself be free from negligence contributing to the injury; but, if the injury to the servant result from one of the natural and ordinary hazards of the business, he has no cause of action against his master. Such hazards the servant assumes as incidents of his employment. Henry v. Railway, 109 Mo. 488, 19 S. W. 239; Musick v. Dold, 58 Mo. App. 322; Lucey v. Oil Co., 129 Mo. 32, 31 S. W. 340; Thompson v. Railway, 86 Mo. App. 141; Minnier v. Railway, 167 Mo. 99, 66 S. W. 1072.

The declaration in the instruction to the effect that plaintiff assumed only those dangers that were necessarily incident to the employment, and did not assume those caused by defendant's negligence, was equivalent to the assertion that dangers which might ordinarily and naturally but not necessarily belong to the service were dangers not assumed by the servant and, consequently, were among those which the care of the master should take into account and obviate. "Necessary" means inevitable, not to be avoided even by the exercise of the highest degree of care, and the corollary of the proposition of the instruction that only unavoidable risks are assumed by the servant is that the master must exercise the highest degree of care to furnish his servant a safe place in which to work. This is opposed to the well-settled rule of the substantive law.

For the error in giving this instruction, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 322*)—BREACH—ACTIONS.

Where, in an action for breach of a contract for the sale of a teaming outfit, including defendants' agreement to employ plaintiff to do their hauling for a year, no damages relating to the sale of the property were submitted, but only those applicable to the alleged breach of the employment contract, whether the teams belonged to defendants, prior to the sale, or to a third person for whom defendants acted, was not material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 322.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 280*) — CONSTRUCTION — BREACH.

Where defendants, as part of a contract for the sale of a teaming outfit, agreed to employ plaintiff to do all defendants' hauling at a guaranteed gross annual income of from $900 to $1,300, defendants were bound to furnish plaintiff the hauling for the stores for a year, and, having sold the stores to another within three months after the contract was made, did not perform by furnishing plaintiff such employment as they might have for him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 62*) — CONTRACT — BREACH — WAIVER—DUTY TO DIMINISH LOSS.

Defendants, the owners of certain country stores, having contracted with plaintiff to do all their hauling for a year, sold the stores to another, after which, for a short period, plaintiff did hauling for the buyer. Held, that plaintiff did not thereby waive his right to recover damages from defendant for breach of contract, being bound to do all he could to minimize his damages.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; Geo. W. Wanamaker, Judge.

Action by C. J. Smith against J. H. Carter & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. S. Cumming and J. M. Sallee, for appellants. J. C. Wilson and Garland Wilson, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. This suit was begun before a justice of the peace to recover damages, laid at $250, sustained from the breach by defendants of a contract between them and plaintiff. A trial to a jury in the circuit court, where the cause was appealed, resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $115. After ineffectually moving for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, defendants brought the case here by appeal.

Defendants were partners doing business as general merchants at Hatfield and Pawnee, small inland towns in Harrison county. Blythedale was the nearest railroad station to both towns, and defendant had freight for transportation by wagon between their stores and the railroad station, in the hauling of which four horses and two wagons were employed. This hauling cost them from $900 to $1,300 per year, at the rates paid. In April, 1906, defendants entered into an oral contract with plaintiff to sell him the property used in doing the hauling for $300. This property consisted of four horses, two wagons, two sets of harness, and a bobsled. Plaintiff executed and delivered to defendants his promissory notes for the purchase price, and afterwards paid the notes, with the exception of $15. Plaintiff asserts in his pleadings and proof that, as a part of the contract of sale, defendants employed him to do all their hauling at a stated rate for one year and guaranteed that his gross income therefrom would be from $900 to $1,300. Plaintiff did the hauling for three months and received therefor about $280. Defendants then sold their stores, and their successors in business gave their hauling to plaintiff a brief period and then made other arrangements.

The solution of the questions arising from the insistence of defendants that their demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained will sufficiently dispose of the case. Defendants contend that the property sold actually belonged, not to them, but to the man who had been doing their hauling. In the negotiations with plaintiff, they treated the property as their own, sold and transferred it to him, and accepted his notes made payable to their order in payment of the purchase price. In the instructions no damages relating to the sale of the property were submitted, and the only damages to which the attention of the jury was directed were those relating to the breach of the alleged contract of employment. With the issues thus restricted, the question of who owned the property is unimportant. It appears beyond dispute that defendants had an interest in the sale of the property, enough to constitute its purchase by plaintiff a sufficient consideration for their promise to employ him to do their hauling. We find substantial evidence to the effect that defendants, as a part of the transaction, promised to give plaintiff their hauling for one year, and, finding further that the promise was supported by a consideration, we pass to the question of whether the sale of their business by defendants and the almost immediate refusal of their vendee to continue the employment of plaintiff constituted a breach by them of the contract of employment.

Our construction of the contract, as stated by plaintiff, is that defendants' obligated themselves to give plaintiff all of their hauling for one year and guaranteed that his gross income therefrom would be not less than $900. Defendants argue that they did not bind themselves not to discontinue the business, and consequently that all they were required to do after they sold out was to continue to give plaintiff such employment as they might have for him. We do not adopt this narrow construction of the agreement. The true intent of the parties was that plaintiff should do the hauling for the stores during the period specified. That was the real inducement offered to him to purchase the teaming outfit, and, while defendants had the right to sell their business, they were bound, if they did sell it, to provide for the performance of their contract with plaintiff, and their omission to perform this obligation, whatever the cause, constituted a breach of the contract for which plaintiff would have a right of action for the damages sustained. The facts before us differ in essential particulars from those considered by the Supreme Court in Ferry Co. v. Railway, 128 Mo. 224, 27 S. W. 568, 30 S. W. 430, much relied on by defendants. We find nothing in that case at variance with the conclusion expressed.

We do not agree with defendants that plaintiff released them from the performance of the contract by accepting employment from their vendee. The evidence shows conclusively that plaintiff was not informed of the sale of the stores until after the sale was consummated, and that he continued to do the hauling for the stores at the request of defendants. He did not agree, and was not asked, to release defendants from the contract. After the breach it was his duty to do all he could to minimize his damages, but, as we have said, there was no breach until he was deprived of the hauling, and before the breach occurred his reliance on the assurance of defendants that the contract would be performed by their vendee should not be regarded as the expression on his part of an intention to waive his right to hold them to the performance of the contract.

We find no merit in the contention that the suit was prematurely brought. The demurrer to the evidence was properly overruled. The instructions to the jury are in harmony with the views expressed and declare the correct rule for measuring the damages, and the amount assessed as damages is warranted by the evidence.

There is no error in the record, and, accordingly, the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

BOWEN v. EPPERSON et al.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 243*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE.

Where the court had properly instructed that defendant could not be held liable as a partner unless his conduct led plaintiff to believe he was a partner, a subsequent instruction, submitting the theory of an actual partnership by virtue of a contract, was erroneous and confusing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Error in submitting the case upon the theory of an actual partnership, after properly instructing that defendant could only be held liable as a partner if his conduct had led plaintiff to believe he was such, was not cured by the fact that the first instruction given was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTIONS BY JUDGE AS TO FACTS.

In an action against defendants as partners for work done, where the court instructed that the relationship between defendants made them prima facie partners, but there was evidence tending to explain their relation and show that one of them was not a partner in fact, an instruction to find for plaintiff if either of defendants ordered the work done was erroneous, as directing a verdict for plaintiff on the ground that an actual partnership existed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 234*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a contract between appellant and the other defendants was admissible to show that he was not a partner of the others, it was error to instruct, in an action against defendants for work claimed to have been done for them as partners, that if plaintiff did not know of the existence of the written contract when he made the goods, it should not be considered by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 48*)—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against defendants for work claimed to have been done for them as partners, a contract between defendants, by which title to partnership property of the others was conveyed to one of them to secure advances he might make to enable them to perform a partnership contract, and to secure to him a certain sum out of the profits of such contract, was admissible to explain such defendant's connection with the others, and to show that he was not a partner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 34*)—RELATION—PARTNERSHIP BY ESTOPPEL.

Liability as a partner by a holding out as such to third persons, where no partnership in fact exists, is imposed on the theory that by his conduct persons dealing with the apparent partner were led to believe that a partnership existed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

7. PARTNERSHIP (§ 34*)—EVIDENCE—PROOF OF HOLDING OUT—ADMISSIBILITY.

Matters leading one to believe that a partnership existed must have occurred before such belief was formed and acted upon, in order to create a partnership liability by estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; J. H. Slover, Judge.

Action by C. K. Bowen against U. S. Epperson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ashley, Gilbert & Dunn, for appellant. L. E. Durham, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiff instituted this action against the three defendants as partners. His claim is based on an account for photographs alleged to have been taken by him and furnished to defendants at their request. He obtained judgment in the circuit court for $489, and defendant Epperson alone appealed.

Each of the defendants filed an answer denying the partnership under oath. Defendant Epperson admitted getting photographs of the value of $7, which sum he tendered, and for which he offered to permit judgment. The principal controversy here relates to the attempt to make out defendant Epperson's liability by reason of a partnership. It appears that defendants Winning and Rudd were associated together as partners, and that among other matters of partnership, was a contract which Rudd had made with the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Terminal Company, whereby they were to do a large amount of grading of certain lands in Rose-dale, Kan.; that they needed financial assistance to carry out their contract, and called upon Epperson to furnish it. The result was a written contract between them, of some length and detail, which was intended to secure Epperson in the advances he should make, by putting the title of the Winning & Rudd partnership property in him as a trustee, and further securing to him for such advances a bonus of $3,000 and a certain part of the profit which Winning & Rudd should make out of the contract. We need not set out the contract in full; suffice it to say the trial court rightly held that it did not constitute Epperson a partner, and the case was thus left, and could properly only be considered from the standpoint of a partnership as to third persons by estoppel.

Thus considered, it is apparent that it was not correctly submitted to the jury by the instructions. In the first place we have the court declaring to the jury, by defendant's instruction No. 4, that there was no partnership in fact with Epperson, thus, as just written, properly holding that the contract did not constitute him a partner, and that he could only be held liable by conduct such as to lead plaintiff to believe he was a partner. Yet plaintiff obtained an instruction (No. 1) submitting the case upon the ground of an actual partnership, thus in that way affirming that the contract itself was one of partnership. The instructions were confusing, and the fact that the one for defendant was right does not cure the error of plaintiff's. Wojtylak v. Coal Co., 188 Mo. 280, 87 S. W. 506; Baer v. Lisman, 85 Mo. App. 317. The latter instruction was furthermore erroneous in informing the jury that, under certain arrangements between defendants, "they were prima facie partners," and then on that basis proceeding to direct them, in absolute terms, to find for plaintiff if either of defendants ordered the photographs. To say that defendants were only prima facie partners is nothing more than to say they were partners, unless their relationship was explained; that is to say, they were partners if nothing more was shown. But the case was filled with explanatory evidence, and it was therefore highly prejudicial to base an absolute direction on a mere showing of one side of the controversy. The effect of the instruction could not have been less than to direct a verdict for plaintiff on the written contract.

There was also error in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 4, wherein the jury were told that, if plaintiff had no knowledge of the existence of the written contract when he did the work sued for, then it should not be considered by them in making a verdict. As explained by the trial court when it was introduced, the contract was made proper evidence for defendant by the course of the evidence as drawn out by plaintiff. It was proper evidence as tending to explain the connection which Epperson had with the other defendants, and as tending to show that his connection and association with them was for other purposes than partnership. Scholtz v. Freund, 128 Mich. 72, 87 N. W. 130.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Defendant asked, and was refused, an instruction (No. 7) in which it was declared that any holding out by defendant Epperson as a partner must have been known to plaintiff, and relied upon by him before contracting the pictures sued for, and that knowledge obtained after that could not affect the case. The theory of holding one's self out as a partner when in point of fact he is not as between himself and those charged to be his copartners is that he has, by conduct, led persons dealing with the supposed partners into the belief that a partnership existed. Matters leading to this belief must, of course, have transpired before the belief became fixed in the creditor's mind. The instruction should have been given. Rimel v. Hays, 83 Mo. 200; Gamble v. Grether, 108 Mo. App. loc. cit. 343, 83 S. W. 306. We have been cited by plaintiff to the cases of Dale & Bennett v. Mining Co., 110 Mo. App. 317, 85 S. W. 929, and Tamblyn v. Scott, 111 Mo. App. 49, 85 S. W. 918, but we do not see where they apply to the case at bar. Defendant has suggested that there was no evidence whatever of a partnership. This excludes any reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence. After consideration we feel we would not be justified in so ruling. The case, if tried again, should be on the question whether defendant, by a course of conduct before the contract, led plaintiff to believe he was a partner.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded. All concur.

JOHNSON v. DAILY.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 43*)—CIVIL ACTION—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

There is not such conflict between instructions as to mislead the jury; one given for plaintiff declaring that if defendant willfully beat him he can recover unless he first attacked defendant, and such attack was resisted with no more force than necessary, and the other given for defendant being in keeping with his defense that, though he may have assaulted plaintiff, he had a right to make such assault if the appearances justified him in judging from plaintiff's actions that plaintiff was about to inflict great bodily harm on him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

2. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 26*)—JUSTIFICATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff having shown an assault on him, it is presumed to have been unlawful, and defendant has the burden of justifying it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 38*)—DAMAGES.

As part of the damages for assault and battery plaintiff may recover for any humiliation and disgrace shown by the evidence to have been suffered by him because thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

4. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 13*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE—PROVOKING DIFFICULTY.

Reasonable inferences to be drawn from the evidence justifying it, an instruction submitting the hypothesis of defendant having brought on and provoked the difficulty, in which case defendant could not rely on self-defense, is properly given in an action for assault and battery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION.

One may not complain of refusal of an instruction substantially embodied in another given.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; G. W. Wanamaker, Judge.

J. M. Sallee and S. P. Davisson, for appellant. Barlow & Barlow, J. C. Wilson, and W. H. Leazenby, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This is an action for assault and battery in which plaintiff obtained judgment in the trial court. The evidence showed much ill feeling between the parties had existed for a considerable period. They were relatives and neighbors residing in the country in Harrison county. Finally they met in the public road. Defendant in his buggy passed plaintiff who was walking in the road. The buggy wheel brushed against plaintiff and thus started a fight between them, resulting in defendant committing the assault with a hammer. Who was the aggressor was a matter of dispute between the parties. As to whether there was any occasion for self-defense on defendant's part was likewise a matter of dispute. Indeed, such was the state of contradictory evidence in the cause, we need not go into any detailed statement of it, since it was all submitted to the jury, who found in plaintiff's favor, and since we must abide by that finding it is only cumbering the record to set forth what the evidence was upon which the jury acted.

We will therefore address ourselves to the criticism made of the instructions. One was given for plaintiff wherein it was declared that, if defendant violently and willfully beat and wounded the plaintiff, then the verdict should be for him unless plaintiff first made an attack on defendant and that he resisted such attack by using no more force to repel it than was necessary. Defendant claims that instruction to be in conflict with No. 2 given at his request, wherein the jury were told that if they believed the defendant apprehended that plaintiff was about to do him some great bodily harm, and that there was reasonable cause for believing the danger was imminent, and that such danger was about to fall upon him, then he had a right to act on appearances and to use such force as seemed necessary to avoid the danger, and he was not required to nicely gauge the amount of force necessary to repel the assault. The first of these directs in plaintiff's behalf that, if defendant assaulted and beat plaintiff, then the finding should be for him, unless it appeared from the evidence that plaintiff first attacked him and he resisted with no more force than was necessary. Speaking in general terms, the second directs in defendant's behalf, and in keeping with his defense, that though he may have assaulted plaintiff, yet he had a right to make such assault if the appearances justified him in judging from plaintiff's actions that plaintiff was about to inflict great bodily harm upon him. We do not see any such conflict between them, when read together, as would justify us in saying that they would mislead or confuse the jury.

Instruction No. 2, given for plaintiff, is said to be erroneous in that it states that defendant admits striking the plaintiff. In our opinion the evidence justified the instruction. In view of defendant's statements in his testimony in his own behalf it would be idle to deny that he conceded or admitted striking the plaintiff.

It is insisted that the instruction put the burden of proof on the defendant. The rule is that, while the plaintiff has the burden of making out his case of assault upon himself, yet, when he shows the assault, it is presumed to be unlawful, and he is not required to go further and prove that it was not made in defense of the person of his assailant. That is an excuse or justification for the assault which must be proved by the party who offers it. In Orscheln v. Scott, 90 Mo. App. 352, we reviewed the decisions of the Supreme Court, as well as other authorities on this question, and need do no more than refer to that case.

Objection is urged against the propriety of instructions Nos. 3 and 5, given for the plaintiff. The latter permitted as a part of the measure of damages humiliation and disgrace if suffered by plaintiff by reason of the assault. The evidence justified the instruction, and the objection is not well taken. The former submitted the hypothesis of defendant bringing on and provoking the difficulty, in which case he could not invoke the right of self-defense to shield himself from the consequence of his own wrong. The entire evidence considered, and reasonable inferences to be drawn from much of it, abundantly justified the instruction. It is true, as said in State v. Walker, 196 Mo. 78, 93 S. W. 384, "it is error for the trial court to frit away the right of self-defense by inviting the jury to enter the field of conjecture"; but the record here does not present such a case.

There is no just ground to complain of the refusal of defendant's instruction No. 7. It was substantially embodied in No. 2, given for him.

Finally, there is a statement in a very general way that "the court erred in admitting incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and illegal evidence on the part of the plaintiff over the objection of defendant, and in rejecting material, competent, and legal evidence offered on the part of the defendant." There is then set out near five pages of evidence. Much of this related to some difficulty between the parties several years prior to this. Some of it tended to inquire into the merits of ill feeling between one or more witnesses and one of the parties. Some of the objections were extremely technical. It may, however, be safely said that no ruling in the particulars objected to materially affected defendant's rights; nor do we see that they were in any way prejudicial to the merits of the controversy. Especially is this true in view of the reasons given by the court accompanying several of the rulings made.

We do not feel that we would be justified in condemning the verdict as being excessive. The jury believing the case to exist as presented by the evidence in plaintiff's behalf, we cannot say that the amount of the verdict will allow its being declared to be the result of passion and prejudice.

A careful examination of the entire record has failed to disclose any substantial error materially affecting the merits of the case, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed. All concur.

PAYTON v. PEOPLE'S CREDIT CLOTHING CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—LIABILITY OF CORPORATION—SCOPE OF AGENT'S EMPLOYMENT.

That the slander of plaintiff, uttered by the agent of defendant, a foreign corporation, was an act within the general scope of the agent's employment, making defendant liable therefor, and not merely the result of his own malice, may be inferred from the facts that the agent was the general manager of plaintiff's business in the state, and that the words were spoken while plaintiff was before him, on the question of his having paid a bill which he had owed defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; James H. Slover, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Payton against the People's Credit Clothing Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Lucas, for appellant. Cliff Langsdale and John M. Cleary, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Action against a corporation for slander. Actual and punitive damages were asked in the petition, but the verdict and judgment recovered by plaintiff were for actual damages only. Defendant appealed.

Defendant is an Ohio corporation engaged in the business of selling ready made clothing on the installment plan in various cities of the United States. One of its stores is in Kansas City. Plaintiff, a grocery clerk in Kansas City, bought some clothing of defendant on credit, and afterwards paid for it in full. Some time after the last payment was made, a collector of defendant presented a bill for the clothing to plaintiff, and demanded payment. Plaintiff stated he had paid the bill to another collector and held a receipt in full, whereupon the collector requested him to call at the store, and exhibit his receipt to the manager. Accompanied by a friend, plaintiff went to the store, asked for the manager, and was referred to the witness McCoy, who was the manager in charge of defendant's business in Kansas City. Plaintiff testified: "I told him my name was Payton, and that his collector had been up for the bill which I had paid. He asked if I had a receipt, and I told him 'Yes.' He said, 'Let's see it.' I took the receipt out of my pocket, and held it in my hand like this [witness holds up his hand as high as his shoulder]. He said, 'Give it to me.' I said, 'I don't care to give it, but you can see it,' and he stepped up to me and tore the receipt out of my hands. He grabbed it and said: 'Give me that receipt. Just because you are a dirty thief and crook you needn't think we are.' I said, 'You call me a dirty thief and crook, do you?' and he said, 'Yes, I do, and I can prove it in more ways than one.' I asked him to give my receipt back, and he said, 'No,' and would not give it back. Went out for an officer, but could not find one, so when I returned McCoy was gone, and there was a gentleman in the cage there that handed me a duplicate receipt. I took it. There was nothing else to do." Persons who were present and in position to hear the slanderous words were plaintiff's friend, a woman clerk of defendant, and the manager of defendant's store at Louisville, Ky., who was also a traveling auditor for defendant, and was in the office checking up McCoy's accounts. It appears from the evidence of plaintiff that the outburst of Mc-Coy was unprovoked, and that plaintiff throughout the affair conducted himself with extreme moderation. This version of the occurrence is contradicted by the witnesses for defendant, who say that plaintiff was abusive from the start, and, in effect, charged McCoy with having embezzled the money paid by him on the account. The traveling auditor, introduced as a witness by defendant, testified that McCoy, provoked by the abuse of plaintiff, did snatch the receipt out of plaintiff's hand, and say, "Because you are a dirty thief, you needn't think we are." On the issue of the scope of McCoy's duties as local manager a former employé of defendant, called as a witness by plaintiff, testified: "He was manager of the business. * * * He had full charge and control of the concern. I took no orders from any one except Mr. McCoy. * * * Mr. McCoy had charge of the collections. He had full charge of everything. The collectors reported to him, and turned over what money they had collected to him." The witness described the traveling auditor as "a sort of overseer to examine McCoy's books, but he never gave any orders."

Counsel for defendant argue that "defendant's demurrer at the close of plaintiff's case should have been sustained because it clearly appeared from the evidence that defendant's agent, in uttering the words alleged to have been uttered, was acting wholly outside the scope of his employment, and the malice, if any, was his"—citing Milton v. Railway, 193 Mo. 46, 91 S. W. 949, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282; Gaslight Co. v. Lansden, 172 U. S. 534, 19 Sup. Ct. 296, 43 L. Ed. 543; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Taylor, 150 Ala. 574, 43 South. 210, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 929, 124 Am. St. Rep. 90. Reliance is placed by defendant on the remark, by way of illustration, in Milton v. Railway, supra, that: "The employment of an agent to present a claim and demand payment thereof from the debtor to his principal does not include within its scope the right to arrest or assault the debtor if he refuses to pay. Such an employment contemplates only lawful and peaceable acts; and, when an agent so clothed with authority commits a trespass upon the debtor, he acts wholly outside the scope of his employment." We give willing assent to the doctrine thus expressed; and, were this a case where the slanderous words had been uttered by the collector sent out by McCoy to collect the account, we would say that an action against defendant could not be sustained by mere proof of the facts that the collector was an agent and uttered the slander. The inference that the wrongful act was authorized by the defendant could not be drawn from these facts alone. But if the plaintiff in the supposititious case under consideration proved, in addition to the facts we have stated, that the collector had been directed by Mc-

Coy, the manager, to call plaintiff a thief if he did not pay the account, we think no one would have the hardihood to argue that authority from the corporation to utter the slander could not be inferred from such fact, and that the court should hold, as a matter of law, the act of the agent to be without the scope of his authority.

That a corporation may be held responsible for a slander uttered by an officer or agent within the scope of his employment is no longer a debatable question. It has been said that to hold the corporation liable, the tortious act of the agent, not only must have a direct relation to the performance of some duty pertaining to his employment, but also must have the express or implied sanction of the corporation, or afterwards be ratified by the corporation. But where, as in the case in hand, no express authority is shown, the issue of whether authority to commit the wrong should be implied becomes one of fact for the jury, where the facts and circumstances in proof would induce a reasonable person to infer that the act was within the general powers conferred on the agent. The rule thus is pertinently stated in Gaslight Co. v. Lansden, supra: "If different inferences might fairly be drawn from the evidence by reasonable men, then the jury should be permitted to choose for themselves. But if only one inference should be drawn from the evidence, and that is a want of authority, then the question is a legal one for the court to decide. We do not mean that in order to render the company liable there must be some evidence of authority, express or implied, given to the manager to publish, or to authorize the publishing of, a libel, but there must be some evidence from which an authority might be implied on the part of the manager to represent the company, as within the general scope of his employment, in regard to the subject-matter of the correspondence between Brown and himself." McCoy's duties, being those of general manager of the business conducted in this state by a foreign corporation, embraced the widest scope. He was the corporation here, its alter ego, and was acting within the performance of one of the duties of his position—that of the collection and adjustment of accounts—when he spoke the slanderous words. Clearly, we think, a reasonable man might, and would, infer that what he did was in line with the policy and practice of the corporation he was employed to represent; in other words, that his act was within the general scope of his employment as manager, and was not merely the result of his own malice. The court committed no error in overruling the demurrer to the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1094*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—RECORD.

Where the record contains neither statement of facts nor bill of exceptions, the judgment will be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3204; Dec. Dig. § 1094.*]

Appeal from District Court, Bell County; John M. Furman, Judge.

Frank Miller was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of robbery, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The record contains neither statement of facts nor bill of exceptions. This leaves the record before us without anything for consideration.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

GAY v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

WEAPONS (§ 17*)—CARRYING WEAPONS.

Evidence held not sufficient to sustain a conviction of unlawfully carrying a pistol.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Appeal from McLennan County Court; J. W. Baker, Judge.

Babe Gay was convicted of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Geo. N. Denton, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. This is an appeal from a conviction had in the county court of McLennan county, Tex., on a charge of unlawfully carrying a pistol.

The testimony of the state consists in the evidence of one witness, to wit, Rivers Torrence, who testified as follows: "I live in McLennan county, Tex., near the town of Elk; have lived there more than 20 years. I know the defendant, Babe Gay; knew him about 2 years before this offense is alleged to have occurred. I knew him in the fall or winter of 1906. Some time in November of that year I was at Axtel. It was Sunday night, about 9 or 10 o'clock, after church. There was quite a crowd, and some were horseback. I was horseback, and the defendant was horseback. The night was very dark. It was misting rain and pretty cold. You could not see your hand before you. Just as I was getting on my horse, or had gotten on my horse, I heard some one say, 'Look out! I am going to shoot.' I said, 'Don't do it,' and about that time a pistol fired, and I could hear the sound of horses' feet running. A second shot was fired about the time they crossed the railroad. There were several on horses that night, at the time I heard the shot fired, besides the defendant. I only knew two of them, besides the defendant. Their names are Johnie Moore and F. A. Morrow. These men were on horseback, and there were several others on horseback I did not know in the dark. They were all in the road at the time the shot was fired, and were running their horses. I was just getting on my horse. The defendant was just to my right when I was getting on my horse. It was so dark I could not recognize any one. I did not see a pistol in the hands of the defendant, or any one else. It was too dark. I could not tell which of the men on horses fired the shot. I know Babe Gay's voice. I think it was the voice of Babe Gay who said, 'Look out! I am going to shoot.'"

On cross-examination the witness said: "It was a very dark night, and was misting rain. You could not recognize any one, it was so dark. There were a number of men in the road at or near where the defendant was, and near where I heard the voice. They began running their horses about the time I heard the shot, and ran across the railroad, and about the time they crossed the railroad I heard another shot fired. I knew the names of two of the parties in the crowd on horseback. They were Johnie Moore and F. A. Morrow. I cannot be certain that the voice I heard was the voice of Babe Gay. It could have been the voice of either of the two men I knew in the crowd, or the voice of some of the others in the crowd, who I did not know. I never saw a pistol in the hands of the defendant that night, and did not see the handle, barrel, or cylinder of the pistol. I will not swear that the defendant fired that shot, and I will not swear that the voice I heard was the voice of the defendant. I rode with the defendant that night after the shots were fired. I did not see a pistol on him, and he did not tell me that he was the one who fired the shot. I rode with him about a mile after we left Axtel. We discussed the matter of the firing of the shot. The defendant never admitted that he was guilty of having the pistol. I did not say that Gabe Pillot, the deputy sheriff, would about accuse me of having that pistol; but I did not have a pistol that night, and I did not do the shooting. Afterwards I was accused of having the pistol; but I have never been arrested for it. We did ride fast that night after we left Axtel. It was cold and rainy, and I did not have my overcoat. I had known Babe Gay only a short time before this occurrence. This all occurred in McLennan county, Tex., some time in November, 1906. I do not know the exact date."

Appellant in his own behalf took the stand and denied that he had a pistol on the occasion named or had fired it off. Appellant's counsel insist that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction, and we believe, in the light of the entire record, that this contention must be sustained. It is possible, of course, that the appellant in this case is guilty; but we do not believe, on full reflection, that we would be justified in sustaining this conviction and establishing the precedent of sustaining a conviction on such inconclusive and vague testimony.

For the reason that the evidence is, in our judgment, insufficient, the judgment of conviction is reversed, and the cause remanded.

POTTS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. March 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 14, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 784*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—DUTY TO CHARGE.

Where, in a homicide case, accused admitted doing the shooting and decedent stated positively in a dying declaration that accused shot him, it was unnecessary to charge on circumstantial evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1883; Dec. Dig. § 784.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTION—EFFECT OF FAILURE TO EXCEPT.

Error assigned in the motion for a new trial in refusing to grant a continuance cannot be considered on a criminal appeal, where the record contains no bill of exceptions preserving the point.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2812; Dec. Dig. § 1090.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 308*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a murder prosecution, evidence held not to raise the issue of murder in the first degree so as to require a charge thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT.

Where accused was acquitted of murder in the first degree, he cannot complain of error in submitting that issue or of errors committed in connection with its submission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 23*)—MURDER—SECOND DEGREE.

If accused did not shoot decedent in self-defense, and there was no provocation to reduce the killing to manslaughter, and the evidence did not make out murder in the first degree, the killing was murder in the second degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 85, 89, 40; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 13*)—MALICE—IMPLIED MALICE.

The law implies malice from the unlawful killing, where there is nothing to reduce the homicide to manslaughter or to some lesser degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 18; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 43*)—MANSLAUGHTER—PROVOCATION—NECESSITY.

Every killing upon a rash and inconsiderate impulse is not manslaughter; an adequate cause rendering the mind incapable of cool reflection being essential to reduce an unlawful killing to manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MANSLAUGHTER—NECESSITY OF INSTRUCTION.

The court was not required to instruct upon manslaughter where that issue was not raised by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 652; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

9. HOMICIDE (§ 301*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFENSE OF ANOTHER—NECESSITY.

Where, in a murder prosecution, a witness testified that accused told him shortly after the killing that he fired two of the four or five shots, one of which killed decedent, because he thought another was assaulting the witness, an instruction upon the issue of homicide in another's defense was necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 633; Dec. Dig. § 301.*]

10. HOMICIDE (§ 301*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFENSE OF ANOTHER—SUFFICIENCY.

In a murder prosecution, a witness testified that accused told him shortly after the killing that he fired two of the four or five shots, one of which killed decedent, because he thought another was assaulting the witness, and the court charged that homicide is justifiable when done to protect another from death or serious bodily injury if it reasonably appeared to be necessary, and the jury should determine whether such other was in present danger of death or great bodily harm and the killing was necessary to protect him, and, if a third person was accidentally killed in an effort to protect the person threatened, the killing would be justifiable, so that if another made a violent assault upon a third person from which it reasonably appeared to accused that such third person was in danger of death or a serious bodily injury, and he shot at the assailant but killed decedent, the killing was justifiable. Held, that the charge correctly and sufficiently submitted the issue of homicide in another's defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 301.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 864*)—EVIDENCE—DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE—FATAL IMPLEMENTS.

The evidence tended to show that the fatal bullets would not have fitted the gun of another whom the other evidence also tended to implicate, but did fit accused's gun and could be used in it, and the bullets had been admitted in evidence at the trial, but, inadvertently, had not been inspected by the jury, and, upon the jury's request after they had retired that the bullets be sent to them for inspection, the trial court recalled the jury and permitted them to examine the bullets in the presence of accused and his counsel. Held, that the trial court's action was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 864.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 361*)—EVIDENCE—EXPLANATORY MATTERS.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 791, providing that, when a part of an act, declaration, or conversation is given in evidence by one party, the whole of the subject may be inquired into by the other, and, when a detailed act, declaration, conversation, etc., is given in evidence, any other act or declaration necessary to explain it is admissible, while the explanatory act, etc., and that to be explained, need not have occurred at the same time, yet where the explanatory matter is not a part of the conversation, etc., already inquired into, it must be a statement, etc., which is necessary to explain the acts or statements introduced by the other party in order to be admissible.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 802-808; Dec. Dig. § 861.*]

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 956*)—NEW TRIAL—PROCEEDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On motion for new trial in a homicide case, on the ground that a juror had stated in the jury room that accused was guilty, and the jury would know so if they knew him as well as the speaker, affidavits held to sustain a finding that the juror did not make the alleged improper statements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1158*)—APPEALS—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The appellate court will not disturb the trial court's findings upon evidence relative to the misconduct of a juror in the jury room, unless his decision is clearly wrong.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3071; Dec. Dig. § 1158.*]

15. HOMICIDE (§ 254*)—MURDER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—SECOND DEGREE MURDER.

Evidence in a murder case, in view of the trial court's refusal to grant a new trial, held to sustain a verdict of murder in the second degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

Appeal from District Court, Grayson County; B. L. Jones, Judge.

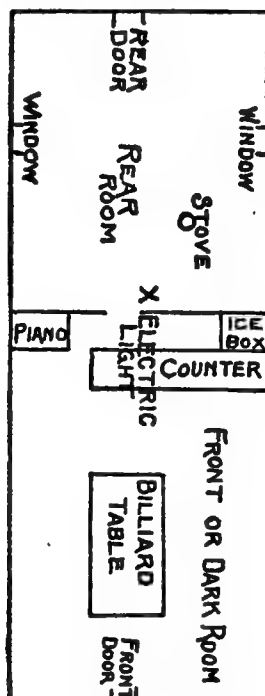

Fred Potts was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. L. Cobb, Cecil H. Smith, and Jno. C. Wall, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Grayson county on a charge of murder. On May 14, 1908, he was found guilty by the jury of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of 10 years. He promptly filed a motion for a new trial, which contains many grounds, and has duly prosecuted his appeal to this court.

The facts of the case are involved in much doubt and obscurity; and, while we cannot say that the evidence is so inconclusive as would justify us in reversing the case for lack of testimony to support the verdict, it must be confessed that it is more or less fragmentary and far from satisfactory. The testimony in brief shows that on the night of January 13, 1908, in a house occupied by appellant and one Mose Williams, which was used as a poolroom, about 11 o'clock at night a young negro named Bertram Dudley was killed. Soon thereafter both appellant and one Ed Pitts were indicted. The house where this killing occurred was situated not far from the depot of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad Company, and fronting east. In the front room of this house there was a pool table, and in the rear room soda water and other drinks were sold, and in this rear room was also situated a stove. The following is a fairly correct diagram of the house:

BRANCH STREET

There was a door in the front of the house, one in the west or rear end, and a partition door in the center between the two rooms. On the night of the killing, deceased, who was a young fellow some 18 or 19 years of age, with a number of other negroes, were in the back room. The evidence shows that Ed Pitts had come to the place early in the evening, and was generally troublesome, and apparently seeking a difficulty with some one, and apparently not caring with whom. At first appellant interfered as a peacemaker, and sought to control him. After some noisy and quarrelsome talk, Pitts left the place and came back soon thereafter with a Winchester

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes rifle and pistol. Some time after his return, he came into the back room of the building in question, where deceased was near the stove. There was a stick leaning up against the wall near the stove and near where deceased was. Pitts asked him who put that stick there, to which Dudley replied that Fred Potts had put it there. In the meantime, or about this time, the deceased put his hand on the counter standing near by, when Pitts made a stab at his hand with a knife, and some remark was made about his being liable to cut deceased, when Pitts without provocation grabbed up the stick and struck Dudley a violent blow, whereupon Dudley ran to the partition door into the front room, known as the "poolroom." The evidence showed that some few minutes before this defendant had gone into this room and had put out the light there. Just how long he had been out of the west room before the difficulty between deceased and Pitts occurred the evidence does not disclose, nor does the testimony disclose just what he had been doing in the meantime. That he was in the room, if the testimony is to be believed, is certain from the fact, soon after the shooting, which occurred almost immediately after deceased rushed into the front room, he opened the front door. There were probably some four or five shots fired. The evidence makes it pretty certain that the second shot which was fired was the shot that killed Dudley. The evidence tends to show that appellant could not have fired more than two of these shots. Williams, the principal witness against him, testified that there were four cartridges in the pistol when Potts got it, and that two of these yet remained in the pistol after the difficulty. There was no ill will or misunderstanding of any kind shown between deceased and appellant, nor does the evidence suggest any motive for the killing on appellant's part. Deceased was shot in front. He made a dying declaration to his mother, to the direct effect that Fred Potts had shot him, though soon after the shooting he made a statement to other persons that Ed Pitts had shot him. But, however, in respect to one of these statements, when Pitts protested he had not shot him, he said: "Well, you know Fred Potts shot me." Mose Williams testified that, soon after the shooting, Potts stated to him that he had fired two of the shots, though he qualified this statement by the explanation that, when he fired, he thought that Pitts was about to do some injury to him,—Williams. The evidence shows as stated above that, when Pitts and deceased ran out of the rear room, Pitts was behind and deceased in front. It is difficult to understand how, since deceased was shot in front, such wound could have been made from the pistol of Ed Pitts. His explanation that, when he fired the shot, he thought Pitts was about to do Williams some injury, seems improbable, since Williams had turned Pitts loose some time before any shot was fired. This is probably as strong a statement of the incriminating facts as the proof from any point of view would justify, and is made so that the subsequent discussion of the legal questions may be more readily apprehended. There are a number of questions raised in the record, some of which we will not undertake to discuss. They have all been carefully investigated, and neither the novelty, difficulty, nor importance of them are such as we think require discussion.

1. It is urgently insisted that the court erred in not charging the law of circumstantial evidence. On this question appellant tendered a proper charge, if such instruction was demanded by the facts. Appellant relies largely on the case of Trejo v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 127, 74 S. W. 548. That case is in some respects not unlike the case at bar, but there is this difference: There was in the Trejo case, supra, no unequivocal admission by appellant that he had shot the deceased. The remark testified to in the case was: "Hist, Celestina, be careful not to say that I did it." The court, as will be apparent from an inspection of the opinion, held that this was not of necessity an unequivocal admission that Trejo had fired the fatal shot, but was consistent perhaps with an appeal or exhortation of Trejo not to go beyond the truth or from enmity or ill will ascribe the killing to him. The court says, in order to justify the trial court in not charging upon this phase of the law, it must be taken as certain, first, that the witness Aguilar testified truthfully; and growing out of that, secondly, that appellant was at the window as testified by her; and, thirdly, that his remark to her was a confession of the killing. We think it is the rule beyond doubt that where, as in this case, there was unequivocal admission of the shooting, that a charge on circumstantial evidence is not required. In addition to this confession, the dying declaration of deceased, as testified to by his mother, was, among other things, as follows: "In that conversation he said he knew he could not live. I asked him who killed him, and he said Ed Pitts hit him across the head with a stick and Fred Potts shot him." This statement assumes positive knowledge, and is only to be understood as a direct and positive assertion of fact within the knowledge of the deceased. We think, in view of the above testimony, the court was not required to give a charge on circumstantial evidence.

2. That ground of the motion for a new trial complaining that the court erred in refusing to grant a continuance cannot, of course, be considered, because there is no bill of exceptions in the record saving the point.

3. Serious complaint is made that the court erred in charging on the law and submitting the issue of murder in the first degree. We do not believe that murder in the first degree was raised by the evidence. Appellant, however, was acquitted of this grade of homicide. It is well settled by such an unbroken line of authorities as require no citation that, where on a charge for murder appellant was acquitted of murder in the first degree, he cannot complain either of the fact that such degree of murder was submitted or of errors in respect thereto. This is the settled law of this state.

4. Again, appellant makes vigorous complaint of the action of the court in charging on murder in the second degree on the ground that this grade of homicide was not raised in the evidence. To this conclusion we cannot agree. If, in fact, Fred Potts shot young Dudley, and the killing was not in self-defense, we cannot see how under the evidence in this case it could be anything less than murder in the second degree. The law implies malice from the fact of an unlawful killing in the absence of proof of express malice, and where there is nothing in the evidence to reduce the grade of homicide to manslaughter or some lesser degree. It is not the law, as we have frequently held, that every killing done from a rash and inconsiderate impulse is manslaughter, but, to reduce an unlawful killing to the grade of manslaughter, adequate cause must always exist which renders the mind incapable of cool reflection. There is no suggestion in this case of adequate cause.

5. If we are correct in the conclusion announced in the preceding paragraph, it would follow that manslaughter was not in the case, and that the court was not required under the facts of the case to charge on manslaughter at all. If, however, it should be conceded that manslaughter was in the case, then an examination of the charge on this issue convinces us that it is practically beyond just criticism.

6. Some complaint is made of the charge of the court in submitting the issue of the right of defendant to kill in defense of another. We think this issue was distinctly raised in the evidence. There was no pretense in the testimony that appellant shot in his own self-defense. The substance of the testimony of Williams is that Potts told him that he had fired two shots, but that he thought that Ed Pitts was assaulting him—Williams. On this question the court charged the jury as follows: "Homicide is justifiable when done by one person to protect another person from death or serious bodily injury, but such killing must reasonably appear, viewed from the standpoint of the person doing the killing, to have been necessary in order to resist an assault apparently violent and imminent towards the person about to be injured. Upon this issue the questions for the jury to determine from the facts and circumstances in evidence are: Was the one in whose behalf the slayer acted in present danger of great bodily harm at the time of the killing? Was the homicide committed in a bona fide effort to preserve the person thus threatened from impending danger? One person may act in defense of another person to the extent of taking life, not only when such person's life may be seriously threatened, but he may so do when the infliction of a serious bodily injury is threatened and the danger is imminent and pressing. If a person under such necessity shoots to protect one in such danger, and by accident kills still another person who was not making the assault against the party whom he interferes to protect, a killing under such circumstances would be justifiable. If, therefore, you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did shoot and thereby kill deceased, but you further believe from the evidence that at the time of the killing it reasonably appeared to defendant, viewed from his standpoint alone, one Ed Pitts was making a violent assault upon Mose Williams, from which assault, if any, it reasonably appeared to this defendant that the said Mose Williams was in danger of death or of suffering serious bodily injury at the hands of the said Ed Pitts, and you further believe from the evidence that under such conditions this defendant shot at Ed Pitts and thereby killed deceased, Bertram Dudley, then such killing would be justifiable, and, if you so believe, or have a reasonable doubt thereof, you will acquit the defendant and say by your verdict not guilty." This was a correct and sufficient submission of this issue, and failure of the court to submit this issue would, as we believe, under the testimony, have been reversible error.

7. After the jury had retired and while deliberating in respect to their verdict, through their foreman they made of the court in writing the following request: "Please send us the bullet that was taken from the body of Bertram Dudley; also the one cut from the 32-caliber cartridge." On receipt of this communication, the bill recites, the court refused to send the bullet into the jury room, but had the jury brought into the courtroom and permitted those of the jury who wished to examine said two bullets. Before this was done, the defendant objected both to the bullets being sent into the jury room, and also to the jury examining the bullets in the presence of the court, on the ground that the same was immaterial, irrelevant, prejudicial to the defendant's rights, and that the jurors thereby might form conclusions of their own not warranted by any evidence in the case; but the court overruled said objections, and permitted the jurors to examine the bullets in the manner above stated. In this connection it should be remarked that much importance was attached by the state to the kind of bullet and size of the bullet found in and taken from the body of the deceased. The evidence tended to show that the kind of bullet which killed deceased would not have fitted and could not have been fired from the arms which Pitts had, but would have fitted and was the same character of bullet found in and which could be fired from appellant's pistol. Indeed, this was one of the strong inculpatory facts. In approving this bill the court further states that the two bullets in question had been admitted in evidence during the trial, but through inadvertence of the county attorney had not been handed the jury for inspection, and, when the above written request from the jury came to the court, the court had the jury seated in the box, and in the presence of defendant and his counsel permitted the jury to inspect the bullets as detailed above. Then the jury was sent back to their room, but were not permitted to take the bullets with them. We not only feel and find that there is no error in these proceedings, but think the court should be commended for the careful safeguarding of the rights of the accused. The course pursued by him in having the jury examine these bullets in his presence was a more certain safeguard to the rights of appellant than if they had been sent to them in their room. By this course every possibility of mistake or any exchange of the bullets was safely guarded.

8. Objection was made on the trial to the action of the court in permitting the witness Williams to testify over appellant's objection as to the character of the building in which deceased was shot; that is, the purpose for which it was used. The question propounded to him was as follows: "What kind of a business did you and the defendant run?" The answer was: "It was a pool hall." The objection to the question and answer was that the same was immaterial, irrelevant, did not tend to prove any issue in the case, but tended only to prejudice the rights of the defendant. As stated by the court in his explanation of the bill, the full answer of the witness was: "It was a pool hall. I mean by that we had pool tables." While perhaps it was unnecessary to produce this evidence, we can readily understand how natural it was to do so by way of accounting for the presence of the deceased there as well as for the purpose of showing the relation and connection between the witness and appellant. It seems they were partners in the business, and had been for some time.

9. A more serious question is presented by appellant in respect to his effort to put in evidence some conversation between Williams and himself. The bill evidencing this matter recites substantially that after the witness Mose Williams had been recalled by the state, and on cross-examination had testified that he saw Fred Potts immediately after the shooting occurred, and went with him to the Dupree house, where the deceased had been carried, the following question was propounded to him by appellant's counsel: "I will ask you if Fred [meaning the defendant] did not tell you then and there that, when the shooting began, he was talking to Beatrice Peavy at the front door?" To this question the state objected on the ground that same was irrelevant, immaterial, hearsay, and self-serving. If the witness had been permitted to answer, he would have said in response to said question, "Yes." The testimony, if permitted, would have been favorable to the appellant. In allowing this bill the court makes the following explanation: "This witness Mose Williams in examination by the state had testified that immediately after the shooting in the room where the deceased was killed he saw Fred Potts and the deceased together, and that witness asked Fred Potts, the defendant, for the pistol; that the defendant then told witness he had fired some shots; that defendant gave witness the pistol, and that the defendant then left the place of the shooting; that witness then took deceased to a neighbor's house, and came back to the place of the shooting, and examined the pistol and found that it had been fired two times. After this he met defendant on Mulberry street, when the conversation occurred that was asked about in this bill of exception; that it was five or ten minutes after the shooting, and was not a part of any conversation asked about by the state. The state objected to it because it was immaterial and irrelevant, self-serving, no part of the res gestae, and no part of any conversation introduced by the state, which objections were sustained." We had occasion to discuss at some length a question quite like this in the recent case of Pratt v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 281, 109 S. W. 138. Article 791 of our Code of Criminal Procedure of 1895 is as follows: "When part of an act, declaration or conversation or writing is given in evidence by one party, the whole on the same subject may be inquired into by the other, as when a letter is read, all other letters on the same subject between the same parties may be given. And when a detailed act, declaration, conversation or writing is given in evidence, any other act, declaration or writing which is necessary to make it fully understood or to explain the same may also be given in evidence." In the case of Greene v. State, 17 Tex. App. 395, it is stated that this article expands the common-law rule with reference to such evidence; that at common law, when a confession or admission is introduced in evidence against a party, such party is entitled to prove the whole of what is said on the subject at the time of making such confession or admission. The article above referred to, however, does not restrict the explanatory act, declaration, conversation, or writing to the time when the act, declaration, conversation, or writing sought to be explained occurred; but extends the rule so as to render such acts or statements admissible, if necessary to a full understanding or to explain the acts or statements introduced in evidence by the adverse party, although the same may have transpired at a different time, and at a time so remote even as not to be admissible as res gestæ. We think the test in all cases where the matter sought to be proved is not a part of the conversation already inquired about is that it must be some statement which is necessary to a full understanding of or to explain the acts or statements introduced in evidence by the adverse party. We think that the matter here sought to be proved cannot in any sense be brought within this rule. The bill before us does not disclose how or in what particular the matter was relevant to the issue before the court, or how or in what manner it could explain the declaration and statement theretofore admitted in evidence.

Finally, appellant most vigorously assails the verdict of conviction on the ground of the misconduct of the jury, in that, as averred, the foreman of the jury, Mr. S. E. Wright, stated in the presence and hearing of the jury, and particularly to one Polk Slaughter and J. H. Wilson, members of said jury, that: "There is no doubt that this negro is guilty. I know him, and he is a mean negro. If you knew what I know, you would know he is guilty." In support of the motion, Mr. Slaughter filed an affidavit in writing, in which he ascribed this language to Mr. Wright. His affidavit further discloses that originally he was for acquittal, and finally agreed to come to a penalty of not more than two years. Mr. Wright, the affidavit recites, used the above argument to him and others two or three times, and the jury could not agree; and Mr. Wright's argument above stated influenced him to come from his decision of an acquittal, of verdict of guilty of manslaughter with a penalty of two years, to a verdict of murder in the second degree with a penalty of ten years. The affidavit of Mr. Wilson was not so strong. It is, in substance, as follows: "That after the jury retired to consider of their verdict, and after one S. E. Wright had been selected as foreman of the jury, the said S. E. Wright, immediately after being selected foreman, said to the jury: 'There is no doubt but that the negro [meaning Fred Potts] is guilty of murder.' This statement was challenged by one or two others, and then the jury began to discuss the case. During the discussion of the case in the jury room the said S. E. Wright on two different times made this remark: 'If you all knew as much about this matter as I do, you would know the defendant was guilty.' He used this argument on two different occasions that I remember. Each time when I would ask him if he knew anything the testimony did not disclose, he would say 'No.'" It will thus be seen there is an irreconcilable conflict in the affidavits of the two jurors in respect to the statement of Mr. Wright. According to the affidavit of Wilson, there was an express disclaimer of Wright that he knew any fact in respect to the case not disclosed by the evidence.

The matter was investigated by the court, and among other persons Mr. Slaughter was sworn, who, in substance, confirmed the facts set out in his affidavit, though there is not only some confusion and contradiction in his testimony in respect to what Wright said about the matter, but also considerable contradiction as to when and how the conversation occurred. The following quotation will show the contradictory statement: "The thing that influenced me was this: Mr. Wright first stated as foreman that the defendant, Fred Potts, was a mean negro, and that, if we knew him like he did, we would give him 99 years. He just spoke as if he knew him personally. Well, yes; he said that the evidence showed, went on to talk about that place down there, the occurrence, discussing the evidence, and stated that the evidence showed that he was a bad negro—mean negro. He just spoke as if he knew him personally. I believe he said that the evidence showed that he was a mean negro, and ought to be hung, or sent to the penitentiary for 99 years. I believe that was about what he said."

The juror Wright was sworn, and on hearing before the court stated that he believed defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree and was in favor of the death penalty; that, when the jury first went out, two of them were for hanging, some of them for five years, and some for fifteen years. He further states: "I did not make any statement in the jury room as to my personal knowledge of the defendant. I might have known the defendant in a general way. I have known a good many of those Potts negroes, but I have no recollection of him at the time. I did not make any statement in the jury room to any juror, or to all the jurors, that, if they knew the defendant as well as I did, they would want to hang him or give him 99 years, or something of that sort. Nothing of that sort occurred."

R. L. Thompson, another one of the jurors, was sworn, and testified, in substance, that he heard some one say that he knew Fred Potts; that Fred had worked for him some time; that he did not hear this man say that Fred was a bad negro or mean negro, and nothing was said about Fred's character that he heard.

J. H. Johnson, another of the jurors, testified that, while they were considering their verdict, he did not at any time hear Mr. Wright state that he knew the defendant, and that the defendant was a mean negro, and was guilty of murder and ought to be hanged or anything of that kind.

J. B. Curry, another juror, testified to the same effect, as well as one Meyers. In fact, Slaughter's statement found no support in the testimony of the other jurors, but was distinctly denied by practically all of them. The juror Wilson, whose affidavit was attached to the motion for a new trial, was not sworn, and we note a number of the other jurors were not accounted for. We think the rule with reference to granting new trials on account of discussions and statements by jurors in the jury room has already been carried too far. In this case the matters were investigated and the evidence heard by the court. The statement and testimony of Slaughter in respect to the matter was contradictory and confusing. There was an unqualified denial by all the other jurors. The court hearing these jurors, with better opportunity than we can have for determining their credibility, intelligence, and weight of their testimony, has held this issue adversely to appellant. We believe that his decision was correct under the facts. In any event, it is obvious under the well-settled rule controlling us that we should not interfere with his decision unless it was clearly wrong.

There are other questions in the case, but they are not of such importance as to demand a discussion. It may be an injustice has been done this defendant, but there are some circumstances in the case from which an inference and conclusion of his guilt might in fairness have been drawn by the jury, and, in view of the learned court permitting the verdict to stand, we do not feel that we should interfere; and it is therefore ordered that the judgment of the court below be, and the same is hereby, in all things affirmed.

MORRISON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

BLASPHEMY (§ 1*) — SWEARING IN "PUBLIC PLACE"—NATURE OF OFFENSE.

A reply by accused to the district attorney, while testifying before a grand jury, "It is none of your damn business," etc., did not constitute swearing and cursing in a "public place."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Blasphemy, Dec. Dig. § 1.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5810; vol. 8, p. 7773.]

Appeal from Mitchell County Court; A. J. Coe, Judge.

Tom Morrison was convicted of unlawfully swearing in a public place, and he appeals. Reversed.

Thurmond & Robinson, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was charged in the county court of Mitchell county with the offense of unlawfully and willfully swearing and cursing in a public place, to wit, the grand jury room in the courthouse of Mitchell county, Tex., in a manner calculated to disturb the inhabitants thereof, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $10.

The facts show, in brief, that he was summoned before the grand jury of Mitchell county and interrogated at some length in reference to offenses thought to have been committed in his community, and with special reference to certain persons named by him in his testimony. Among other things, after stating that he knew one Jim Brown, the district attorney asked him how many cattle Jim Brown had, and appellant replied, "About 100 head," and he was thereupon asked by the district attorney if Jim Brown owed anything on his cattle, to which question appellant replied, suddenly and angrily, and facing said district attorney, "It is none of your damn business; it looks like you are trying to inquire into mine and my boy's private business." The use of the language attributed to appellant is admitted by him, with the statement that he thought at the time that the district attorney was trying to pry into his and his son's business, and at the time he was talking in an ordinary tone of voice, like he was when delivering his testimony. He had nothing against any member of the grand jury, but that the district attorney was trying to pry into his son's business, and this was the reason he stated to him that it was none of his damn business.

1. A number of interesting questions are raised in the motion for a new trial—among others, the contention that, the truth or falsity of the testimony of a witness before the grand jury not being an issue, the grand jurors could not, under the law, testify to what was said or done in the grand jury room while they were in session. In view, however, of the entire record, we believe a conviction under the evidence cannot be sustained, and it becomes unnecessary to decide this question. In the case of Lumbkin v. State, 12 Tex. App. 341, appellant was prosecuted on an indictment which, among other things, charged that he did swear and curse in a manner calculated to disturb the inhabitants of a private residence. It seems that appellant in that case denounced the prosecuting witness as the "meanest damndest man on the mountain side" and as a "damn rascal." Judge Hurt, in passing on this case, says, after discussing other questions: "We are also of opinion that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict." See, also, Carr v. City of Conyer, 84 Ga. 287, 10 S. E. 630, 20 Am. St. Rep. 357. That the conduct of appellant was contumacious and probably a contempt, for which, on presentation, he could and should have been rebuked and punished by the district court, is doubtless true; but we scarcely think that the language used comes, under the decisions, within the purview of the statute.

For this reason, it is ordered that the judgment of conviction be, and the same is, hereby reversed, and the cause remanded.

BAKER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

1. INCEST (§ 14*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.
Evidence in a prosecution for incest held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Incest, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1177*)—VERDICT—HARMLESS ERROR.

The error in assessing punishment at "seven years in the penitentiary," instead of "seven years' confinement in the penitentiary," is harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1177.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence in a prosecution for incest shows that accused had carnal intercourse with the complaining witness, resulting in conception, whether the court correctly defined carnal knowledge is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 429*)—EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTS—MARRIAGE LICENSE.

A marriage license and return which comply with the law are admissible in evidence, although there is no evidence that the person performing the marriage ceremony was a justice of the peace, except his own statement following his signature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 429.*]

Appeal from District Court, Bell County; John M. Furman, Judge.

A. F. Baker was convicted of incest, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Bell county on a charge of incest with one Eula Faublon, the daughter by former marriage of his then wife.

1. That he had had carnal intercourse with this young girl, then about 15 years of age, is established by her testimony and the fact that they were found together in bed at Temple by numerous witnesses under circumstances that left no sort of doubt that they had recently had carnal intercourse. While there is by appellant's wife some contradiction of the alleged incestuous intercourse resulting in a miscarriage, yet the facts in the record leave it in our minds beyond doubt, whatever may have been her relation with other men, that appellant had not infrequently had carnal intercourse with the prosecutrix is too clear for discussion. We cannot, therefore, sustain the first ground of appellant's motion, which is to the effect that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and the evidence, and is against the weight and preponderance of the evidence, and without legal or competent evidence to support it.

2. Complaint is also made of the verdict of the jury, which is claimed to be fatally defective and insufficient, and so insufficient that no valid or legal judgment or sentence can be rendered upon it. The verdict is as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and assess his punishment at seven years in the penitentiary." While the motion does not point out the particular defect claimed in the verdict, it is assumed it was thought to be insufficient by reason of the omission of the word "confinement" between the words "years" and "in." While this would have been better expressed if such word had been used, the meaning and intent of the verdict is so obvious that its omission cannot be held fatal.

3. The third ground of the motion is that the court erred in the fifth paragraph of his charge, wherein he defines the term "carnal knowledge." This portion of the court's charge is as follows: "By the term 'carnal knowledge' of a female by a male person is meant that some part of the male organ of generation must have entered some part of the female organ of generation; but the depth or degree of such entry or penetration is immaterial." In view of the fact that the evidence shows that the parties had had carnal intercourse, resulting in conception, it is evident, whether erroneous or not, that in any event the question becomes utterly immaterial and inconsequential.

4. On the trial objection was made to the introduction of a certain marriage license, issued by the county clerk of Lampasas county, and the return thereon, for the reason that the marriage license failed to show that one J. W. Trussell, who purports by the terms of said instrument to be the justice of the peace of precinct No. 4, Lampasas county, Tex., was really such justice of the peace; there being no evidence introduced to show that, at the time the marriage ceremony was performed, he was such officer and had authority under the law to perform marriage ceremonies, save and except his signature thereto, reciting that he was such justice of the peace. The marriage license and return thereon, introduced in evidence, in all respects complied with the law. These licenses, when return is made, are required to be preserved and the return recorded. The return was in proper form, and made by a person purported to be an officer authorized to solemnize the rites of matrimony between the parties. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, the law would presume that the clerk, in accepting the return, had satisfied himself of the official character of the person performing the marriage rites, and in the absence of anything challenging such authority, or the official character of such person, no burden rests on the state to show that he was in deed and in truth such officer. Again, all the evidence showed, without doubt or controversy, among others, by the wife of appellant, the marriage in question.

There is no merit, as we believe, in any of the questions raised and we would be utterly without excuse to reverse the case.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of conviction be, and the same is hereby, in all things affirmed.

ELLIS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 913*)—NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT OF FACTS—DEATH OF JUDGE.

Where there was an agreed statement of facts filed in a case, the death of the presiding judge, subsequent to the trial and before the statement of facts was made up, was no ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 913.*]

Appeal from Johnson County Court; F. E. Adams, Judge.

Coley Ellis was convicted of violating the local option law, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was convicted in the county court of Johnson county on a charge of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors therein in violation of the local option law. On conviction he was fined $100 and imprisoned in the county jail for 60 days.

That appellant sold intoxicating liquors to the person named in the indictment is placed beyond dispute by the testimony; nor was there any evidence raising the issue, as claimed by appellant, of mere agency. Nor is there any merit in the contention that, because Judge Adams, who was presiding at the trial of the case, had died subsequent thereto and before the statement of facts was made up, this necessarily entitled appellant to a new trial. In this case there was an agreed statement of facts filed. So that it is inconceivable that in this regard any injury or injustice was done appellant by reason of the death of Judge Adams. There is no bill of exceptions in the record, nor is there any claim that appellant was deprived of bills of exception by reason of the death of the judge presiding.

There is no merit in any of the contentions of appellant, and it is clear that the case should be affirmed, which is now done.

WALTERS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

ROBBERY (§ 24*)—"ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO ROB"—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held not to show an "assault with intent to rob," within Pen. Code 1895, art.

611, providing that an assault with intent to commit any other offense is constituted by the existence of facts which bring the offense within the definition of an assault, coupled with an intent to commit such other offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Robbery, Cent. Dig. §§ 32-36; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 544.]

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Harris County; E. R. Campbell, Judge.

George Walters was convicted of assault with intent to rob, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Brockman & Kahn and E. T. Branch, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of assault with intent to rob, and his punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The evidence in the case, being the testimony of A. R. Anderson, the only witness, is as follows: "That he, in company with Constable Smith, intended to get on the Ft. Worth sleeper of the Houston & Texas Central Railroad; that about five minutes before the train left he went upon the platform or vestibule of said sleeper; that after he got upon the platform of said sleeper, which sleeper was attached to the rear end of the Dallas sleeper, he encountered appellant and his codefendant Johnson at the doorway leading into said Ft. Worth sleeper, and, to use the language of said Anderson, 'As I went to squeeze through them to get into the sleeper, this man over there that calls himself Walters, he had an overcoat on his arm, he got right in my way, and as I got between him and this other fellow (Johnson) Walters kind of put his coat up this way (indicating by raising his left arm up about level with breast of witness), and ran his hand around and got hold of my stud, and I said, "You damned son of a bitch, what do you mean?" and grabbed hold of him;' and further testified that, as he grabbed hold of Walters, he struck Walters with a small grip he had in his hand and Walters immediately desisted from any further attempt to take the witness' diamond stud, which was screwed into his shirt; and further testified that the diamond stud was not removed from its place in his shirt, and that his shirt was not torn. The first thing that attracted the attention of Anderson was that he felt the attempt to get his stud, and then noticed, in connection therewith, the fact that appellant had his hand up, with his overcoat over it as a shield, and that it was not necessary for the witness to be crowded in getting into the coach, and witness then realized that they were pickpockets, and that an attempt was being made to get his diamond stud; that he was 'jammed' by appellant and said Johnson; that by 'jammed' he meant that said parties were standing at the doorway of said Ft. Worth sleeper, and that he tried to 'squeeze between them' and get into the sleeper, and that they did not give way and make room for him to pass, as he expected they would do, and that neither of the co-defendants or appellant put their hands on or about him, except that appellant put his hand on witness' diamond stud, and that he felt the hand on the stud, which was the first thing that attracted his attention; that neither of the three men arrested for the attempt to get his stud, Johnson, Garrard, and appellant, said a word before or after the attempt to take the stud; that witness was not put in fear; that no one struck him, or used any violence upon him, or demanded any property from him, and that no weapon other than ordinary pocketknives were found on either of the three men, and no weapon was exhibited; that the three men were jointly indicted, but (appellant having been tried separately) were searched immediately after the arrest by witness and the constable, and that the above circumstances constituted what had occurred; that he so testified on the examining trial, and did so now, and that his testimony as given then and now is true; further, that no evidence of any right to ride on said train was found on either of the three men, and that to get access to said train it was necessary to go through a gate at the depot and exhibit tickets; that appellant was caught and held by witness after he detected his hand on the stud and had struck appellant with the grip; that the whole transaction was quicker than it could be told and was over in a minute."

Appellant insists that the evidence is insufficient to show an assault with intent to rob. Article 611 of the Penal Code of 1895 provides: "An assault with intent to commit any other offense is constituted by the existence of the facts which bring the offense within the definition of an assault, coupled with an intention to commit such other offense, as of robbery." Under the provisions of this article and a long line of authorities of this court we hold that appellant's contention is correct. The case of Long v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 114 S. W. 632, is, in all of its salient features, exactly like the facts disclosed by this record. In that case appellant was prosecuted for theft from the person, and convicted. However, the facts further show in the Long Case that a theft was consummated. If the facts in this case had shown that appellant secured the diamond stud, it would have constituted theft from the person. Failing to so show, it does not constitute an assault to rob. For a discussion of the question, see the following authorities: Johnson v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 140, 32 S. W. 537; Rodriguez v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 71 S. W. 596; Tarrango v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 385, 71 S. W. 597; Herr

v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 53, 105 S. W. 190; Boyd v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 29 S. W. 157; Long v. State, supra. It follows, therefore, that the evidence is wholly insufficient to support the conviction.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

HARE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 301*)—PRIVILEGE OF ACCUSED—EXAMINATION.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 770, providing that accused's failure to testify in his own behalf shall not be taken as a circumstance against him, it was reversible error to permit accused to be asked whether he testified on his former trial for the same offense, which accused answered in the negative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 301.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 721*)—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—ARGUMENT.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 770, providing that accused's failure to testify for himself shall not be alluded to in argument, it was reversible error for the state's attorney to state in argument that accused's failure to testify on his former trial showed that his testimony in the present trial was false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1672; Dec. Dig. § 721.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—APPEALS—CONTENTS OF RECORD—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

Error in requiring accused to testify as to whether he testified on his former trial for the same offense, and in permitting the prosecuting attorney to comment in argument on his failure to testify on the former trial, in violation of Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 770, was available to accused, though the record on appeal contained no statement of facts, where the bill of exceptions stated the proof in general terms sufficiently to show the contentions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—APPEAL—RECORD—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

If the bill of exceptions on accused's appeal did not fully state the matters necessary to review errors in admitting evidence or permitting improper argument, so that a statement of facts was essential to review the case, it became the prosecuting attorney's duty to bring up the statement of facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Harris County; E. R. Campbell, Judge.

Will Hare was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Reversed.

E. T. Branch and A. C. Van Velzer, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., and W. G. Love, Dist. Atty., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was convicted in the criminal district court of Harris county on the 15th day of March, 1909, on a charge of burglary, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of three years.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

1. There is no statement of facts in the record, but it appears by proper bill of exceptions that the evidence was sufficient to show: That W. D. Allison was the special owner of the car alleged to have been burglarized, and that same had been burglarized in Harris county, Tex., and certain cigars of the Optimo brand taken therefrom; each box bearing the brand, "Rotan Grocery Company, Cigar Department, Waco, Texas, Distributors." That no eyewitness testified to the burglary, but the evidence as to the breaking was wholly circumstantial. That on the next day appellant was shown to be in possession of such cigars, of the market value of 6½ cents each, and to be selling them for 1 cent each, and that he had signed a fictitious name to a receipt to a party to whom he had sold some of the cigars, and that he had sold and offered for sale said cigars to several parties; the state's evidence being prima facie sufficient to show him guilty by circumstances. The bill also recites that at a former term of this court in December, 1908, the appellant had been tried for the same offense, and at said trial had been convicted, and a new trial thereafter granted, and had not on such trial become a witness in his own behalf, and that on the trial from which this appeal results he was placed on the stand as a witness in his own behalf and testified in substance that he had been employed to sell said cigars by one Buck Moore, Jr., and that he did not break into said railway car, but was in bed at the time same was broken into and was not present at such breaking. There was no additional testimony adduced by him, or further questions asked him by his counsel. Thereupon the district attorney asked appellant the following question: "You did not take the stand on the former trial of this case at the December term, did you?" To which question and answer sought to be elicited thereby his counsel objected, on the ground that it was a reference to his failure to testify on said former trial, and could not be taken as a circumstance against him. The court overruled the objection, and the witness answered in the presence of the jury, "No;" such evidence and answer being offered by the state to show that appellant's testimony was false and a recent fabrication. A somewhat similar bill appears in the record and complains of the argument of the district attorney in discussing the fact of the failure of appellant to take the stand in his own behalf on the former trial. This argument was to the effect, in substance, that the failure of appellant to take the stand on the former trial showed that his claim was a fabrication.

We think the action of the court in permitting the question to be asked and requiring appellant to answer thereto was erroneous, and that the discussion of this testimony and answer of appellant by the district attorney was also erroneous, for which the case must be reversed. Article 770 of our Code of Criminal Procedure of 1896 provides that "any defendant in a criminal action shall be permitted to testify in his own behalf therein, but the failure of any defendant to so testify shall not be taken as a circumstance against him, nor shall the same be alluded to or commented on by counsel in the cause." It has been uniformly held by this court that this statute is broad enough to cover and does cover the proceedings on a former trial. From this ruling there has been no exception in the cases, and we have no doubt that this is a correct construction of the statute. See Richardson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 519, 27 S. W. 139; Dorrs v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 40 S. W. 811; Bradburn v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 309, 65 S. W. 519; Pryse v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 113 S. W. 938; Wilkins v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 320, 26 S. W. 409; Templeton v. People, 27 Mich. 501; Miller v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 517, 78 S. W. 511. It is urgently contended by the state that this statute should have no application in any case where on any trial the defendant takes the stand in his own behalf, and the proposition submitted by our Assistant Attorney General is as follows: "When a defendant at any trial during the progress of any criminal action takes the stand as a witness in his own behalf, he takes himself out of the protection of the statute which forbids reference to the failure of the defendant to testify in a criminal action, and occupies the position of any other witness, and may be cross-examined and subjected to the same tests and rules affecting his credibility and the weight of his evidence as would apply to any other witness." We have, indeed, in many cases stated and held that when a defendant takes the stand he is subject to the same rules on cross-examination that all other witnesses are subjected to. Mirando v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 50 S. W. 714. This language, however, is always subordinate and to be read in harmony with the other decisions which prevent and condemn a violation of a statutory right. There is no conflict between the ordinary rule and the rule to be applied in a case like the one at bar. We think the contention of appellant, stated in his brief, is manifestly correct, and that to construe the statutory inhibition as applying only to the present trial would render it dangerous to any citizen's case if his counsel decided not to put him on the stand, when, if a subsequent trial was had, the state's case might be stronger and require defendant's testimony, and his previous silence (when he had a right to be silent) be used as an indication of fabrication. Such a construction would destroy the presumption of innocence. The matter has been so frequently discussed by this court, and is so firmly fixed as the unbroken rule of the decisions of this tribunal, that it requires no further discussion.

2. Nor can we accede to the suggestion

In general terms, the proof on the part of the state and the nature and character of appellant's defense, and is sufficient to illustrate the contention of the respective parties, and is, as we believe, rather to be commended than condemned. It is the rule of this court, settled beyond dispute, that the statute above quoted is mandatory. Such, also, is the rule in other tribunals. It is thus stated in 12 Cyc. p. 576: "A statute which provides that the neglect or refusal of the accused to testify shall not be commented upon by the prosecuting attorney is usually mandatory." Again, if it was thought that a statement of facts was essential to a proper review of a case, and that the matter was not fairly or fully stated in the bill of exceptions, and could not be so stated, it would become the duty of the prosecuting officers to bring up the statement of facts on appeal.

For the reasons stated, we think that the judgment of conviction must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

CASSENS v. STATE

Appeal from Williamson County Court; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

G. Cassens was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Dismissed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This case was tried originally in the justice court, from a conviction in which an appeal was taken to the county court. The trial in the latter court resulted in a conviction, with a fine of $25; the charge being the sale of intoxicants to a minor.

Motion is made to dismiss the appeal because of the fact that the fine was under $100. This being true, the case was a finality in the county court. Under the law this motion is well taken. See Nelson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 379, 26 S. W. 623; Tison v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 360, 33 S. W. 872; Mahanay v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 60 S. W. 756.

The motion to dismiss is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

A judgment of the county court in a criminal case appealed from a justice court is final and not appealable when the fine is under $100.

Appeal from Williamson County Court; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

Enno Cassens was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Dismissed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This case originated in the justice court. From a conviction, appeal was taken to the county court. In the latter court a fine of $25 was the result of the trial, and notice of appeal given to this court.

The fine being under $100 in the county court, it became final, and the appeal is not authorized to this court. See Nelson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 379, 26 S. W. 623; Tison v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 360, 33 S. W. 872, and Mahanay v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 60 S. W. 756.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is sustained.

McKALLIP v. COLLINS BROS.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENTS—PROPOSITION AND STATEMENT.

An assignment of error, not followed by proposition or statement, will not be considered on appeal.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding on conflicting evidence, supported by corroborating circumstances, is conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Harris County Court; A. E. Amerman, Judge.

Action between J. C. McKallip and Collins Bros. From a judgment for the latter, the former appeals. Affirmed.

S. Talliaferro and G. L. Teat, for appellant. W. J. Howard, for appellees.

REESE, J. The findings of fact of the trial court are substantially supported by the evidence, and the assignments presenting objection thereto are overruled.

The second assignment of error is not followed by proposition nor statement, and will not be considered. It relates, moreover, to a ruling of the court in the admission of evidence, to which no bill of exception appears to have been taken.

None of the assignments of error presents sufficient grounds for reversal of the judgment. The case simply involves a question of fact as to the terms of the contract under which the furnace was repaired, upon which the evidence was conflicting. The court accepted appellees' testimony, with the corroborating circumstances, as to this fact, instead of that of appellant and his wife. In such case it is not the province of the appellate court to substitute its judgment for that of the court or jury trying the case.

Finding no error, the judgment is affirmed. Affirmed.

WAGGONER v. SNEED.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Jan. 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 149*)—DISCHARGE PENDING TRIAL—SICKNESS—FILLING JURY.

Completing a jury by summoning talesmen, where pending a trial a juror is incapacitated by sickness for sitting, is error, not being expressly authorized by Rev. St. 1895, arts. 3221, 3224, the only express authority for summoning talesmen, and being impliedly forbidden by article 3225, providing that in case of a juror being so incapacitated the remainder of the jury can render the verdict, which, however, shall be signed by every remaining member.

2. TRIAL (§ 266*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

On a party requesting a number of special charges based on any given group of facts, the court need not select the one most favorable to the party; but, either being given, he may not complain of the refusal of the others, though the one given be less favorable than he would be entitled to on the issue.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 157*)—[INJURY TO SERVANT—TIMELY WARNING OF DANGER.

If defendant's foreman warned plaintiff in time for him to have removed his hand from the place of danger, and plaintiff heard the warning, this would be a defense, as the jury should be instructed, whatever be the proper denomination of such defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INSTRUCTIONS—UNDUE PROMINENCE OF PARTICULAR FACTS.

The same matter of defense should not be submitted by separate charges as assumed risk and contributory negligence, as that would be unnecessarily to give prominence to that group of facts.

5. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTING FURTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge, though not as favorable to defendant as he would be entitled to have, is not for that reason alone erroneous.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 235*)—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—DISCOVERY BY SERVANT.

An employé is not required to exercise diligence to discover defects in appliances furnished by the master.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

The defense of a master against his negligence in using a defective rope, by the breaking of which plaintiff, his employé, was injured, that plaintiff knew or should have known of its condition, cannot be more fairly presented than by the ordinary charge of assumed risk; that is, if plaintiff knew of its defective condition, or in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety in the prosecution of his work would necessarily have known of it, he could not recover.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Mike E. Smith, Judge.

Action by A. H. Sneed against W. T. Waggoner. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

M. Spoonts, Stephens & Miller, and R. W. Hall, for appellant. McLean & Carlock, for appellee.

SPEER, J. This is a personal injury suit instituted by appellee against appellant, in which there was judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $10,000, and the defendant has appealed.

The question of first importance in the case is one of practice, arising on the court's ruling in causing talesmen to be summoned to fill the panel, which had been broken by the sickness of one of the jurors regularly selected. The matter is so clearly presented by appellant's bill of exceptions that we venture to quote at length from the bill itself:

"The above styled and numbered cause was regularly reached and called for trial on, to wit, Monday, October 28, A. D. 1907, and thereupon both parties announced ready for trial, and there was at the time of said announcement of ready for trial in attendance upon said court 12 jurors who had been regularly selected in accordance with law for jury service in said court for week beginning Monday October 28, 1907, whose names are as follows, to wit: Leo Pittman, B. R. Owens, W. G. Ballinger, W. N. Shofit, T. M. Mallory, M. A. Jernigan, F. O. Freeman, D. C. Curtis, J. R. Brothers, S. J. Lotsputch, and J. H. Walker. And thereupon the court directed the deputy sheriff waiting upon said court to summon a sufficient number of persons qualified for jury service as talesmen and complete said panel, and, in obedience to said direction and order of the court, said deputy sheriff summoned nine persons possessing the qualifications of jurors as talesmen, whose names are as follows:

† Writ of error dismissed by Supreme Court March 31, 1909.

J. W. Burton, John Behrens, Bert Betschel, J. W. Sherley, O. L. Bandy, Ben Waggoman, J. G. Bewley, J. S. McDonough, and J. C. Pliant. None of the 21 persons whose names are above mentioned disqualified, and thereupon the defendant requested the court to require the panel to be filled with 24 qualified jurors, before he was required to exercise peremptory challenges; but the court refused said request and compelled the parties to exercise such peremptory challenges as they desired to make without the panel of jurors being filled and completed, to which action of the court the defendant then and there in open court excepted, and in obedience to the direction of the court the defendant exercised his right of peremptory challenge and challenged 6 of said persons who were objectionable to him as jurors and whose names are as follows, to wit: M. A. Jernigan, S. J. Lotsputch, J. M. Trammill, J. H. Walker, C. L. Bandy, and J. C. Pliant. And thereby defendant exhausted all of his peremptory challenges, the plaintiff used only 3 of his peremptory challenges in striking said panel of 21 jurors, and from said panel a full jury of 12 persons possessing the qualifications of jurors were selected to try the above styled and numbered cause, whose names are as follows, to wit: B. B. Owens, W. G. Ballinger, W. N. Shoffit, T. N. Mallory, D. C. Curtis, J. R. Brothers, J. W. Burton, John Behrens, Bert Betschel, J. N. Sherley, J. G. Bewley, and J. S. McDonough and the above 12 named persons were regularly sworn as required by law to try the said cause, and were regularly, duly, and properly impaneled as jurors in said cause. Thereupon the plaintiff read to the jury his pleadings, consisting of his first-amended petition and his trial amendment, and the defendant read to the jury his first-amended answer, to which said pleadings the parties announced ready for trial, and on which they went to trial, and on which this cause was tried. At the time when the pleadings of the parties were presented to the jury as above set out, the regular time for the adjournment of this court for that day, to wit, October 28, 1907, had arrived, and thereupon the court after properly instructing said jurors permitted them to disperse for the night, with directions to them to return to said court at 9 o'clock a. m. on the succeeding day, to wit, October 29, 1907. At 9 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, October 29, 1907, all of said jurors appeared in said court to serve upon the trial of this case, but the Honorable M. E. Smith, judge of this court, being unavoidably detained by private business, was unable to appear, and by reason thereof said jurors were excused from further attendance until 9 o'clock a. m. on Wednesday, October 30, 1907, at which time they were directed by the sheriff to appear so that the trial of this cause might proceed before them.

"On Wednesday, October 30, 1907, all of said jurors who had been so selected to try the issues of fact appeared except J. R. Brothers, who failed to appear, and the deputy sheriff, waiting on the district court of the Seventeenth judicial district of Texas, informed the court that said juror, J. R. Brothers, had told him on the day before that he was suffering from rheumatism and wanted to be excused from the jury, as set out in Exhibit A hereto attached; but the defendant refused to agree that said juror might be excused from jury service in this cause. Thereupon the court asked counsel for the defendant if they were willing to proceed with the trial of the case with the 11 jurors who appeared at said time, and the defendant and his counsel declined and refused to proceed to trial with said 11 jurors, and demanded a trial before the said jurors who had been theretofore selected by the parties for the trial of this cause, and refused to consent or agree to excuse the said absent juror, J. R. Brothers, or to try this cause with a less number than 12 jurors, or to try said cause before any other jurors than the said 12 who had been so selected. Thereupon the court directed the deputy sheriff waiting upon said court to summon 3 other talesmen, and the said deputy sheriff, in obedience to said direction and order of said court, summoned three persons possessing qualifications of jurors as talesmen, whose names are as follows, to wit, G. P. James, T. D. James, and C. B. Law, and the said three persons last hereinabove mentioned appeared as jurors and qualified as possessing the qualifications for jurors under the law, and thereupon by directions of the court their names were added to the said lists which had theretofore been furnished to the parties, and the parties hereto were required to select from said three names the twelfth juror for the trial of this cause to serve in the place of J. R. Brothers, who failed to appear on said day. The defendant had exhausted his peremptory challenges. The juror C. B. Law was objectionable to the defendant because the defendant believed that said juror would be inclined to find a verdict for the plaintiff, and that he would be in favor of assessing damages for the plaintiff at a very high amount; but the defendant, having exhausted his six peremptory challenges on the persons hereinabove named, who were particularly objectionable to him, was not allowed to challenge the said C. B. Law, and the plaintiff, having left two peremptory challenges, exercised them in peremptorily challenging G. P. James and T. D. James, leaving said Law as the twelfth juror to serve in the place of J. R. Brothers. The objections to the man Law were personal objections of counsel of defendant and not made known to the court because said Law properly qualified as a juror on his voir dire. At the time the court directed the said deputy sheriff to summon said last-named three persons as talesmen, the defendant objected thereto upon the ground that it had not been shown to the court that the juror J. R. Brothers was dead or disabled, and upon the ground that under the circumstances hereinabove shown the court had no authority to cause other jurors to be summoned or to fill the panel. When said jurors were tendered to the defendant, the defendant then and there in open court objected to them, because it had not been shown that the juror J. R. Brothers was dead or disabled, that under the circumstances hereinabove set out there was no authority vested in the court to require the defendant to accept as a juror either of the said three last-named persons; but the court overruled said objection and required the defendant to proceed as has been hereinabove shown, to which action of the court the defendant then and there in open court excepted."

The jury, as thus completed, returned a verdict against appellant in the sum of $12,500, but which sum was subsequently reduced by a remittitur filed at the instance of the trial court to the amount above named. Article 3221 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, regulating the formation of the jury for the trial of civil causes, provides: "If the number of jurors be reduced by challenge for cause to less than twelve in the district court or six in the county court, the court shall order other jurors to be drawn or summoned, as the case may be, and entered upon the slips in place of those who have been set aside for cause." And further, article 3224 reads: "When by peremptory challenges the jury is left incomplete, the court shall direct such number of other jurors to be drawn or summoned, as the case may be, as the court may consider sufficient to complete the jury, and the same proceedings shall be had in selecting and empanneling such jurors as are had in the first instance." This we believe constitutes the only express authority for summoning talesmen. Article 3229 seems to contemplate just such a contingency as is shown to have arisen in this case, and reads: "Where pending the trial of any case in the district court one or more of the jurors, not exceeding three, may die or be disabled from sitting, the remainder of the jury shall have power to render the verdict; but in such case the verdict shall be signed by every remaining member of the jury." Now there can be no question but that the court would have had the power, and it became his duty upon the juror J. R. Brothers becoming disabled from sitting, to require the parties to proceed to trial before the 11 jurors. The statute does not expressly authorize the summoning of talesmen under such circumstances, and we think the effect of the article of the statutes last quoted is by implication to forbid it. It is quite apparent from the language of the bill that appellant not only objected to the summoning of talesmen because it had not been shown that the juror Brothers was really disabled from sitting, but also, generally, that the court under the circumstances had no authority to cause another juror to be summoned to fill the panel.

We have carefully noted appellee's reply, to the effect that appellant waived his right to a trial before the 11, or invited the court to fill the panel, rather than that he should be forced to proceed with 11 jurors, and in this connection have carefully examined the stenographer's notes of what occurred at the time; but we are of opinion that the bill, even when construed in the light of this explanation, does not show that appellant in any way waived his right to object to the juror Law in any and all events. To be sure the matter is altogether technical, but, indeed, the right itself to a trial before the 12 jurors is technical, but none the less a substantial right. For the errors thus committed, the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

We perhaps would not be authorized to reverse the judgment upon the ruling of the court in refusing special instructions in view of the charges given, some of which were requested by appellant. Upon a party's requesting a number of special charges based upon any given group of facts, we do not think it is incumbent upon the trial judge to select from amongst them the one most favorable to the party requesting such charges, and would hold that, if either charge was given, such party would have no just cause of complaint for refusing the others, even though the charge actually given may be less favorable than he would be entitled to on such issue. On the present appeal the complaint of appellant, at least as to some of his refused charges, might be answered in this way, but we cannot know that the same will be true on another trial, and we therefore suggest in a general way that, if appellant's foreman warned appellee in time for him to have removed his hand from the place of danger, and appellee heard such warning, it would be a complete defense to this suit, and the court should so instruct the jury. This is true whether such defense should be denominated assumed risk, contributory negligence, or what not. F. W. & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Robinson, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 465, 84 S. W. 410. But the court should not submit such defense both as assumed risk and contributory negligence—that is, in separate charges—for that would be unnecessarily to give prominence to that group of facts. The court actually submitted this issue as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the said Slaughter just previous to the accident discovered that the rope was breaking, or about to break, and warned plaintiff of this, if it be a fact, in time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care, and further find that plaintiff thereafter failed to exercise ordinary care to remove his hand and avoid the injury, and that such want of care, if any, on his part contributed to his injury, or if you find that by the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety plaintiff would have known that the rope was defective, if it was defective, and under the circumstances was guilty of a want of ordinary care for his own safety in going into and remaining in said place, and that such want of ordinary care, if any, contributed to his injury, then he cannot recover." While this charge is not as favorable to appellant as he would be entitled to have, yet it is not for that reason alone erroneous (C., R. I. & G. Ry. Co. v. Johnson [Tex. Civ. App.] 111 S. W. 758); and, besides, it appears to be in substantial keeping with one requested by him.

Quite a group of assignments form the basis for the following proposition: "If a person of ordinary prudence, situated as plaintiff was, would have discovered the defective condition of the rope by which the compress cylinder was suspended, and plaintiff failed to do so, and such failure directly and proximately contributed to his injury, then plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as will preclude his recovery for the injury complained of." There is a measure of law in the proposition, yet the charges requested upon this issue were subject to the criticism that they imposed upon appellee the exercise of diligence to discover defects in the appliances furnished by appellant, and this of course is not the law. We apprehend that appellant's defense against his negligence in using the defective rope which injured appellee cannot be more fairly presented than by the ordinary charge of assumed risk; that is, if appellee either knew of the defective condition of the rope, or in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety in the prosecution of the work in which he was engaged would necessarily have known of the same, then he cannot recover.

In view of the reversal, the questions of the misconduct of the jury, argument of counsel, and excessiveness of the verdict will not be considered.

Reversed and remanded.

BOARDMAN v. WOODWARD.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 17, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 14, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*) — PRESUMPTIONS—FACTS NOT SHOWN BY RECORD—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

Where the record does not show that any action was taken by the trial court on defendant's exceptions to the petition, error therein, if any, is presumed to have been waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 907.*]

2. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 36*)—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for the conversion of cattle, the defense being that defendant sold the cattle to plaintiff under an agreement that title should not pass until plaintiff should execute a note therefor secured by mortgage, which he failed to do, and was about to remove the cattle, plaintiff could show that defendant owed him a certain sum as his reason for refusing to execute the note and mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 121*)—RES GESTÆ—ACTION FOR CONVERSION.

In an action for the conversion of cattle, in which plaintiff claimed exemplary damages, testimony by plaintiff as to a difficulty which occurred at the time the cattle were taken was admissible as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1053*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT.

In an action for the conversion of plaintiff's cattle, any error in admitting evidence of a difficulty which occurred when the cattle were taken was harmless, where the court did not submit the issue of exemplary damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4183; Dec. Dig. § 1053.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 139*)—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Where the evidence raised issues which the court was required to submit, a peremptory charge for defendant was properly refused.

Appeal from District Court, Concho County; John W. Goodwin, Judge.

Action by J. L. Woodward against Eno Boardman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Curtys Simmons, for appellant. B. B. Stone and J. B. Wade, for appellee.

RICE, J. This suit was brought by appellee against appellant for the recovery of actual, as well as exemplary, damages, occasioned by reason of the alleged conversion, on the part of appellant, of two horses and two mules, the alleged property of appellee. Affer a general demurrer, special exceptions, and a general denial appellant undertook to justify the taking of said property upon the ground that the same never at any time belonged to appellee, but, on the contrary, were the property of appellant, who, prior to said alleged conversion, had hold the same to appellee upon the distinct understanding and agreement that title thereto should not pass to appellee until he had executed his note to appellant for the sum of $550, covering the purchase price thereof, as well as $75 for certain other property, together with a mortgage on said stock to secure the payment of said note, and that appellee had failed to execute and deliver said note and mortgage, and was about to remove said property out of the county. There was a jury trial, and verdict and judgment in behalf of appellee in the sum of $400, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

Upon the trial the court clearly submitted the issues involved in his charge to the jury, telling them that, if from the evidence they believed that appellant had sold the horses and mules in question on credit until the succeeding fall, and that appellee was to thereafter give a note for the purchase money, secured by mortgage on said stock, then in that event, the title to same passed to appellee; and, if they believed that appellant thereafter converted the same, to find for the appellee. On the other hand, said charge directly told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that appellant sold the horses and mules in question to appellee, together with certain other articles, with the understanding that the title to said horses and mules was to remain in appellant until appellee executed his note therefor secured by a mortgage upon said stock, and thereafter appellee failed or refused to execute and deliver said note and mortgage in accordance with the terms of said contract, then and in that event they were instructed that no title to the horses and mules passed to appellee, and that appellant had the right to repossess himself of said stock; and, if they so believed, to find for appellant. No other issue was submitted, and the verdict was for the value of the stock alone.

Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling his general and special exceptions to the petition; but, since the judgment fails to show that any action was taken by the court on said general and special exceptions of appellant, the error, if any was committed, is presumed to have been waived. S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Barnett, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 34 S. W. 139; Denison, S. R. & S. Ry. Co. v. Powell, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 454, 80 S. W. 1054. Besides this, an inspection of the charge shows that the only question submitted for the consideration of the jury, if they found for appellee, was as to the reasonable market value of the stock at the date of the alleged conversion, and the verdict was in accordance therewith.

There was no error, in our judgment, in permitting plaintiff while on the stand to state that defendant owed him $300. The same we think was admissible for the purpose of showing why appellee refused to execute the note and mortgage when demanded of him by appellant.

Nor was there any error in permitting appellee to testify relative to the difficulty which occurred at the time of the taking of said horses and mules by appellant, since what occurred at that time was res gestae of the transaction, and was therefore admissible. Paraffine Oil Co. v. Berry (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 1089. Besides, if we are in error as to this, said testimony was harmless, for the reason that the court failed to submit to the jury the issue of exemplary damages. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 612, 79 S. W. 340.

It would, in our judgment, have been improper for the court to have peremptorily charged the jury in favor of appellant, as requested by him, as complained of in his sixth assignment, because the evidence raised issues which made it incumbent upon the court to charge thereon.

Appellant's seventh assignment of error is not briefed in accordance with the rules. It is followed by no proposition nor statement, and for this reason we might decline to consider same; but, notwithstanding this, we believe that the special charge, refusal of which is assigned as error, contains an improper statement of the law, and therefore was properly refused.

The court did not err in refusing to give appellant's special charge No. 3, because the same was directly upon the weight of evidence in that it assumed as true the existence of one of the principal facts in issue.

The remaining assignments complain of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment. Without detailing the evidence, we think it is sufficient to say that, in our judgment, it is ample to support the verdict.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the court below is in all things affirmed.

Affirmed.

LOWRANCE et al. v. WOODS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Feb. 27, 1909.)

1. COVENANTS (§ 20*)—IMPLIED COVENANTS.

Where a town-site company, as part of a general scheme of platting, laying out, and selling lots, designated a certain block as residence property exclusively, there was, in effect, a covenant with a purchaser of lots that the company would limit the use of all other lots in that block to residence purposes and the covenant bound defendant, who purchased adjoining lots with knowledge of such dedication, so as to preclude him from maintaining a wagon and feed yard on his lots.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—BRIEFS—SUFFICIENCY.

Assignments of error cannot be considered, where they are grouped in appellants' brief, and propositions are made under two or more of them raising distinct questions of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3000; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*) — REVIEW — PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1831, if a finding by the court, favorable to appellee on a particular issue not submitted, is necessary to sustain the judgment rendered, it will be presumed that the court so found, where appellants do not appear to have requested a submission of that issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 931.*]

4. COVENANTS (§ 20*)—RESTRICTIVE BUILDING COVENANTS—NOTICE.

The date when defendant received a deed to lots should be considered the date of his purchase, and not a prior date, when he made a partial payment for the lots, taking a receipt therefor, as affecting notice to him that the block had been designated by the town-site company as residence property exclusively, where the receipt merely recited, "Received of [defendant] $216 in further consideration of the execution of two notes for $216 each due in one and two years at 8 per cent., and upon the delivery of said notes the R. town-site company will execute a warranty deed"; the receipt being insufficient to support suit by defendant for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 129*) — BUILDING RESTRICTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to enjoin the use of lots as a feed and wagon yard, deeds containing restrictions against such use of neighboring lots in another block were admissible, as tending to show dedication of the block involved for residence purposes exclusively.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 934*) — REVIEW — PRESUMPTIONS.

Where findings are sufficient to support the judgment, it will be presumed to have been based thereon, in the absence of a showing to the contrary in the record.

Appeal from District Court, Fisher County; Cullen C. Higgins, Judge.

Action by John W. Woods against W. J. Lowrance and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Beall Bros. & McDugald and W. C. Halbert, for appellants. Leggett & Kirby, Harry Tom King, and McCreas & Kirk, for appellee.

DUNKLIN, J. The decision of this court on a former appeal of this case is reported in 109 S. W. 418, John W. Woods being the appellant, and W. J. Lowrance et al., appellees. The suit was instituted in the district court of Fisher County by John W. Woods against W. J. Lowrance and M. Hardin, to enjoin them from using their lots 8, 9, and 10 in block 53, and buildings thereon, in the town of Rotan, as a feed and wagon yard. Plaintiff is the owner of lots 6 and 7 in the same block, and adjoining defendants' property, and occupies his property as a place of residence for himself and family, having improved it for that purpose. Upon plaintiff's application therefor the judge of the district court granted a temporary writ of injunction, restraining the defendants from using their property for feed and wagon yard purposes pending the litigation, which was made perpetual by final judgment rendered upon the merits of the case, and from this judgment the defendants have appealed.

The town site for the town of Rotan was laid out and platted by the Rotan Town-Site Company. Plaintiff purchased lots 6 and 7, block 53, from that company February 25, 1907, defendant Lowrance purchased lots 9 and 10 of the same block from the same company April 17, 1907, and lot 8 in that block was purchased from that company by H. B. Lewis February 25, 1907, who sold it to Lowrance November 2, 1907. The deed to Woods contained a stipulation that the property therein conveyed should not be used as a feed or wagon yard, but the deeds to Lowrance and Lewis were warranty deeds, without restrictions upon use of the property conveyed. The case was tried before a jury, who, upon special issues submitted, returned the following findings of fact, to wit: "The Rotan Town-Site Company, as a part of the general scheme of platting and laying out and sale of the property belonging to it, designated and set apart block 53, in which the property of plaintiff and defendant is situated, as residence property exclusively, and W. J. Lowrance and John W. Woods each purchased their respective properties with knowledge of that fact, and when Lowrance purchased lots 9 and 10, he agreed with the town-site company not to erect a wagon or feed yard thereon. Woods has erected his dwelling on the property so purchased by him, and Lowrance and Hardin own a wagon yard establishment on the adjoining property, which was erected after Woods erected his dwelling, and which defendants are threatening to operate as a wagon yard and feed-yard." These findings we think authorized and required the rendition of the judgment perpetuating the injunction. The effect of such a dedication of block 53 by the town-site company, as was found by the jury, was equivalent to a covenant with Woods in the purchase of his property that the company would limit the use of all other lots owned by it in that block to residence purposes, and this covenant was binding upon Lowrance, who had knowledge of such dedication when he purchased the property now proposed to Sikana v. White, 57 Tex. 385; State v. Travis Co., 85 Tex. 441, 21 S. W. 1029; Wolf v. Bass, 72 Tex. 136, 12 S. W. 159; Lewis v. Gollner, 129 N. Y. 227, 29 N. E. 81, 28 Am. St. Rep. 516, 22 Cyc. 862; Anderson v. Rowland, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 460, 44 S. W. 911, and other authorities there cited; also Temple v. Sanborn, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 65, 91 S. W. 1095, and Tallmadge v. Bank, 26 N. Y. 105.

In the case of Anderson v. Rowland, supra, the court quoted with approval the following language from the case of Kirkpatrick v. Peshine, 24 N. J. Eq. 216, which is also quoted in 2 High., Inj. 115-118: "The mere fact that a breach of the covenant is intended is a sufficient ground for the interference of the court by injunction. A covenantee has the right to have the actual enjoyment of the property modo et forma as stipulated for by him. It is no answer to say that the act complained of will inflict no injury on him, or will be even beneficial to him. It is for the plaintiff to judge whether the agreement shall be kept as far as he is concerned, or whether he will permit it to be violated. It is not necessary that he should show that any damage has been done. It being established that the acts of the defendant are a violation of the contract, the court will protect the complainant in the enjoyment of the right he has purchased." In the case of Tallmadge v. Bank, supra, a person owning several lots fronting on a street sold one under a parol agreement that the buildings on the other lots would be set back eight feet from the street, and it was held that an injunction would lie to restrain a subsequent vendee of one of the other lots, with notice of the agreement, from building contrary to this restriction, although his deed was absolute, and without any such restriction.

In appellants' brief their first, second, third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error are all grouped and propositions made under two or more of them raising different and distinct questions of law. This is in violation of the rules for briefing cases on appeal, and the assignments cannot therefore be considered. Evans v. Jackson, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 92 S. W. 48, 49. The same holding applies to appellants' eighteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-second assignments.

Previous to receipt by Lowrance from the town-site company of deed to the property purchased by him, he had made a partial payment, taking a receipt therefor, and appellants contend that the jury should have been directed to find whether or not Lowrance at that time, instead of at the date he received his deed, had notice that block 53 had been designated a residence property exclusively. It does not appear that appellants requested the submission of that issue; and, if a finding by the court favorable to appellee on that issue is necessary to sustains have copied in their brief the receipt taken by Lowrance at the time the first payment was made, which is as follows: "Received of W. J. Lowrance $216.00 in further consideration of the execution of two notes for $216.00 each due in one and two years at 8 per cent. and upon the delivery of said notes the Rotan Town-Site Company will execute a warranty deed." This instrument was not sufficient to support an action by Lowrance for specific performance, and we are of the opinion that the date Lowrance received his deed should be considered the date of his purchase.

Several deeds from the town-site company to persons other than those who were parties to the suit were introduced in evidence over defendants' objections. These deeds contained restrictions against the use of the property conveyed for wagon and feed yards just as were contained in the deed to Woods. The property conveyed in these deeds was in the vicinity of block 53, and the deeds were admissible, as tending to show dedication of that block for residence purposes exclusively.

In addition to the special findings by the jury above noted there were further findings that Lowrance promised Woods that he would not erect a wagon or feed yard on his property before Woods began the erection of his dwelling; that Woods erected his dwelling relying on that promise, and that the use of defendants' property as a wagon and feed yard, in the manner that wagon and feed yards are ordinarily conducted, would create a nuisance to Woods and his family.

Appellants present numerous assignments of error to the submission of some of these issues, to the admission of testimony in support of some, and to the exclusion of testimony offered by defendants upon others, but none of the testimony bears upon the issues passed on by the jury and first-above noted.

As above said, we think the findings by the jury that block 53 had been designated as residence property exclusively, and that the purchase by Woods and Lowrance with notice of that fact, that Woods now occupies his property as a residence, and that defendants are threatening to use their property as a wagon and feed yard, are sufficient to support the judgment rendered by the court; and, as there is nothing in the record to show that the judgment was not rendered upon those findings, the presumption will be indulged that such was the decision of the trial court. Walker v. Cole, 89 Tex. 327, 34 S. W. 713; Moore v. Brown, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 208, 64 S. W. 946; Hardin v. Jones, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 350, 68 S. W. 837.

It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the assignments relating to the other issues, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

WALKER v. EL PASO ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Jan. 13, 1909. On Rehearings, March 17, 1909, and April 14, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 1*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—FELLOW SERVANTS.

Where a master gives the labor of his servant to a third person, without losing the supervision of the servant, the latter does not become a servant of the third person, and a fellow servant with his servants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 257*)—RELATION—NEGLECT OF SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER—PETITION.

A petition in an action for personal injuries received by the negligence of an employé of defendant, while plaintiff and the employé were at work on a machine in defendant's plant, which alleges that plaintiff was placed at work on a machine at the request of an employé of A. and employés of defendant, and that plaintiff acted under the direction of the employé of A. and employés of defendant, and the superintendent of plaintiff's employer, does not show that plaintiff, at the time of the accident, had become an employé of defendant.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 1*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

An agreement between two employers that employés of either will assist the other where necessary, the cost of such labor being charged against the employer employing it, does not make an employé of one of the employers an employé of the other.

On Rehearing.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 277*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff, in the employment of a third person, was engaged in placing electrical machines in the power plant of defendant. He had been engaged for about two weeks, when he was requested by the superintendent of the third person to help the employés of defendant to repair a generator. Plaintiff assisted in repairing the machine, and as the machine was being put into place, a servant of defendant negligently injured plaintiff. Plaintiff's work on the machine was only temporary, and occupied only an hour. Plaintiff, while doing the work, did what he thought was best, and no one was directing him. Held, to warrant a finding for defendant on the theory that plaintiff was defendant's servant, and a fellow servant of the one guilty of the negligence resulting in the injury.

James, C. J., and Fly, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; J. M. Goggin, Judge.

Action by I. B. Walker against the El Paso Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson, Buckler & Woodson, for appellant. Beall & Kemp, Leigh Clark, and Nagle & Scott, for appellee.

FLY, J. Appellant sued appellee for damages arising from the negligence of one of its employés, whereby he lost the first joint of the first finger, and two joints of the second finger, of his left hand. A trial by jury resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee.

The uncontroverted facts show that appellant was in the employment of the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, and was engaged in placing new electrical machines and generators of electricity in the power plant of appellee. He had been so engaged for about two weeks, when he was requested by the superintendent of the Stone-Webster Corporation to help the employés of appellee to repair an old generator that had become so out of repair that it could not be used, and it was needed at once to generate electricity for appellee. He assisted in repairing the machine, and after the repairs had been made, and as the generator was being put into place, he was struck on the hand by one of the employés of appellee, and his fingers injured, as alleged in the petition. Appellant's work on the old generator was merely temporary, and occupied only an hour. There was no one in the employ of appellee exercising control over appellant while at work on the old generator, but we understand from the testimony that the superintendent of his employer was in the same room while he was at work on the generator. Charles Bailey, a witness for appellee, swore that appellant was doing what he thought best, and no one was directing him. Appellant was employed by the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, and was paid by it, and was acting under the direction of its superintendent when he was hurt.

The first assignment of error assails the last paragraph of the following charge given by the court at the request of appellee: "If you believe that at the time of the plaintiff's injury he was an employé of the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, but that he was requested by Mr. W. S. Gould and other employés of defendant, and directed [by] Mr. Ralph, superintendent of the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation to make, or assist in making, repairs on the dynamo, or electric machine of the defendant company on which he was working at the time he was injured, and that in compliance with said request he was making, or assisting in making, said repairs with one Robert Jasmer, an employé of the defendant, the El Paso Electric Railway Company, and that at the time of his injury he was doing the work with said Jasmer for the defendant company, and not for the purpose of expediting the business of the said Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, then you are instructed that in that event the plaintiff, Walker, and the said Jasmer were fellow servants, and the plaintiff could not recover for any injury received under such circumstances by reason of the negligence of the said Jasmer. Therefore, if you believe that at the time of the plaintiff's injury he was an employé of the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, but that he was doing the work that he was doing with the said Jasmer for the defendant company, and not for the purpose of expediting the business of the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, your verdict will be for the defendant." The test as to Jasmer, the offending employé of appellee, being a fellow servant of appellant is: Whose business was being expedited by the work—that of appellant's employer or that of appellee? That is a novel method, when made the sole test, of ascertaining whether or not the relation of fellow servants exists, and we think was erroneous in this case at least. The same rule might have been applied with as much appropriateness if appellant had been working on any other job that his employer had undertaken for appellee, for any work being done by the employer was expediting the business of appellee, and must have been expediting the business of his employer, as it was paid for the labor of appellant. There is no foundation in law for any such test as to who are fellow servants. There was no lending of the servant to appellee, as is assumed by it, but the servant was merely directed to perform certain work for appellee by his employer, and the latter was paid for it. The authorities cited by appellee do not sustain its contention. If appellant was doing the work of his master under its supervision and control, it did not matter at whose request he had been put to work, or whose business his labor was expediting. If his employer chose to give the labor of his servant to appellee, but did not lose the supervision and control of him, he did not thereby become the servant of appellee and a fellow servant with its servants.

It seems to be the well-supported rule that, where a third person is sued for the negligence caused by his servants, the fact of their having been, at the time of the accident, engaged in the same general operation as the injured servant is not sufficient to place him on a different footing from any other stranger suing for damages inflicted by the servants of the same defendant. The doctrine of common employment "applies only where the action is brought for an injury to a servant or agent against the principal by whom such servant was himself employed." Smith v. Railway, 19 N. Y. 127, 75 Am. Dec. 305; Svenson v. Steamship Co., 57 N. Y. 108; Morgan v. Smith, 159 Mass. 570, 35 N. E. 101; Reagan v. Casey, 160 Mass. 374, 36 N. E. 58; Parker v. Railway, 109 Mo. 362, 19 S. W. 1119, 18 L. R. A. 802; Railway v. Billeter, 28 Neb. 422, 44 N. W. 483; Kastl v. Wabash Railway Co., 114 Mich. 56, 72 N. W. 28. The rationale of the doctrine of fellow servants is based on the hypothesis, or assumption, that the servant on entering the service of the master assumes the risk of being injured by the negligence of his employés; and the rule cannot be invoked where no contractual relations have arisen between the injured party and the employer of the servant through whose negligence the injury has been inflicted. The relation of fellow servants cannot be established unless the servants are all under the control and direction of a common master. Shear. & Red. on Neg. 116. The mere fact that servants are working together, and to a common purpose, will not of itself constitute them fellow servants.

In the case of Morgan v. Smith, herein cited, the plaintiff, an employé of Flannagan, was working together with McCarthy, a servant of defendant, in putting a ventilator in a roof belonging to Sears, and the theory of the trial court was that, as the servants were on extra work, not covered by the contract with the employers of both, they were servants of the owner of the house, and fellow servant to each other. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held: "There is no doubt that the general servant of one person may become the servant of another by submitting himself to the control and direction of the other. In such a case the servant becomes the fellow servant of the servants of the person under whose control he comes; and neither his general master nor his special master is liable, if he is injured by the negligence of one of the other servants. * * * Although the servants of different contractors, while engaged in working together on a building, are in a common employment, they are not fellow servants, unless they have a common master. * * * The rule that one fellow servant cannot maintain an action against a common master for an injury occasioned by a fellow servant rests upon the ground that he takes upon himself the natural and ordinary risks incident to the performance of his service." The following language from Shearman & Redfield, § 225, we think forcibly states the rule: "Mere co-operation, or community of labor and ultimate purpose, is not enough to make men fellow servants. They are not fellow servants unless they are all under the control and direction of a common master. Therefore, where a servant works side by side with one employed by his master as an independent contractor, or with a servant of such contractor, or the servant of a contractor works with the servants of a subcontractor, or with the servants of another independent contractor, they are not fellow servants, even though they help to do the same work, for the benefit of the same ultimate employer; and the master of either servant is therefore responsible for an injury caused by such servant's negligence in such work to the other servant."

The Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation did not surrender control of its servant at any time, and could have ordered him away from the old generator at any time.

He may have received orders, in the prosecution of the work, from Gould, who, by the way, was not an employé or appellee, and from employés of appellee, as was alleged in the petition, but that did not operate to change his relations to his master. Johnson v. Netherlands Nav. Co., 132 N. Y. 576, 30 N. E. 505. The control, management, and power to discharge appellant never passed from his employer to appellee even for a moment. The allegations in the petition that he was placed at work on the old generator at the request of Gould, who was an employé of the General Electric Company, and employés of appellee, was not an admission that appellant had become an employé of appellee, nor did the allegation that appellant acted under the direction of Gould, and employés of appellee and the superintendent of his employer, amount to an allegation of a change of service. The allegations showed that appellant never at any time passed from the direction and control of his master. This is a very different case from one in which a servant is loaned by his master to a third party, the latter to have sole control of him. That kind of case would bring it within the rule of a quotation in the case of Kilroy v. Canal Co., 121 N. Y. 22, 24 N. E. 192, from the case of Murray v. Currie, L. R. 6 C. P. 24: "If I lend my servant to a contractor, who is to have the sole control and superintendence of the work contracted for, the independent contractor is alone liable for any wrongful act done by the servant while so employed." The New York Court of Appeals, however, drew the distinction between the case from which the quotation was taken and the one it was considering as follows: "To make that case fit the one before us we must first determine that the stevedore in unloading the coal was entirely independent of the captain, who had no right in any manner to interfere with the process of unloading; and then we must further find that he was employed by the stevedore as his servant to do the work." To apply the quotation to this case we must, in order to make appellant a fellow servant with the employés of appellee, find that, while working on the old generator, he was under the sole control of appellee, and his employer had no right, in any manner, to interfere with him in the work, and that he had been employed by appellee to do the work. No such case arises from the allegations or testimony.

The agreement between the employer of appellant and appellee "that laborers or workmen or employés of either company would assist the other when necessary, the cost of such labor being billed against the company that employed it" did not make appellant an employé of appellee, and did not bring him within the scope of the decisions in Railway v. Taylor (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S.

were cases where the servant was working in yards owned by several railway companies, and was in fact working for all of them. The servants in those cases were employed to serve the several companies in their yards, and the courts held that each of them was liable, as the master, for any negligence towards the servants. It would, we think, be an absurdity to hold that appellant was an employé of appellee, under the circumstances of this case, no matter what secret agreement the employer and appellee may have had with each other. Appellant worked for the Stone-Webster Corporation, and only on this one occasion was ordered by his master to help in a piece of work for appellee. It follows that the special charge complained of in the second assignment of error was erroneous, and should not have been given. That charge made appellant's relation to the servants of appellee rest on the secret agreement between appellee and the employer of appellant. Under that charge the parties by a secret agreement, in no manner outwardly manifested to appellant, could place him in the position of a servant of a corporation who was unknown to him in his contract of employment, and with whom he could not possibly have had any privity of contract. Railway v. Ferch, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 46, 44 S. W. 317; Railway v. Martin, 113 Tenn. 266, 87 S. W. 423; Zelgler v. Railway, 52 Conn. 543, 2 Atl. 465; Brennan v. Iron Co., 74 Conn. 382, 50 Atl. 1030.

In the cited case of Zelgler v. Railway the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant, but the latter claimed immunity from liability for injuries to its employé on the ground that there was an agreement between it and another railway, over whose line its trains were run for parts of the distance, by which the employés of the defendant became the employés of the other road when the train passed onto the track of the latter. The claim was that the employé of the latter road, through whose negligence the injury was inflicted, was the fellow servant of the plaintiff. The Supreme Court of Connecticut said: "No consideration of public policy will sustain this defense, because the public are not at all interested in the question, as they are in questions concerning innkeepers and common carriers. They are only interested to have the law justly and fairly administered. No considerations of justice will sustain it, because the plaintiff had no relation whatever to the negligent conductor. It was not his duty to observe his conduct. He had no opportunity to do so, and no opportunity to guard against the consequences of his negligence. We have shown that the defense can have no foundation in any contract to which plaintiff was a party, or which can justly affect him. If, therefore, the plaintiff may in any sense be regarded as in the service of the defendant, he is clearly without the reason of the rule, and therefore not within the rule itself. But he cannot in any proper sense be regarded as the servant of the defendant." It would, as stated in that opinion, be an absurdity to hold that appellant's employer, could be changed in an instant, without his knowledge or consent, by the order of the only employer he knew, under some secret arrangement between that employer and another corporation. If appellant was the employé of the Stone-Webster Engineering Corporation, and was working on the old generator subject to the control of his master, it would not matter whose business was being furthered by his work; he would still be in the employment of his master, and the court erred in making his relation to the employes turn on the question of whose interests were being advanced by his work. We do not think the evidence tended to show that appellant was lent by his employer to appellee, and was under the sole control and management of appellee, when he was injured, and that issue should not have been submitted.

The fifth assignment is not well taken. The relation of appellant to appellee's employes was not determined by the question of whether the work inured to the benefit of his master, but on the question of whether he had passed from the control of his employer to that of appellee. Appellant was not a volunteer, but was either in the employ of one master or another. If, with the knowledge and consent of an employé, he is placed in charge of another to perform his work, he would thereby, at least temporarily, pass from the control of one master to that of another, as was held in the case of Hasty v. Sears, 157 Mass. 123, 31 N. E. 759, 34 Am. St. Rep. 267, by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. In that case a servant of Noyes & Co. was sent to repair an elevator for the defendant. He was told by that firm that he would be under the superintendence of the defendant, and he was instructed what to do by the defendant. He was not under the control of his general employer, and he knew it, and had accepted the situation. He was hurt by the negligence of another employé of the defendant, and the court said: "It is obvious that C. A. Noyes & Co. were not contractors. The transaction between them and the defendant was the loan by them to the defendant of their servant, the plaintiff, who was to be under the control of the defendant, by his superintendent, while engaged in the work. This made the plaintiff pro hac vice a servant of the defendant. * * * The plaintiff was not acting under the immediate orders of his general masters, C. A. Noyes & Co., but was acting under the orders of the defendant's superintendent, and thus became the defendant's servant, notwithstanding that he remained the general servant of Noyes & Co., and was paid by them."

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

On Rehearing.

NEILL, J. The main questions in this case are: Was plaintiff, as an employé of the Stone-Webster Company, directed by its manager to assist the employes of the Electric Railway Company in removing or adjusting its dynamo, and was he doing such work in furtherance of his master's business when he was injured? The affirmative of these questions must appear to entitle him to recover. Labatt's Master & Servant, § 632. For in that event he cannot be regarded as a volunteer in the defendant's service, or a fellow servant of Jasmer, either of which would defeat his action. Labatt's Master & Servant, §§ 630, 631. If he was not injured while doing the work under the direction of Ralph, the Stone-Webster Company's manager, in furtherance of his master's business, he must, for the time, be regarded either as Jasmer's fellow servant or a mere volunteer. Hence, the court having correctly instructed the jury that plaintiff was entitled to recover if he was directed by the manager of the Stone-Webster Company to assist the defendant's servants to do work which was being done in furtherance of the company's business, and was injured by the negligence of Jasmer while engaged in such work, it can make no difference whether the special charge, copied in our original opinion, and complained of by the first assignment of error, presenting the question of whether plaintiff and Jasmer were fellow servants, was correct or not; especially as the special charge itself required the jury to believe that plaintiff was doing the work with Jasmer for defendant, and not for the purpose of expediting the business of the Stone-Webster Company, before they could find for defendant upon the theory that plaintiff and Jasmer were fellow servants. While the charge is justly subject to the criticism contained in the main opinion, we believe the error it contains is, under the peculiar facts of this case, harmless.

We regard special charge No. 4, complained of by the second assignment of error, in the same light. While an agreement between the Stone-Webster Company and defendant company that either should, at the request of the other, furnish it the services of its employes, could not, without the knowledge or assent of the servant of one, make him the servant of the other (Labatt's Master & Servant, § 630), yet, as the charge simply presents a state of facts which would make the plaintiff a volunteer in defendant's service, the plaintiff was in no way prejudiced by it.

The law pertinent to the issues of fact was properly presented to the jury by the court's main charge, the errors in the special charges given were harmless, and the verdict FLY, J. I adhere to the original opinion delivered herein, and do not concur with the foregoing opinion.

On Appellant's Motion for Rehearing.

JAMES, C. J. It is proper that I should give my reasons for agreeing to an affirmance of this judgment.

No question existed as to Walker having been a volunteer. That question is not in the case.

The court, by the sixth clause of the charge, directed the jury to find for the plaintiff if they found that Walker's employer, the Stone-Webster Engineering & Construction Company, directed him to assist in the removal and adjustment of defendant's dynamo, and he did so for and in behalf of the Stone-Webster Company, and for the purpose of facilitating or expediting the work of said company, and he was not under the supervision or direction of the defendant at the time, but was doing the work for said Stone & Webster Company, and was negligently injured by Jasmer, without negligence on his part. Appellant states in this motion: "The contention of the plaintiff (appellant) has been and is that plaintiff was not the fellow servant of Jasmer if he was doing the work in furtherance of his own master's business, even though he had not been directed to do so by his own master, and that he was not such fellow servant, even though he was not acting in furtherance of his own master's business, provided the jury should believe from the evidence that he was acting under the direction and control of his own master, and was not under the control, direction, or supervision of the defendant." It seems to me that the sixth clause of the charge, above quoted, submitted the case in accordance with appellant's theory.

By the seventh clause of the charge the jury were allowed to find for defendant if plaintiff was under the control, supervision, and direction of the defendant, and was not loaned for the purpose of facilitating the work of the Stone-Webster Company. This was the only theory upon which the jury were authorized to find for the defendant, and thus the verdict in favor of defendant settles two facts, viz.: That plaintiff was under the supervision and direction of the defendant, and that the work being done was not that of the Stone & Webster Company. The view taken by the district judge of the test of the relation of fellow servants in this case was, I think, the correct one, in addition to its being the one which appellant's counsel admit was their own contention.

ble to the direction and control of his master, or becomes subject to the party to whom he is loaned or hired. Munsie v. Springfield Breweries Company, and cases there cited, 200 Mass. 79, 85 N. E. 840. Also, see, long list of cases cited in Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 215, 29 Sup. Ct. 255, 53 L. Ed. —. The jury, under the charges, could not have found for defendant without having found the facts above stated. The verdict establishes for the purposes of this appeal that the work that was being done was not to facilitate or expedite the business of the Stone-Webster Company; and, if there was any issue in the evidence as to plaintiff's being subject to the direction of the defendant while engaged in the particular work, that issue was settled also by the verdict, but it appears to me that all the evidence indicates that, while so engaged, he was not acting under the supervision or direction of the Stone-Webster Company.

The evidence discloses, however, that the Stone-Webster Company was under an agreement with defendant to furnish this kind of assistance when called on, and the argument founded upon this seems to be that it establishes that plaintiff was working for and in the interest of that company, while engaged in performing its contract. My opinion is that this fact is immaterial, when its control did not follow the servant, for the interest of said company extended no further than the loan of the servant; and, when it sent its servant, it had performed its contract, and had no further interest in the matter. It had no interest in the work, or in the manner in which it was being performed.

The motion is overruled.

INTERNATIONAL & G. N. R. CO. v. McCULLOUGH.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 17, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 14, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 215*)—INFECTIOUS DISEASES—LIABILITY.

Where cattle were not injured by being unloaded from cars, but by being put in infected pens after unloading and after the carrier's agent had assured the shipper, ignorant of the danger of infection, that there was no danger, the fact that they were unloaded in violation of the regulations of the United States Department of Agriculture did not defeat a recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 210*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—DUTY TO FURNISH PENS.

A carrier must furnish reasonably safe pens for cattle unloaded en route, especially where a delay is caused by its failure to connect with a connecting carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 215*)—INFECTIOUS DISEASES—REGULATIONS OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The quarantine regulations of the United States Department of Agriculture as to where cattle may be unloaded in Texas refer only to cattle shipped from one state to another, and are for the protection of other cattle at the point of destination, and a violation of such regulations by a carrier of cattle from a northern state through Texas to Mexico does not defeat a recovery in the absence of evidence that cattle in Mexico could be infected, or that Mexico was a territory in whose favor the quarantine was established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 529*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

An expert may testify that cattle suffering from splenetic fever were infected by having been placed in infected pens and there kept over night, on it appearing that the fever developed a few days later.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2338; Dec. Dig. § 529.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A party cannot complain of the admission of testimony in support of a fact established by other evidence received without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—INFECTIOUS DISEASES—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—CUSTOM AS TO DISINFECTION OF CARS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a shipment of cattle from a northern state through Texas to Mexico, resulting from their becoming infected with a disease, proof of a custom as to the disinfection of cars from the South was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—DISINFECTION OF CARS.

A shipper of cattle from the North through Texas to Mexico, knowing what the condition of the cars furnished by the carrier indicated, was competent to testify that the cars had the appearance of having been disinfected before the cattle were placed in them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—INFECTIOUS DISEASES—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a shipment of live stock from a northern state through Texas to Mexico, resulting from their being infected with a disease, the exclusion of a rule of the Bureau of Animal Industry referring to interstate shipments, and enacted for the protection of cattle at the point to which a shipment is destined, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

9. CARRIERS (§ 217*)—INFECTIOUS DISEASES—INJURY TO LIVE STOCK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action against a carrier for injuries to a shipment of live stock from the North to Mexico through Texas in consequence of their being infected with a disease, it appeared that the carrier knew that pens into which the cattle were placed were infected, and that the agent in charge of the shipment did not, but acted on the assurance of the carrier, the shipper was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Bexar County Court; P. H. Shook, Judge.

Action by C. H. McCullough against the International & Great Northern Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

King & Morris and Hicks & Hicks, for appellant. H. E. Vernor and Joseph Ryan, for appellee.

FLY, J. Appellee alleged in his petition: That on July 28, 1905, he shipped from Batavia, Ill., to the city of Mexico, 88 head of Holstein milk cows; that en route the cattle were delivered to appellant, by its connecting carriers, at Taylor, Tex., on July 31st, and were transported to Laredo, Tex., by appellant, which point they reached on August 1st too late to be crossed into Mexico, until next morning, and on account of the great heat and the length of time the cattle had been on the train it became necessary to unload them and place them in pens provided by appellant; that the pens were infested with insects, which gave the cattle a fever known as "Texas" or "splenetic" fever, from which four of the cows died, and great expense was incurred in connection with the disease of the other cattle, to appellee's damage in the sum of $600. Appellant answered by general and special exceptions, and that appellant was forced to unload the cattle at Laredo by the agent of appellee in charge of them, and that they were unloaded contrary to the laws and rules of the Department of Agriculture of the United States. The court sustained a demurrer to the latter portion of the answer, and, on the cause being tried by jury, a verdict and judgment for appellee were rendered in the sum of $350.

The plea of contributory negligence as to the unloading of the cattle was properly stricken out. If such an improbable proposition could be entertained of one man forcing a railroad company to unload cattle, still it was no defense to the action to allege that the cattle were unloaded in defiance of a regulation of a governmental department. The cattle were not injured by being unloaded, but by being put in infected pens. In view of the testimony, had the plea been a proper one, it would not form a ground of reversal, because it appeared that the unloading of the cattle was not forced, as alleged, by the agent of appellee, but were only unloaded after appellant's agent had given the assurance that there was not "a particle of danger in putting the cattle there." The agent of appellee was not a cattleman, and knew nothing of the danger of infection, and acted on the advice of an employé of appellant. Appellant was the active agent in unloading the cattle, and cannot screen itself from responding in damages because it may have been a violation of law to unload the cattle. It was not the unloading, but the confinement in infected pens, that the evidence showed was the proximate cause of the damages sustained by appellee. The employé of appellant did not swear that any force was used to have the cattle unloaded, but merely that a request was made that they be unloaded. He did not warn the agent of appellee of the danger of placing the cattle in the pens. It was the duty of appellants to furnish reasonably safe pens for the cattle after they had been unloaded, especially as the delay was caused by its failure to connect with the Mexico train. The evidence showed that the fever that seized the cattle and caused the damage was occasioned by the use of the pens that had previously been used by Texas cattle. The regulations of the Department of Agriculture, as to where cattle could be unloaded in Texas, have reference only to cattle being shipped from one state to another, and are for the protection of other cattle at the point of destination, and not for the safety of the cattle being shipped. There was no evidence tending to show that cattle in Mexico could be infected by cattle with splenic fever, or that Mexico was in a territory in whose favor the quarantine was established. On the other hand, it would naturally be supposed that, if ticks would create splenic fever on one side of the Rio Grande, they would on the other.

Sam O. Bell and J. M. Vance, witnesses for appellant, were asked on cross-examination if the cattle raised in Illinois were in good health and condition when they left Illinois in latter part of July, destined to Mexico City, and were not unloaded except at Laredo, south of the quarantine line, and were unloaded there and placed in pens which were used for native cattle, and were kept there over night, and a few days after had ticks on them and developed Texas fever, what in their opinion caused the fever, and they answered that their opinion was that it originated by infection in the pens at Laredo. The only objection to the evidence was that it was an "invasion of the province of the jury." In what way it invaded the jury's domain is not made to appear in the two bills of exceptions. There is nothing to indicate that the objection was made because the witness had not qualified as an expert, and the only proposition under the two assignments of error complaining of the admission of the evidence is that:

"An expert witness will be allowed to testify of matters of which he has peculiar knowledge by reason of his experience; but he must testify to facts, and allow the jury to draw its conclusions therefrom, and will not be allowed to invade the province of the jury and decide the very question." If the witnesses had qualified as experts, which is not denied by appellant, they could answer the hypothetical question, although it may have been decisive of the very matter in issue. Scalf v. Collin County, 80 Tex. 514, 16 S. W. 314; Railway v. Bohan (Tex. Civ. App.) 47 S. W. 1050; Railway v. Rogers (Tex. Civ. App.) 113 S. W. 583. The question and answer related to a question purely of fact, and not a mixed one of law and fact. The authorities cited by appellant are not in point.

There was no evidence tending to show that the agent of appellee caused the cattle to be placed in the pens of appellant, and a charge based on that hypothesis was properly refused. The charge is objectionable also because not conditioned on a knowledge by the agent of appellee of the danger of placing the cattle in the pens tendered by appellant. There was no evidence tending to show that appellee's agent knew of any danger attending the use of the pens.

The sixth assignment of error assails the testimony of appellee, admitted by the court, that the danger in the acclimatization of cattle consisted, not in becoming accustomed to the heat, but to the ticks. The same facts were proved by Vance and Bell, without objection on the part of appellant. Vance swore: "There is slight danger that such stock will become infected with any fatal malady or distemper merely from the weather or heat, while passing through the country below the quarantine line and before they reach the high altitudes of Mexico." Bell testified: "Holstein cows, when shipped from Illinois into Southwest Texas, through Bexar and Webb counties, have great trouble in getting acclimated on account of the infection of the ticks. They do not suffer any more from the heat and temperature after being acclimated than the native cattle. It is not the heat that kills them. * * * I do not think the heat would cause the fever." It was testified by appellee that all cattle cars coming from the South are disinfected by the railroad companies, and that the cars in question had been ordered from Chicago, being cars specially adapted to the purpose, and he also testified that when the cars reached the city of Mexico they had the appearance of having been disinfected before the cattle were placed in them. All that testimony was objected to because it was irrelevant and immaterial and was hearsay and a conclusion of the witness. Proof of a custom as to the disinfection of cars from the South was admissible. Railway v. Henning (Tex.

could obtain such knowledge from the appearance of the cars as to testify as to their inspection, it should, by cross-examination, have tested the knowledge of the witness. He was a shipper, by occupation, of cattle from the North to Mexico, through Texas, and placed himself in a position to testify as to what the condition of the cars indicated.

The court did not err in excluding the rule of the Bureau of Animal Industry. That rule has reference to interstate shipments, and is for the protection of the cattle at the point to which the shipment is destined. If it had been shown that the cattle, under that rule, should not have been unloaded at Laredo, it would not have exonerated appellant from its negligence in furnishing infected pens for the cattle. If it would, it would have been a defense to the wanton shooting of the cattle when they were unloaded, just as well.

The proposition of appellant under the eleventh assignment of error is based on the assumption that the cattle were "unloaded at the request of plaintiff or his agent over the objection" of appellant, while the evidence does not support any such theory. Sloan swore that the agent of appellant told him that there was not "a particle of danger in putting the cattle" in the pens. It is true that he told Sloan that the pens were kept for native cattle, but, instead of warning Sloan of the danger of using the pens, assured him of their perfect safety. The court did not err in refusing to instruct a verdict for appellant. Appellant seems to labor under the impression that it was the duty of the shipper to know all about the quarantine rules and about splenic fever, and his duty to see the pens disinfected, and if he, under stress of circumstances brought about by appellant, unloaded his cattle and placed them in pens which appellant assured him were not dangerous, he cannot recover. Appellant knew about the quarantine; there is nothing to show that Sloan, appellee's agent, did. Appellant knew the pens were infected; Sloan did not, but acted on the assurance of appellant that they were not infected. The agent of appellee was deceived by the agent of appellant, and there could be no contributory negligence on his part.

The evidence was sufficient to show that the cattle were infected in the pens at Laredo. Two of appellant's expert witnesses swore that, under all the facts, they concluded that the fever was contracted from ticks which got on the cattle in appellant's pens in Laredo.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 333*)—CONFORMITY TO EVIDENCE.

—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO EVIDENCE. In an action to recover for architect's plans, plaintiff alleged a contract to prepare the plans for $1,000, and testified that defendant "fully understood and I had told" him that the charges "would be on the basis of 3½ per cent." of the estimated value of the building, and that defendant agreed to the charges, that the estimated value was from $30,000 to $34,000 "and my charge was finally placed at $1,000," that it was understood between the parties that plaintiff was to furnish the plans "at the standard compensation," and that plaintiff "explained the system of charges we have and which I always follow." Held, that an instruction to find for plaintiff if the jury believed that plaintiff furnished the plans, and that defendant agreed to pay $1,000 for them, was erroneous as not supported by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action to recover for architect's plans under an alleged contract to pay $1,000 for the plans, there was testimony that the charge was to be 3½ per cent. on the estimated value of the building, which was from $30,000 to $34,000, and that plaintiff finally placed his charge at $1,000. Defendant introduced testimony to show that the building was to cost not more than $18,000. Held, that an instruction to find for plaintiff if the jury believed that plaintiff furnished the plans, and that defendant agreed to pay $1,000 for them, was not harmless error, as it ignores defendant's testimony, which would make the amount to be charged for the plans less than $1,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 346*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—ISSUES AND PROOF.

In an action to recover for architect's plans, the only questions made by the pleadings were whether defendant became bound to pay plaintiff any sum of money on account of the plans, and, if he did, what sum? Held, that evidence as to defendant's financial condition was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

4. CONTRACTS (§ 338*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—PLEADINGS—IMMATERIAL ALLEGATIONS.

In an action to recover for architect's plans furnished under a contract to pay a specific price therefor, defendant alleged that, by the terms of the agreement between himself and plaintiff, defendant was to buy a building site, plaintiff was to prepare plans for a building and negotiate a loan to pay for the construction of the building, and that it was understood between them that if a loan was not secured plaintiff was not to be entitled to anything on account of the plans, and that he was not, and plaintiff knew he was not, able to purchase the site and construct the building unless a loan was secured. Held, that the last allegation was an immaterial one, and should have been stricken from the answer on exceptions thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 400*)—DEFECTS—WAIVER BY FAILURE TO OBJECT.

In an action on a contract to furnish defendant plans for a building, an immaterial allegation in the answer as to defendant's financial condition was not rendered material by failure to object thereto or by the admission of testimony tending to establish its truth.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 409.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 75*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY BY REASON OF ADMISSION OF SIMILAR EVIDENCE.

In an action on a contract to furnish architect's plans, testimony as to defendant's financial condition is not rendered admissible by the admission of other irrelevant testimony without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

7. CONTRACTS (§ 353*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on a contract to furnish architect's plans, where there was evidence that the plans were to be supplied for a certain percentage of the estimated value of the building, and defendant's evidence showed that the building was not to exceed $18,000, while the evidence of plaintiff was that it was to cost $30,000 or more, an instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence that defendant employed plaintiff to draw plans for a building to cost not more than $18,000, and they believed that plaintiff furnished the plans for a building which would cost $30,000 or more, plaintiff cannot recover, was not rendered erroneous by adding, "unless defendant accepted the plans drawn, and this with knowledge of the excess in cost to erect the building," as submitting an estoppel of defendant to deny liability if he had accepted the plans with knowledge that they were of a building to cost in excess of the sum contemplated when the contract was entered into.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

8. ATTACHMENT (§ 232*) — GROUNDS FOR QUASHING—CONFLICT BETWEEN PLEADING AND AFFIDAVIT.

Under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 186, subd. 2, authorizing the issuance of an attachment when plaintiff makes affidavit that defendant "is not a resident of the state," it is not a ground for quashing an attachment in which the affidavit stated that defendant is not a resident of the state, that there are averments in the complaint that defendant is temporarily within the state, as a person may be a nonresident of the state and at the same time be within its boundaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

9. ATTACHMENT (§ 228*) — GROUNDS FOR QUASHING—UNCERTAINTY AS TO AMOUNT.

An attachment should not be quashed because of uncertainty in the amount sued for, where the petition alleges an undertaking on defendant's part to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of certain plans to be prepared by plaintiff, and in the affidavit to the petition plaintiff swore that defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $1,050, and in the prayer for the attachment plaintiff alleges that the debt, interest, and costs "will amount to the sum of $1,000."

Appeal from District Court, Palo Pinto County; W. J. Oxford, Judge.

Action by R. H. Parry against J. T. Hall. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Gross & Allen, for appellant. Stevenson & Ritchie and F. C. Highsmith, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. The action was by appellee. In his amended petition he alleged that appellant had employed him as an architect to prepare plans and specifications for a stone and concrete building to be erected by appellant, and had agreed to pay him $1,000 for same. He then alleged performance on his part of the contract, and a refusal on the part of appellant to pay the $1,000. In another count in his said petition, appellee alleged that he prepared the plans, etc., at appellant's special instance and request, that they were reasonably worth $1,000, and that appellant had refused to pay for them. On the ground that appellant was a nonresident of the state, appellee had a writ of attachment issued. The writ was levied upon a tract of land belonging to appellant. The appeal is prosecuted from a judgment in appellee's favor for said sum of $1,000, and foreclosing the lien of the attachment on the land.

The court instructed the jury to find for appellee and to assess his damages at \$1,000, if they believed from the evidence that he had made and furnished the plans, etc., and further believed that appellant had agreed and promised to pay him \$1,000 for them. Appellant insists that there was no evidence of an undertaking on his part to pay \$1,000 for the plans, etc., and that the instruction therefore was erroneous. On the trial appellee testified as follows: "From the first time that Mr. Hall came into my office until the delivery of the plans, etc., at Shreveport, it was fully understood, and I had told Mr. Hall that my charges for the work of making the plans complete would be on the basis of 3½ per cent. of the estimated valuation of the building to be erected, and an additional 1½ per cent. on the value, if I superintended the work of construction, and Hall agreed to these charges. * * * My charge for the services rendered was based on an estimated cost for the building of \$30,000. In the frequent talks and conferences with Mr. Hall, we had an estimated value of the building construction of from \$30,000 to \$34,000, and my charge was finally placed at \$1,000." Appellee insists that the testimony just recited raised the issue submitted by the instruction complained of, but we do not think it sufficient to support a finding that appellant had agreed to pay \$1,000 for the plans, etc. It may be inferred that appellee meant that at the conclusion, and as a result of the frequent talks and conferences he referred to, his "charge" was finally placed at \$1,000; but we do not think it should be further inferred that he meant when it was so placed appellant agreed and undertook to pay it. That such was his meaning was not consistent with other portions of his testimony following that we have quoted. "In the case of Mr. Hall," he testified, "as in all other cases, the charge of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the estimated value was payable unconditionally. * * * It was understood between Mr. Hall and myself that I was to furnish him the plans as heretofore mentioned, at the standard compensation for the work. * * * There was very little said between myself and Mr. Hall as to what I would charge him for the work. He asked me what I would charge him, and I told him, and explained the system of charges we have, and which I always follow." The "standard compensation" and "system of charges" appellee referred to was stated by him to be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the estimated value of the building for preparing the plans and specifications therefor, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for superintending the construction thereof. Considered together, we think the issue made by appellee's testimony was not whether appellant had contracted to pay him \$1,000 for the plans, etc., but whether he had contracted to pay him therefor $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the estimated cost of the building or not. Therefore we think the instruction complained of was erroneous.

Appellee insists, however, that, if the instruction was erroneous, it was so in favor of appellant, and that he should not be heard to complain of it. The contention is based on appellee's testimony to the effect that the building was to cost not less than \$30,000, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of which would be \$1,050; but to sustain the contention on such a ground would be to ignore the testimony of appellant that the building was to cost not exceeding \$18,000, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of which sum would be \$630, or \$370 less than the amount found by the jury. The finding of the jury reasonably cannot be referred to the evidence tending to establish a contract to pay for the plans, etc., on a percentage basis, because an issue as to such a contract was not submitted to them by the court's charge. Fairly it cannot be referred to an undertaking implied on the part of appellant to pay the reasonable value of the plans, etc., because, while there may have been testimony in the case from which the jury might have concluded that the reasonable value of the plans, etc., was a sum either greater or less than \$1,000, there was no testimony from which they could have concluded that it was no greater and no less than \$1,000 as found by them. It is clear, we think, that the verdict of the jury must be referred to the issue erroneously submitted to them, and therefore that it should not be held that the instruction complained of was harmless. Stanford v. Wright, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 346, 92 S. W. 269; H. & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Gilmore, 62 Tex. 301; Altgelt v. Brister, 57 Tex. 436; Adamson v. Shiel (Tex. App.) 18 S. W. 464; Moore v. Boothe, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 339, 87 S. W. 882; Wood v. Texas Produce Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 499.

Over appellant's objection on the grounds that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against him, the court permitted the witness Moseley to testify that appellant represented to him that he was worth about $100,000, owned lumber enough to build a city like Mineral Wells, and was there for the purpose of purchasing a site upon which to construct "a $30,000 or $40,000 hotel." And over appellant's objection on like grounds, the court permitted appellee on his cross-examination of appellant, testifying as a witness, to prove by him that he might have told Moseley that he "had timber enough in Louisiana to build a town like Mineral Wells, if it was cut up." In his pleadings appellant had alleged that, by the terms of the agreement between appellee and himself, he was to buy a building site from Highsmith, when appellee was to prepare the plans, etc., and negotiate a loan for him (appellant) of money sufficient to pay for the construction of an hotel upon the site. He further alleged that it was understood between them that, in the event a loan for the purpose of building the hotel was not secured, appellee was not to be entitled to demand or receive anything on account of the plans, etc., to be prepared by him. Appellant further alleged that he had so stated to appellee, and that appellee knew he could not purchase the site and construct the hotel unless such a loan was secured. On his direct examination he had testified that he did not at the time of the transactions between himself and appellee have money enough to buy the lot and build the hotel, and that appellee knew it. The testimony objected to should not have been admitted as evidence. Appellant's financial condition was not an issue in the case. The questions made by the pleadings were: (1) Did appellant become bound to pay appellee any sum of money on account of the plans, etc.? (2) If he did, what sum? In determining these questions, whether he was worth $1 or $100,000 was of no importance. He might have entered into the contract as claimed by appellee, notwithstanding he was worth only $1. He might have declined to enter into it had he been worth $100,000.

Appellee insists, however, that, if the evidence was inadmissible, appellant should not be heard to complain of it in the face of the allegation in his pleadings to which we have referred, to wit, that appellee knew he could not buy the lot and construct the hotel unless the loan was secured, and on account of his testimony on his direct examination as a witness, to which we have also referred, to wit, that he did not have enough money with which to buy the lot and build the hotel. The allegation in the answer referred to, to the effect that appellant was not, and that appellee knew he was not, able to construct the proposed hotel unless the loan was secured, was an immaterial one. It did not present a reason why appellee should not recover against him as prayed for. It doubtless would have been stricken from the an-evidence. Nor, on the other hand, was the testimony of appellant referred to rendered material by reason of the fact that appellee had failed to except to and have stricken out the allegation in the answer which it tended to support. In so far therefore as the testimony of the witness Moseley was admitted for the purpose of impeaching appellant, relating as it did to an immaterial matter, it was error to admit it as evidence. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Phillips, 91 Tex. 278, 42 S. W. 852. In so far as the testimony objected to was for any other purpose, it clearly was irrelevant, and we do not think it was rendered admissible because other irrelevant testimony without objection thereto had been admitted.

The court instructed the jury: "If you believe from the evidence in the case that the defendant employed the plaintiff to draw plans and specifications for a hotel to cost not exceeding $18,000, and you further believe from the evidence that plaintiff furnished the plans and specifications of a hotel building which would cost more than $18,000, and would cost $30,000, or more, then you are charged that the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, unless defendant accepted the plans drawn, and this with knowledge of the excess in cost to erect the building." The objection urged to the instruction is that it was upon an issue not made by the pleadings and the evidence. As we understand appellant, his contention is that the instruction should not have been qualified by the language, "unless defendant accepted the plans as drawn, and this with knowledge of the excess in cost to erect said building," because it bound him by matter in estoppel which had not been pleaded. We do not think the qualification objected to should be regarded as submitting an estoppel as against appellant to deny liability if he had accepted the plans with knowledge that they were of a building to cost in excess of the sum contemplated when the contract was entered into. If the contract as originally made was for plans of a building to cost not exceeding $18,000, as claimed by appellant, the effect of appellant's accepting plans tendered to him by appellee, knowing they were of a building to cost in excess of $18,000, it seems to us; would be to change the terms of the contract in that particular, and render him liable on the contract as so changed. We cannot say that the contract as so changed is not the one declared upon in the petition. If it was, then the court did not err in instructing the jury as complained of, and did not err in refusing to instruct them as requested by appellant in special charges asked.

Appellant complains of the action of the court in overruling his motion to quash the attachment. The grounds stated in the motion, and the affidavit and petition state inconsistent facts as to the residence of defendant;" and (2) that the amount sued for was "uncertain and incapable of being arrived at except by conjecture on part of jury."

With reference to the ground first mentioned, it may be stated that in his petition appellee alleged that appellant "is a nonresident of the state of Texas, but is a transient person, now temporarily staying in Palo Pinto county, Tex.," and that in his affidavit for the attachment appellee averred that appellant was "not a resident of the state of Texas." The allegation in the petition showing that the court to which the suit was brought might by service of a citation in the ordinary way have acquired jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against appellant, he contends that the fact that he may have been a nonresident of the state did not authorize the suing out of the attachment. We think the contention should be overruled. The question presented is not as to the effect of a showing by proper pleading and proof that the affidavit was false, because appellant was not in fact a nonresident of the state within the meaning of the statute, but is as to the effect of supposed contradictory averments in the affidavit and petition. The statute in terms authorizes the issuance of an attachment when the plaintiff makes an affidavit that the defendant "is not a resident of the state." Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 186, subd. 2. When such an affidavit is made, we do not think the fact that it appears from other averments in the pleadings that the defendant is temporarily in the state is a sufficient reason for quashing the proceedings. The averment in the affidavit that appellant was a nonresident of the state was not inconsistent with the allegation in the petition that he was temporarily staying in the state. A person may be a nonresident of the state within the meaning of the statute, and at the same time be within its boundaries. 3 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 199; Greene v. Beckwith, 38 Mo. 384; Hickson v. Brown, 92 Ga. 225, 17 S. E. 1035; Wallace & Sons v. Castle, 68 N. Y. 370.

With reference to the other ground urged as a reason why the attachment should be quashed, it may be stated that, while appellee in his original petition did not allege an undertaking on appellant's part to pay him a specific sum for the plans, etc., but only their reasonable value, in his affidavit to said petition he swore that appellant was indebted to him in a specific sum, to wit, $1,050. Even if the allegations of the petition alone should be looked to in determining the contention made, we think it should be overruled. Stiff v. Fisher, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 346, 21 S. W. 202; Waples-Platter Grocery

Co. v. Basham, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 638, 29 S. W. 1118; Evans v. Breneman (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 80; McKay v. Elder (Tex. Civ. App.) 92 S. W. 288; Hockstadler v. Sam, 73 Tex. 315, 11 S. W. 408; 3 A. & E. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 189. The authorities cited establish in effect that where the recovery is sought on a contract either express or implied, and the "damages claimed are actual and capable of estimation by the usual means of evidence, and not resting wholly or in part in the discretion of the jury," an attachment may be sued out. Hockstadler v. Sam, 73 Tex. 315, 11 S. W. 409. Appellant's demand, as set out in his original petition, was for a sum alleged to be due on a contract, and the damages claimed were "actual and capable of estimation by the usual means of evidence," and did not rest "wholly or in part in the discretion of the jury." In Stiff v. Fisher, supra, the action was to recover a sum of money paid on a contract for the purchase of certain cattle, and also to recover, as damages on account of the defendant's failure to deliver the cattle as agreed upon, the difference between the market value and the contract price thereof. The defendant's motion to quash the attachment issued against his property to enforce the plaintiff's demand, on the ground that it was unliquidated, was overruled. On appeal the refusal to quash the attachment proceedings was held not to be error. After quoting from the opinion in Fisher v. Consequa, 2 Wash. C. C. 384, Fed. Cas. No. 4,816, the statement of Mr. Justice Washington "that the uncertainty of the sum due does not, in the common understanding of mankind," render a sum due by an express contract any less a debt, the court in the Stiff-Fisher Case said: "It is true in that case," referring to Fisher v. Consequa, supra, "there was an express promise to pay this difference; while, in the case here submitted, there was but an implied promise to pay the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place of delivery. In some of the cases, however, cited by Mr. Drake (Drake, Attachm. §§ 12-23), there was no express promise. We are of the opinion that the words 'debt' and 'demand,' as used in our attachment statute, should not be so restricted in their meaning and scope as appellants contend, and that no error was committed in overruling the motion to quash the attachment. While a strict compliance on the part of the attaching creditor with the statute has been steadily enforced in this state, it seems to us that, in construing the meaning of the law itself, to adopt an illiberal rule is to disregard the expressed will of the Legislature. Rev. St. 1895, final title, section 8." We do not think the allegation in the original petition, in connection with the prayer for the attachment, that appellee's debt, interest and costs "will amount to the sum of $1,000," furnished a reason why the attachment should be quashed. It appeared from specific allegations in other portions of the original petition, and from the affidavit attached to same, that appellee was claiming a right to recover $1,000 as the value of the plans, etc. From the whole petition, notwithstanding the element of uncertainty introduced by the confusing, if not contradictory, averment in connection with the prayer, referred to, we think it reasonably appears that the intention of the pleader was not to abandon the claim asserted for $1,000 as the value of the plans, etc.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

TURNER v. PATTERSON et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 25, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1909.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 111*)—VENUE.

Under Rev. St. art. 1194, subd. 17, fixing the venue of actions to stay proceedings in any suit in the county where the suit is pending, an action to stay proceedings in a suit in another county is properly dismissed, where the petition fails to state any cause of action against the defendants who do not reside in such other county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 195; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 7*)—NATURE AND PURPOSE OF REMEDY—APPEAL.

An injunction against maintaining an action cannot be made to serve the purpose of an appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 26*)—RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACT—FRAUD.

That a note executed by plaintiff was obtained through the fraudulent representations of defendant is available as a defense in an action on the note, and therefore is not ground for the issuance of a writ of injunction restraining the enforcement of the note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 26*)—ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACT—FRAUD—FAILURE TO URGE DEFENSE.

Where the grounds on which an injunction is sought to restrain the enforcement of a note given by plaintiff are available as defenses in an action on the note, the failure of plaintiff to interpose those defenses at the proper time on account of his own negligence is no reason for enjoining the suit.

Appeal from District Court, Borden County; James L. Shepherd, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Turner against W. H. Patterson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Peebles, Turney & Lewis, and Morrison & Morrison, for appellant. Curtis & Hancock, for appellees.

HODGES, J. This appeal is from a judgment dissolving a temporary restraining order theretofore issued, and refusing a writ of injunction.

On December 9, 1907, the appellant filed in the district court of Borden county his petition for an injunction, alleging, in substance, the following facts: That W. H. Patterson, one of the appellees, resides in Dallas county, and is the manager of the Hartford Life Insurance Company, a foreign corporation engaged in the business of writing life insurance in Texas. That the other defendants, W. L. Evans and M. J. Thornton, are also agents of said company, and reside in Borden county, Tex. That on or about the 9th day of October, 1907, the said Patterson induced plaintiff to buy a policy of insurance for an annual premium of $174.50, representing that, in consideration of said premium, the insurance company would issue to him a policy on his life for $5,000, which would insure his life for that sum for 20 years, and, at the expiration of that time, said sum would be paid to plaintiff in cash if he were then living. That this representation was made by the defendants to plaintiff at the time and place aforesaid to induce him, and did induce him, to contract and agree with the defendants, as agents of the corporation aforesaid, to buy such $5,000 insurance policy. Relying upon the promise that he would obtain a policy payable to him at the end of 20 years, in consideration thereof he executed his note, dated February 12, 1907, for $174.50, payable to the order of W. H. Patterson at Dallas, Tex., on the 1st day of July thereafter, without grace, said note to bear interest after maturity at 10 per cent per annum, and also providing for the payment of attorney's fees if it should be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. Plaintiff further alleges that after he signed said note, and before its delivery to Patterson, Evans and Thornton, two of the defendants in the suit, signed the same as sureties, writing their names on the back thereof, and then delivered the note to Patterson. That, when the insurance policy which he understood he was to receive from the agents of the insurance company was tendered to him in fulfillment of his said contract and agreement, he found that it was not such as he had contracted for, but that it was merely one which would become nonpremium bearing after 20 years, and payable only upon his death. That he thereupon returned the tendered policy and demanded the surrender of his note, but that the appellees refused to surrender the note, though the consideration had wholly failed. He further avers that Patterson, with full knowledge of all the facts alleged, wrongfully and fraudulently withheld said note from him, and on or about June 19, 1907, deposited the same with the American Exchange National Bank of Dallas, Tex., for collection, which bank thereupon forwarded the same to a bank at Gall, in Borden county, for collection. That, after appellant had learned that the note was at the Gall bank, his attorney at once proceeded to prepare and file suit against the necessary parties to cancel the note. That when Thornton, one of the appellees, learned that said suit was in course of preparation, and in order to prevent the fraud from being exposed in Borden county and injuring his business, he did on June 26th, as a mere volunteer, pay off and extinguish the note, and that Patterson received the proceeds thereof before action could be taken in the said suit. Plaintiff alleges that he is informed and believes and charges the fact to be that the note was by the Gall bank stamped, "Paid, June 26, 1907," the day Thornton paid the same with his personal check. He further charges as a fact that several days after said note was paid and canceled as aforesaid Thornton had said Gall bank make on said note the following entry: "Paid by M. J. Thornton. J. D. Brown, Cashier." Appellant alleges that, if he is in error in stating that Patterson deposited said note with the American Exchange National Bank at Dallas, Tex., for collection, he then avers that Patterson negotiated said note in due course of trade to the American Exchange National Bank of Dallas, Tex., to which said Thornton as surety or volunteer, or as both, paid said note as aforesaid, extinguishing same.

The appellant further avers that if Thornton as surety, and not as a volunteer, paid said note without the frauds complained of, then in that event only the cause of action arose in his favor against plaintiff upon an implied promise to pay him the money paid by Thornton upon the note. He denies that he ever promised in writing to pay said Thornton, or any one else in Dallas county, Tex., the money by him paid on said note, and denies that any of the statutory exceptions exist authorizing any suit beyond Borden county and in Dallas county against plaintiff by any of defendants in reference to said note or on said implied promise, and claims the statutory right to be sued in the justice precinct and county of his residence. He further avers that, after the satisfaction of said note by Thornton, the defendants entered into some kind of a false and fraudulent arrangement wherein said Thornton returned said extinguished note to Patterson, and the latter thereupon fraudulently pretending that the note was valid and unextinguished, after having sold it to the American Exchange National Bank of Dallas, or received payment thereof, instituted a suit in the justice court of precinct No. 1 in Dallas county on July 10, 1907, against the appellant on said note. That the case was postponed from time to time at the instance of said Patterson or his attorney, and was not called for trial until October 29, 1907, on which day Patterson recovered a judgment in said justice court against the appellant in said suit. That on or about October 9, 1907, appellant presented to Hon. James L. Shepherd, judge of the district court of Borden county, his original petition, praying for a writ of injunction against the said Patterson to restrain him from prosecuting to judgment the aforesaid suit while pending in the justice court, and restraining said defendant M. J. Thornton from instituting suit against plaintiff on said implied promise, said original petition containing the same allegations hereinabove made, as well as other allegations hereinafter set forth. That Hon. James L. Shepherd, being constantly engaged with his official work in other counties in his district, could not for lack of time consider the petition, and did not do so until the 7th of November, 1907, at which time he did affix his fiat directing the issuance of the writs in said petition prayed for upon plaintiff's entering into a bond of $500. That, as the result of the delay by the district judge above mentioned, judgment was obtained by said Patterson against appellant in the justice court on the 29th of October, 1907; the restraining order referred to being too late to prevent the prosecution of the suit in said cause.

He further alleges that, as a result of the delay in the matter of the issuing of the restraining order, he was forced to prosecute an appeal to the county court of Dallas county, Tex., from a judgment rendered against him in the justice court, in order to avoid the issuance and levy of a writ of execution upon his property, and the cause is now pending in said county court on appeal. He further avers that the case was tried by the justice of the peace, and a judgment arbitrarily rendered against him on said note in October, 1907, although the justice of the peace saw that said note was paid and had been extinguished, and for which reason the same could not legally, and ought not to, have served as a basis for a suit. He alleges that he did not read the application for a policy of life insurance before signing the same, for the reason that he was deterred from so doing by the false and fraudulent representations made by Evans, who stated to him at the time that it was all right and there was no use in reading it; that he has never read any application for such policy, nor for any policy offered to him by the Hartford Life Insurance Company or any of its agents. He further alleges fraud and deceit practiced upon him by Patterson, Evans, and Thornton, for the purpose of procuring the execution of the aforesaid note and his promise to pay 19 other annual premiums upon said policy of insurance, and claims that, unless restrained by a writ of injunction, Patterson will further prosecute his suit against appellant in the county court of Dallas county, where the case is pending on appeal, he having filed an appeal bond for the purpose of preventing an execution being issued against him; and that Thornton will institute suit against him on said implied promise, and prosecute the same to judgment. He alleges that the suit against him in the justice court of Dallas county was fraudulently instituted upon the ground that said note contained a promise to pay in Dallas, and he alleges the fact to be that Thornton paid the note in Borden county, and it was thereafter transmitted to Dallas. He also alleges that the Hartford Life Insurance Company will institute suit against him upon his refusal to pay any or all of the remaining premiums stipulated in the policy of insurance. He claims collusion and confederation among all of the appellees for the purpose of collecting from him the money stipulated to be paid in the note and the annual premiums provided for in the policy of insurance. He asks that all of the appellees, including the Hartford Life Insurance Company, be enjoined; that Patterson be enjoined from prosecuting his suit against him in the county court of Dallas county upon the note; that Thornton be enjoined from suing him on the pretended implied promise by him to repay the money paid by Thornton on the note; that the Hartford Life Insurance Company be enjoined from suing for said nineteen premiums or any of them; and that the defendants be required to bring into court the note and policy of life insurance for cancellation. The record shows that a temporary writ of injunction had been issued by the Hon. James L. Shepherd during vacation, before the regular term of court.

All of the parties defendant in the suit answered, all disclaiming any interest in the subject-matter in controversy, the note sued on, except Patterson. The latter claimed the privilege of being sued in the county of his residence, which is Dallas county, Tex., and specially pleaded the pendency of the proceeding sought to be stayed in Dallas county and objecting to the venue. He also filed general and special exceptions to the petition, and further answered by general and special denial. The Hartford Life Insurance Company disclaims any right, title, or interest to the matter in controversy, and says, with reference to the policy referred to, that under the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, by virtue of which the policy of insurance was issued, it was at all times and is optional with the plaintiff as to whether or not he desires to pay the nineteen annual premiums called for in the same; that he is under no obligation to pay the same unless he elects to do so for the purpose of keeping his policy in force; that it never asserted, and does not now assert, and does not intend in the future to assert, that there is any obligation on the part of plaintiff to pay any of those premiums. W. L. Evans answered, disclaiming any right, title, claim, or interest in the matter in controversy, says that he makes no claim against the plaintiff on the note described in the plaintiff's pleadings, and did not claim any interest therein at the date of the institution of this suit or at any other time. In addition to the disclaimer, he pleads general denial as to the charges of fraud. Thornton also disclaims any right, title, claim, or interest to any of the matter in controversy, and says that he makes no claim against the plaintiff on the note described in the pleadings, and did not claim any interest therein at the date of the institution of this suit. He further denies the charges of fraud and conspiracy alleged in the petition.

From a judgment sustaining the general and special exceptions and dismissing the petition, this appeal is prosecuted.

The principal purpose of this suit being to stay proceedings in a suit pending in Dallas county, and having failed to state any cause of action against the parties defendant who did not reside in that county, the court properly sustained the objections to the venue. Article 1194, subd. 17, Rev. St. 1895, fixes the venue of actions to stay proceedings in any suit in the county where the suit is pending. It also appears from this petition that it seeks to have the application for injunction serve the purposes of an appeal. That this is not permissible is well settled in this state. G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Ware, 74 Tex. 47, 11 S. W. 918; Tex. Mex. Ry. Co. v. Wright, 88 Tex. 350, 31 S. W. 614, 81 L. R. A. 200; Beer v. Landman, 88 Tex. 457, 31 S. W. 808. The grounds alleged as a basis for the issuance of a writ of injunction were available as defenses in the suit then pending, or any of the suits thereafter expected. If by reason of his failure to interpose those defenses at the proper time a situation has arisen in which the appellant is deprived of any of them, he fails to state facts indicating that anything other than his own negligence was the cause.

We think the court properly refused the writ, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

LINDALE BRICK CO. v. SMITH.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 4, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 82*)—SERVICES AND COMPENSATION—LIENS.

Under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 8339a, giving a lien to secure the payment of wages of "any clerk, accountant, bookkeeper, artisan, craftsman, factory operative, mill operative, servant, mechanic, quarryman, or common laborer, farm hand, male or female," for labor performed, one who is employed as the superintendent of a brick company is not entitled to a lien for services although he at times performed the labor of an ordinary hand, as the lien does not attach in favor of persons not enumerated although they may occasionally perform the duties of one of the enumerated classes, and one of the classes enumerated has a lien for all his services although some of his work is not within the duties usually assigned to his class.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 129; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 8*)—CONCLUSIONS.

The petition of one, claiming a lien on the property of a brick company, for damages for conversion by the purchasers of the property, does not sufficiently establish a lien by alleging that plaintiff was entitled to a lien, as that is but a conclusion of the pleader.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 32*) — COMPLAINT—ALLEGATION OF INTEREST.

An allegation, in a complaint for conversion of a brickmaking plant on which plaintiff claimed a lien for wages, that plaintiff "performed labor," etc., is insufficient to bring plaintiff within any one of the classes of employees particularly specified in the statute as entitled to a lien for their wages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. § 191; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

4. COURTS (§ 121*)—DISTRICT COURT—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT INVOLVED.

The district court has no jurisdiction of an action for conversion of property belonging to a brick company, brought by an employee of the company claiming a lien for his services, and also claiming as the assignee of the wages of two other laborers, where the amount of the claims assigned is less than $500 and the plaintiff has no lien for his own wages, and therefore no cause of action for the conversion of his employer's property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 413; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

Appeal from District Court, Smith County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Action by S. R. Smith against the Lindale Brick Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and dismissed.

Fitzgerald & Butler, for appellant. Jesse F. Odom and Gentry & Castle, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellee, S. R. Smith, filed this suit against the appellant in May, 1907, seeking to recover the sum of $1,963.02 as damages for the conversion of a certain brick plant, its machinery and appurtenances, upon which he claimed to have liens for labor performed by himself and others. The petition alleges, substantially, that the Smith County Brick Company was a private corporation formed under the laws of Texas, with its place of business in Smith county; that during the years 1905, 1906, and a portion of 1907 the company owned and operated a brick plant at Lindale, Tex.; that the appellee, Smith, by virtue of a certain contract made by him with the Smith County Brick Company, performed labor to the amount of $1,534.06, as per his itemized account attached. It is further alleged that M. A. Wilds and Henry Henson also performed labor for said brick company, aggregating in value sums stated, and acquired liens under the statute which were assigned to and held by appellee at the institution of this suit. The petition then alleges that in April, 1907, the defendant, Lindale Brick Company, † Writ of error denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1909.

with full knowledge of appellee's rights and liens, purchased all of the property of the Smith County Brick Company as above mentioned, and converted the same to its own use, to appellee's damage in the sum sued for, and prays judgment for that amount. Upon a trial, judgment was rendered in favor of the appellee, Smith, for the sum of $905.65. The jury specified the claims upon which their verdict rested, and this shows that they ignored the claim for services performed by Wilds, restricted the allowance for the services performed by Smith to $800, but allowed the full amount of the claim by Henson.

Findings of Fact.

The testimony adduced upon the trial shows the following facts: The Smith County Brick Company was a private corporation organized sometime during the year 1904, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling brick, and the appellee, S. R. Smith, was one of the stockholders and directors. If he was not such at the date of organization, he became one shortly thereafter. The company owned about 70 acres of land near Lindale, upon which it established a plant with the necessary machinery for making brick. The business of brickmaking was commenced and continued during the years 1905, 1906, and a small portion of 1907, during which time a large number of brick were made and sold. The company became indebted to the Jester National Bank of Tyler in the sum of $3,000, to secure which it gave a mortgage on its plant and property. It was also indebted to Robert Clark in the further sum of $5,000, to secure which a second mortgage was given on its property and brick plant. The brick company continued its business till on or about the 7th day of January, 1907, when a suit was instituted by Clark on his note and mortgage, a writ of sequestration issued, and the property was taken in charge by the sheriff, who held it till sold under order from the court. Clark prosecuted his suit to judgment, procured an order of sale, and in March following the property was sold and bought in by him for a sum less than the amount of his debt. Clark afterward acquired the claim held by the bank. In April, 1907, the Lindale Brick Company, the appellant in this suit, was organized, and thereafter purchased from Clark the brick plant and the tract of land on which it was situated, and again began operating it. After this last-named purchase this suit was filed for conversion. All of the stock of the Smith County Brick Company, during the time it operated the plant, was owned by five persons—Nowlin, Kennedy, M. A. Wilds, the appellee, S. R. Smith, and his brother, W. T. Smith. These were also the directors of the corporation, and continued as such during the time it did business. During the years of 1905, 1906, and that portion of 1907 when the Smith County Brick Company operated the plant, the appellee was the superintendent, having been employed for that purpose by the board of directors. We think the evidence is ample to justify the conclusion that he was given the entire supervision of the plant, with full authority to employ and discharge hands, direct the details of the work, fix the compensation of subordinate employes, determine when and for what length of time they should be engaged, and was responsible to the directors for his management of the business. The testimony also shows that appellee did considerable manual labor about the plant at different times, but whether or not this was required of him by the terms of his contract does not appear. He testifies that he would frequently fill the place of an absent hand, or would assist in laying brick, or help to keep up the fires, repair breaks, and do many miscellaneous jobs about the business. There is nothing, however, to negative the inference that those services were performed from choice rather than in compliance with the exactions of a contract. For aught that appears to the contrary, he was empowered to employ others to do all the manual labor which he performed about the plant. He testifies that his contract with the directors was that he was to get $75 per month if they employed Wilds to assist him; that he told them that if they did not employ Wilds he would charge them $100 per month for his services. They failed to employ Wilds, and he made out his claim for $100 per month. When the Smith County Brick Company ceased to do business, and at the time the plant was sequestered by Clark, it was indebted to appellee, according to his estimate, for more than 15 months' services, none of which was ever paid.

Henson was employed as a night watchman by the appellee while superintending the plant. Henson was also required to and did perform some other services, such as making fires in the furnaces and assisting in handling the brick. His employment began about the first of the year 1906, and he was to receive a monthly compensation of $40. There is some dispute as to whether his wages were payable monthly or at the end of the year. The evidence shows without contradiction that he drew his wages monthly till about the 1st of June, 1906, after which time he drew none. At the time the property was sequestered by Clark there was due him the sum of $305.66, the amount sued for. Henson testifies that he had the right to demand his wages at the end of each month if he needed them, but his contract was that he was to draw only so much monthly as he needed to live on, and the rest was to be paid at the end of the year. It is shown that the claims of both Wilds and Henson were merely transferred to the appellee to enable him to sue on them in the same action with his; that he had not paid or contracted to pay them any consideration for their claims. On the 22d day of January, 1907, the appellee filed with the county clerk of Smith county, in form as required by law for fixing a laborer's lien, an account against the Smith County Brick Company, claiming an indebtedness of $307.50 as a balance due for labor done and performed for that company at $75 per month, payable January 1, 1906; also an additional claim for similar services to January 8, 1907, at $100 per month—making a total of $1,534.06. In his affidavit attached to the account the appellee swears that he was employed by the board of directors of the aforesaid company "to do labor, manage, and supervise the business of manufacturing brick for said company at its said plant."

On the 26th day of January, 1907, Henson filed with the county clerk of Smith county his claim against the Smith County Brick Company for the sum of $305.66 for services as night watchman, alleging that the indebtedness accrued on the 1st day of January, 1907. There was a claim filed by Wilds also; but the jury having failed to find anything in favor of the appellee by reason of that claim, it is not necessary to notice it further.

Conclusions of Law.

The liens claimed in this suit, if they exist, are by virtue of article 3339a of Sayles' Annotated Civil Statutes of 1897, giving liens in favor of certain classes of employes who perform labor and other services, for security for the payment of their wages. The article referred to provides that: "Whenever any clerk, accountant, bookkeeper, artisan, craftsman, factory operative, mill operative, servant, mechanic, quarryman, or common laborer, farm hand, male or female, may labor or perform any service in any office, store, saloon, hotel, shop, mine, quarry, manufactory or mill of any character, or on any farm, under or by virtue of any contract or agreement, etc., * * * in order to secure payment of the amount due by such contract or agreement, written or verbal, the hereinbefore mentioned employes shall have a first lien upon all the products, machinery, tools," etc. Article 3339b provides for the method of fixing and securing the lien. Article 3339c provides that "under the operations of this chapter all wages, if the service is by agreement performed by the day or week, shall be due and payable weekly; or if by the month, shall be due and payable monthly."

The question which logically presents itself as one that should be first considered is, does this statute give a lien to that class of employes to which the appellee, Smith, belongs? That the statute did not intend to create a lien in favor of all employes is very evident; for, had this intention existed, the end could have been accomplished with more ease and precision by the use of less verbiage. Another fact is, we think, apparent upon the face of this statute, and that is the purpose of protecting with a lien the classes of employed individuals mentioned, rather than to attach the lien to any particular class or grade of service that might be performed. For instance, the lien is given to the clerk, bookkeeper, and accountant, not to any person who might in the course of a dual or miscellaneous employment perform, at times, some of the duties appertaining to those usually falling within the line of work of the clerk, bookkeeper, or accountant. It is true we must look to the grade and character of service contracted for and performed by an employe to ascertain the class to which he properly belongs, and from that determine whether he falls within the list of the protected classes. But this presents no difficulty except in those instances where the duties are of a dual or mixed character, some belonging to the protected classes and others not. In such cases the only safe method is to ascertain from the contract of employment what are the principal duties of the employe, and this will determine the class to which he belongs, notwithstanding he may at times perform some services not generally belonging to that grade or class of employment.

It follows from what we have said that an employe who belongs to any one of the classes mentioned in the statute has a lien for all of his wages, even though some of the labor or service he performs does not fall within the line of duties usually assigned to that class. On the other hand, an employe who does not belong to any one of the groups or classes mentioned in the statute is without the lien, notwithstanding he may at times perform some labor or service properly within the list of duties usually belonging to the protected employes. Where the contract of employment imposes miscellaneous duties, some of which belong normally to a protected occupation and some do not, but fails to segregate the duties and apportion the wages to be paid, but provides a fixed sum for the entire compensation, the employe has a lien for all of his wages or none. It is just as obnoxious to the statute to extend its provisions so as to permit liens where none were given, as to deny liens, by a too restricted construction, where it was intended they should be given. Looking to the principal line of employment provided for by the terms of the appellee's contract with the Smith County Brick Company, we think it clear that he should be classed as a superintendent or manager. Managers and superintendents have no statutory lien for their wages, even though they may at times perform labor or services belonging to those employes who have. Raynes v. Kokomo, etc., Co., 153 Ind. 315, 54 N. E. 1061; Freeman on Executions, § 234. Counsel for appellee insist that Smith performed manual labor in accordance with the terms of his contract; that such labor was a part of the duties which he assumed in becoming the superintendent of the plant. It is true that the evidence shows that Smith did perform some manual labor about the brick plant; but this, we think, may be regarded as a mere incident to his principal term "common laborer" in our statute is not without special significance. The language was probably adopted to avoid the confusion experienced in other states in construing similar provisions giving liens or preferences to laborers, and to designate as accurately as practicable the grade of employes meant. Unless we adopt the rule that an employe should be graded according to the lowest instead of the highest service he may have contracted to perform, and this without regard to the principal undertaking, there is no foundation whatever for the conclusion that Smith was a "common laborer," within the meaning of the statute. If, then, he is properly classed as a manager or superintendent, why should he be allowed a lien for all or any part of the compensation for his services? Under the evidence we must hold that he was entitled to a lien for all or for no part of his salary, assuming that no bar has intervened by reason of the lapse of time. If the statute does not include a superintendent or manager among the protected classes, it certainly did not intend to incumber the property upon which such liens were to operate for compensation to be paid for services earned as superintendents and managers. When Smith was selected and employed to superintend and manage the brick plant, it is safe to assume that the compensation he was to receive was based principally upon the value of his services in that line; and, even admitting that he was also to perform some manual labor in connection with his other duties, such labor would form the basis of a much smaller proportion of his salary or wages. The capacity to manage and superintend a business enterprise always commands higher wages than is allowed for labor of a low grade. There being no way by which the court or jury could segregate the value of the services rendered by Smith as a superintendent from the value of the wages he might have earned as a laborer, assuming that such a construction of the statute were permissible, there is no basis for the judgment here rendered in his favor. Necessarily he was accorded a lien by the jury for some services, at least, never contemplated by the statute. We can see no good reason for holding that a superintendent should have a lien for the labor of loading brick on a wagon, and be denied one for supervising the labor of others while performing the same service, unless it be held that the statute was enacted for the sole purpose of encouraging people to engage in that class of labor.

It will be observed that the statute has confined the lien given to classes of employes who occupy subordinate positions in the service, and whose duties do not involve the management and control of the business with which they may be connected. In look to the reward of a day's labor or services for immediate and present support, from whom the company does not expect credit, and to whom its future ability to pay is of no consequence." The testimony here shows that Smith was a member of the board of directors, a part of the corporation itself. The success of the undertaking must have depended to a great extent upon his business sagacity and ability to manage the affairs of the company. Its financial embarrassment may have been due to his mistakes. Under such circumstances we see no reason why courts should be called upon to adopt a liberal rule in construing this statute in order to extend its provisions to those under whose management the enterprise has proved a failure.

In an able argument counsel for appellant has urged the proposition that Smith should not be permitted to recover for his wages upon the ground that he had a lien, for the reason that he is shown to have been a stockholder and a director in the Smith County Brick Company at the time he performed the services for which he now claims the lien, asserting that to do so would be opposed to public policy. There is much force in the suggestion; but inasmuch as we think there are other and sufficient reasons for reversing this judgment, we do not pass upon the question. If Smith had no lien on the property of the Smith County Brick Company for his wages at the time it was purchased by the appellant, then it follows that he is not entitled to recover in this suit any damages on that account for the alleged conversion of the property. England v. Beaty, 41 N. J. Eq. 470, 4 Atl. 307; Cole v. McNelli, 99 Ga. 250, 25 S. E. 402; In re Clark, 92 Mich. 351, 52 N. W. 637; Raynes v. Kokomo, etc., Co., 153 Ind. 315, 54 N. E. 1061; McPherson v. Stroup, 100 Ga. 228, 28 S. E. 157; Penn, etc., Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. 108, 24 Am. Rep. 189; State v. Land, 108 La. 512, 32 South. 433, 58 L. R. A. 407, 92 Am. St. Rep. 392; Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 215; Moore v. Am. Industrial Co., 138 N. C. 304, 50 S. E. 687. The right of the appellee to recover in this action must depend solely upon his ability to plead and prove the existence of a lien upon the property formerly owned by the Smith County Brick Company at the time it was purchased by the appellant. The allegations of the petition are no stronger than the evidence, and if this is insufficient to sustain a recovery it follows that the petition is also insufficient. In that portion of the petition in which it is undertaken to set out the facts which gave rise to the lien, the allegations are as follows: "That during the years 1905, 1906, and 1907 S. R. Smith, plaintiff herein, by virtue of a certain contract made by him with the Smith County Brick Company, performed labor for it to the amount of $1,534.06, an itemized account of which is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit C' for identification, and made a part of this petition." The account filed with the county clerk and referred to as "Exhibit C" is thus stated:

Tyler, Texas, January 22, 1907.

Smith County Brick Company to S. R. Smith, Dr.

To amount due S. R. Smith for labor done and performed for said Smith County Brick Company during the year 1905 and due on January 1st, 1906, at $75.00 per month, balance due on said contract.....	$ 307 40
To amount due S. R. Smith for labor done and performed for said Smith County Brick Company from January 1st, 1906, to January 8th, 1907, at $100.00 per month.....	1,226 66
Total amount due.....	$1,534 06

In the affidavit attached to the account in which Smith sets forth the terms of his contract as definitely as this can be said to have been done in any part of his pleadings, he says: "And said Smith County Brick Company, acting through its said board of directors at a meeting held for that purpose on or about the 1st day of January, 1906, employed the said S. R. Smith to do labor, manage, and supervise the business of manufacturing brick for its said company at its said plant, and said company agreed to pay the said S. R. Smith for his said services during and for the year 1906 the sum of $100 per month, said wages to be due on January 1, 1907." We do not think these allegations are sufficient to show that the appellee was entitled to a lien upon the property. His averment that he was entitled to a lien is but the conclusion of the pleader, and not the statement of a fact. He should either have alleged a contract of employment within one of the classes mentioned in the statute, or he should have so stated the class of labor or service he rendered as to enable the court to designate his principal occupation in the service. The mere statement that one "has performed labor" for another is far from being equivalent to an averment that he belongs to a class of employes to whom the statute has given a lien. Because one labors it does not necessarily follow that he is a "common laborer," or that he belongs to any one of the groups mentioned in the statute whose occupation may involve labor. In a sense all employes labor in some form, but all employes are not protected by the lien.

We deem it unnecessary to notice the assignments which challenge the correctness of the judgment as to the claim of Henson. Both his and Wilds' claims together would not make a sum sufficient to give the district court jurisdiction, being less than $500.

The petition not having stated facts which would justify a recovery on the claim of Smith, the court was without jurisdiction to render judgment on the claims of Henson and Wilds. Peterson v. Thomas (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 1124.

There are other assignments in the record attacking the charge of the court, and other rulings, some of which we think should be sustained. But in view of the disposition we make of the case, it is unnecessary to consider them.

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause dismissed.

EDWARDS et al. v. TRINITY & B. V. RY. CO.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 8, 1909. On Rehearing, April 1, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 433*) — PAROL EVIDENCE — VARYING WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Parol evidence to establish facts which, in equity, relieve a party from the obligations of a written contract, on the ground that it was entered into under a mistake as to the facts, is not objectionable as varying the terms of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1909; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 93*)—VALIDITY OF ASSENT—MISTAKE.

Where, when a contract whereby plaintiffs sold to defendant railroad so much of the gravel, clay, and sand on a certain tract as it should remove within five years, and defendant agreed to remove not less than a certain amount per month during the term and to pay a stipulated price per cubic yard therefor, was executed, the parties contemplated that the gravel, etc., was to be used by defendant in ballasting its roadbed, and supposed that there was a sufficient quantity of a quality suitable for the purpose so situated that it could be worked by steam shovel at a reasonable expense, not in excess of its value for such purpose, but such conditions did not in fact exist, defendant was entitled to a cancellation of the contract on the ground of mistake.

Appeal from District Court, Grimes County; Gordon Boone, Judge.

Action by W. O. Edwards and others against the Trinity & Brazos Valley Railway Company. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Buffington, Buffington & Bowen, for appellants. Andrews, Ball & Streetman and McDonald Meachum, for appellee.

REESE, J. On April 17, 1906, appellants (styled contractors in the contract) and appellee entered into a written contract, which is, omitting immaterial portions, as follows: "Whereas, the contractors own a tract of land in the A. Zuber survey, located in Grimes county, Texas, upon which is located a deposit of gravel overlaid by deposits of sand and clay, and they hereby grant, bargain, sell and convey to said Trinity & Brazos Valley Railway Company, its successors and assigns, all of said gravel, sand and clay, or so much thereof as said railway company may remove therefrom during the existence of this contract, and upon the terms hereinafter stated. Said railway company to pay the contractors' grantors herein, one cent (1c) per cubic yard for each yard of gravel, sand and clay removed from said land during the period of this contract, and to be paid as hereinafter provided for. The contractors hereby agree and contract to permit the said railway company to do such grading and to lay such tracks as will be necessary for said railway company to have, to operate trains and steam shovel plant, for the purpose of removing said gravel, sand and clay. Said railway company to have the right of way through land of contractors, with right to grade said tracks as may be found necessary, and right to remove all such tracks, on termination of said contract. Said railway company to have the right to work the aforesaid gravel deposit at any time during the five years, ending April 1, 1911. That said railway company will begin operation, and take possession of the aforementioned gravel pit, and begin removing material therefrom within one year from the signing of this contract. Said railway company hereby agrees to remove not less than five thousand (5,000) cubic yards of gravel and sand per month, and further agrees that the price to be paid contractors is to be at rate of one (1c) per cubic yard, but it is to be counted in car loads—none to be less than ten (10) cubic yards. Said railway company further agrees to make payments monthly, on or before the 20th day of each month, for gravel hauled during the previous month. To further identify this property, upon which the gravel pit is located, there is hereto attached, as 'Exhibit A,' a blue print of the property owned by contractors, upon which is outlined the gravel deposit to be worked by the aforementioned railway company."

Under this contract appellee began operations in December, 1906, and took out gravel, sand, and clay of the value, under the contract, of $150, and then ceased and abandoned the work. Whereupon, on September 21, 1907, appellant brought suit to recover on the contract claiming as damages $2,600 as the value, at the contract price, of the amount of gravel, sand, and clay which, it is alleged, appellee was required to remove and pay for, from December, 1906, when it began work, to April 1, 1911, the termination of the five years named in the contract. Appellants also prayed for general relief. It was alleged that appellee had, in fact, removed and appropriated sand, gravel, and clay of the value of $150 before abandoning the work, and that there was on the land a sufficient quantity of gravel, sand, and clay to enable appellee to comply with its contract. To this petition appellee pleaded a general denial and specially answered, in substance: That it entered into said contract believing that there existed upon appellants' lands a gravel bed containing gravel, sand, and clay in such quantity and suitable for use in filling and ballasting its roadbed as to be gotten out by building a spur track thereto, by the operation of a steam shovel and trains of cars. That appellants, as well as appellee, so believed, and that it was in contemplation of this fact that this contract was made, and it was well understood that the gravel was to be so removed in such a way as that, after payment of all expenses so incurred and paying the price for the gravel, appellee could profitably use the same for the purposes aforesaid. That at the time the contract was made no gravel pit, mine, or bed had ever been open on the land, and the amount of the gravel, its location, quality, and situation were wholly undetermined; but it was supposed that it existed in such quantity and of such quality that it could be profitably worked and could be gotten out and removed by means of a steam shovel. It is averred that appellee, pursuant to the terms of said contract, at large expense, built its railroad bed for some distance into or near said supposed gravel pit, and unloaded its iron rails and ties preparatory to building its track, and had endeavored in good faith to carry out its contract, but found that there was but small quantity of gravel on the land, and that not suitable quality, and so located, being scattered about in pockets containing small quantities, that it was impossible to remove the same in the manner contemplated, or in any other manner, except at an expense greatly in excess of its value after such removal. It was further alleged that, in fact the gravel, sand, and clay did not exist on the land in such quantity, or of such quality, or so located, that it was possible for appellee to remove as provided in the contract, and that both parties were mistaken as to the existence of the subject-matter of the contract. Appellee alleged specially its own ignorance as to the matter, which it is alleged constituted the essence of the contract, and prayed that the contract be rescinded, and appellee be relieved of its obligation, tendering back to the appellants a release of all said clay and gravel specified in the contract. We have set out sufficient of the answer to disclose the general nature of the defense urged to the suit. Upon trial, without a jury, there was judgment for appellants for $150, the price of the gravel actually removed, from which they appeal.

Conclusions of fact and law were filed by the trial court. The trial court found the following facts, which are here adopted by us: "(1) The plaintiffs, W. O. Edwards, E. A. Edwards, M. E. Gooch, O. M. Gooch, C. E. Gooch, and R. B. Gooch, on and prior to the 17th day of April, 1906, owned a tract of land described in the plaintiff's petition and in the agreement hereinafter set out, on which was located certain deposits of gravel, sand, and clay, the quality and quantity of which was undetermined. (2) On and prior to above date, the defendant, the Trinity & Brazos Valley Railway Company, was engaged in building, constructing, and completing its roadbed for its main line of railway into and through Grimes county, Tex., and in the vicinity of the tract of land owned by plaintiffs, and for such purposes was desirous of obtaining suitable gravel and sand in sufficient quantities to be used profitably in ballasting and filling its said roadbed. (3) The plaintiff E. A. Edwards, on and prior to said date, was the agent of the other parties plaintiff, and knew that said defendant was so engaged in building, constructing, and completing its roadbed for its line of railway, and that defendant was desirous of obtaining gravel and sand of quality suitable for use in ballasting and filling in its said roadbed, and in the quantities to be sufficient to be handled for such purposes at a reasonable expense not in excess of its value for such purpose. (4) On the said 17th day of April, 1906, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into the contract hereinbefore set out. (5) At the time of the execution of the contract, it was in the contemplation of the parties thereto that the gravel and sand was desired by the defendant for use in ballasting and filling in its said roadbed, and that the same was to be so used, and that there existed on the tract of land owned by plaintiffs a quantity of gravel and sand of quality suitable for such purpose, which could be worked by steam shovel at a reasonable expense, not in excess of its value for such purpose. (6) On or about the 1st day of December, 1906, in pursuance of the foregoing agreement, the defendant build at a large expense a spur track for some distance into or near said alleged gravel pit, and removed therefrom a quantity of gravel, sand, and clay from said premises of the value of $150. (7) The defendant expended, in an attempt to develop the gravel pit, the amount of money shown in the statement of facts (about $3,300). (8) Defendant, after the execution of said contract, made investigation as to the quantity and quality of the gravel and sand upon the said premises, and discovered that the quantity of the gravel and sand upon said premises was not sufficient to enable it to work the same by steam shovel or in any other manner at a reasonable expense not in excess of its value for such purpose, and that the quality of same was not that required by defendant for the purposes of ballasting and filling in its roadbed, and that the defendant, after making such discovery, abandoned the same, and has since made no attempt to carry out the above agreement. (9) The purpose of the defendant in entering into the above agreement was to procure gravel which was suitable for ballasting and filling. (10) The gravel and sand upon said premises was not in sufficient quantity and not of such quality and not so situated that same could be used by defendant for the purposes contemplated at the time of the agreement and could not be obtained in the manner contemplated by the agreement at a reasonable expense, not in excess of its value for such purpose."

We have set out sufficient of the answer to show that the defense urged by appellee to the action was a mistake on the part of both parties, or at least on the part of appellee, as to such material matter as constituted the essence which authorized the rescission or cancellation of the contract upon such grounds. Appellants insisted upon a compliance with the very letter of the contract and resisted the introduction of parol evidence to explain in any manner whatever the circumstances under which the contract was executed and to establish any of the facts upon which the defense rested. These facts were that the gravel bed was undeveloped, that the quantity and quality and situation on the land of the material was undetermined, the manner in which it was contemplated by both parties it was to be worked, the purposes for which it was understood by both parties it was desired, and the nonexistence on the ground of the material contracted for, or, if it did exist, the fact that it was not suitable for the purpose for which it was intended and was so situated that it was impossible to get it out by the use of a steam shovel, or in any other way, except at an expense largely in excess of its value when removed, together with the mistake of both parties, or at least of appellee, as to all of these matters. The introduction of this evidence was objected to on the ground, mainly, that the contract was plain and unambiguous in its terms, and parol evidence was inadmissible to vary or modify any of its terms, or to show what was intended by the parties.

The first seven assignments of error present generally this proposition, which involves really the sufficiency of the facts set out in the answer as a defense to the suit. Appellee did not seek by the evidence offered to contradict or vary the terms of the contract, and such was not its effect, but to establish the existence of facts and circumstances which, in equity, relieved him of its obligations. Whether these facts and circumstances authorized such relief will be hereafter considered, and is a question distinct from the admissibility of the evidence. Our conclusion is that the evidence was admissible. 2 Pom. Eq. Juris. § 857 et seq. The answer of the witness E. A. Edwards, referred to in the first assignment of error, was distinctly favorable to appellants, and, if it had been subject to the objection made, the error did not prejudice them. The evidence referred to in the second assignment was material as showing an effort in good faith on the part of appellee to comply with its contract. That it should have constructed the dump upon which to lay its rails, to get to the gravel pit, at a cost of $3,300, tends to support their contention that they were only stopped in the further prosecution of the work by the practical impossibility of removing the gravel. We have considered the assignments of error referred to and the several propositions thereunder, and we are of the opinion that all of the evidence objected to was properly admitted. Our reasons for this conclusion will appear from what is said in passing upon the objections to the conclusions of law of the trial court. If the court's conclusions are sound, it would necessarily follow that it was permissible for appellee to establish by parol the facts upon which such conclusions are formed, which were substantially the facts set out in appellee's answer.

By the eighth assignment of error appellants assail the finding of fact that the quantity and quality of the deposits of gravel, sand, and clay was undetermined. The objection to this finding, that the evidence showed that examination and testing had been made and approved by appellee, is not sound. Although the evidence shows that same examination was made to ascertain the quantity and quality of the material, nevertheless it is conclusively shown that neither of the parties knew either the quantity of the material or its quality, and none of the examinations or tests made were such as to enable appellee to determine either the quality or quantity. It supposed the quantity to be sufficient and the quality suitable, but was mistaken in both.

It is sufficient to say with regard to the objections set out in the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth assignments of error to certain findings of fact of the trial court, that these findings are all abundantly supported by the evidence, and the assignments are without merit. We have concluded that the evidence upon which the findings are based was admissible. If we are correct in this, and such evidence sufficiently support the findings of the court, no objection can be properly made to the findings of fact. Whether such findings authorize or support the conclusions of law predicated upon them, is another question.

It is immaterial, as we view the case, whether the conclusion of law of the trial court in its definition of the contract "as a license based upon royalty," as set out in the fourteenth assignment of error, is correct or not. It is, we think, entirely profitless to split hairs over this question. The contract by its terms conveyed to appellee so much of the sand, clay, and gravel upon the land as should be removed within five years after the date of the contract, and bound appellee to commence work within one year and to remove and pay for, at the stipulated price, as much as 500 cubic yards per month from the time the work began to the end of the term. Upon the failure or refusal on the part of appellee to comply with the obligations of the contract, it became liable to appellants for whatever they may have sustained by reason of such refusal, unless appellee showed that it was entitled, in equity, and upon the grounds urged in its answer, to be relieved of the obligations of the contract. This is the substance. What name is given to the contract, whether "license," "lease," or "sale," is mere matter of form.

The trial court found, as a conclusion of law, that: "It having been in contemplation of the parties to the contract that the purpose of the defendant in entering into said contract was to obtain gravel and sand suitable for ballast and filling, and in quantities sufficient for such purpose, and to be worked by the method stipulated in said agreement, and at an expense such as would justify its use, and it having developed after the execution of said contract that the material of quantity and quality such as could be handled in the manner contemplated by the parties at a reasonable expense by defendant did not exist upon said premises, the defendant was not compelled to operate said gravel, sand, and clay, and had the right to surrender its rights under said contract, and there being no penalty provided for the failure to carry out the agreement by the defendant, and there being no proper measure of damages for such failure alleged and proven, no damages accrue to plaintiffs by reason of defendant's abandonment of the agreement" This is assigned as error by the fifteenth assignment and presents the decisive question in the case. The latter part of the findings: "There being no penalty provided for the failure to carry out the agreement by the defendant, and there being no proper measure of damages alleged and proven, no damages accrue to plaintiffs by reason of defendant's abandonment of the agreement"—was unnecessary and immaterial, in view of the conclusion that "the defendant was not compelled to operate said gravel, sand, and clay, and had the right to surrender its rights under the contract." If this conclusion be correct, appellants were not entitled to damages. If it be not correct, then both upon the pleadings and proof the proper measure of damages could have been applied, giving appellants compensation for the breach.

The question, however, is: Do the facts as pleaded and proven as set out in the conclusions of fact, entitle appellee, in equity, to be relieved of the obligations of the contract? This question is one of much difficulty, and as to its proper solution we are in great doubt. None of the cases cited in the briefs afford us much assistance, and we have been forced to recur to general principles of equity for a guide. The difficulty, however, lies in determining whether the facts of the present case bring it within the principles of equity invoked by appellee. We have approved the findings of facts of trial court, in substance, that at the time the contract was entered into it was supposed by both parties that there existed on the tract of land a quantity of gravel, clay, and sand of quality suitable for the purpose of ballasting and filling in appellee's roadbed, and so situated as that it could be worked by steam shovel at a reasonable expense, not in excess of its value, for such purpose. This was believed to be the condition. It was further found by the trial court that this condition did not in fact exist, and this finding, as we have concluded, is supported by the evidence. We are inclined to the opinion that this was a mutual mistake of the parties, as to a material matter, and, if so, under well-settled principles, would authorize a cancellation of the contract. But we do not rest our decision upon the ground of mutual mistake, but upon the mistake on the part of appellee as to the existence on the land of material of the quality desired, and so located, and in such quantities, that it could be removed at an expense not in excess of its value when removed. The trial court finds that the material in such quantity, and of such quality, as that it could be removed by steam shovel, or in any other way, except at an expense in excess of its value after removal, did not exist on the land, that it was contemplated by the parties that it did so exist on the land, and that it was in contemplation of, and in reliance upon, this fact that the contract was made.

We make no excuse for quoting largely from Pomeroy on Equitable Jurisprudence and Equitable Remedies, for it is upon the principles of equity we find there stated that we base our conclusions: "There are two requisites essential to the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction in giving any relief defensive or affirmative. The fact concerning which the mistake is made must be material to the transaction, affecting its substance, and not merely its incidents; and the mistake itself must be so important that it determines the conduct of the mistaken party or parties. If a mistake is made by one or both parties in reference to some fact which, though connected with the transaction, is merely incidental, and not a part of the very subject-matter, or essential in any of its terms, or if the complaining party fails to show that his conduct was in reality determined by it, in either case mistake will not be ground for any relief affirmative or defensive. As a second requisite, it has sometimes been said in very general terms that a mistake resulting from the complaining party's own negligence will never be relieved. This proposition is not sustained by the authorities. It would be more accurate to say that where the mistake is wholly caused by the want of that care and diligence in the transaction which should be used by every person of reasonable prudence, and the absence of which would be violation of legal duty, a court of equity will not interpose its relief; but even this more guarded mode of statement, each instance of negligence must depend to a great extent upon its own circumstances. It is not every negligence that will stay the hand of the court. The conclusion from the best authorities seems to be that the neglect must amount to the violation of a positive legal duty. The highest possible care is not demanded. Even a clearly established negligence may not of itself be a sufficient ground for refusing relief, if it appears that the other party has not been prejudiced thereby. In addition to the two foregoing requisites, it has been said that equity would never give any relief from a mistake, if the party could by reasonable diligence have ascertained the real facts; nor where the means of information are open to both parties and no confidence is reposed; nor unless the other party was under some obligation to disclose the facts known to himself, and concealed them. A moment's reflection will clearly show that these rules cannot possibly apply to all instances of mistake, and furnish the prerequisites for all species of relief. Their operation is, indeed, quite narrow. It is confined to the single relief of cancellation, and even then it is restricted to certain special kinds of agreements." 2 Pom. Eq. Juris. (3d Ed.) § 856. "The most difficult cases are those where the mistake is due solely to the defendant, without negligence on his part, or inducement or advantage taken by the plaintiff. It is plain that not every material mistake in such a case will enable the defendant to avoid performance of the contract. The rule may be stated that where the mistake is solely due to the defendant, but without his fault, equity will refuse specific performance only where the mistake is of a vital part of the contract—of the corpus of the agreement—and of such nature that enforcement would be a great hardship." Id. § 783. "Where the court is satisfied that the result which bears so hard upon the defendant, though legally a constituent part of the contract, was not intended by the parties at the time of the agreement—in fact, was not in contemplation as the effect of the agreement, which was expressed in terms too unqualified—it will not specifically enforce the agreement." Id. § 791. "Where a contract in writing is executed under a mistake by only one of the parties as to a fact which is of the essence of the contract, the mistake constitutes a ground for a court of equity to rescind and cancel the apparent contract as written and place the parties in statu quo." 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 618, and cases cited.

If it had developed that in fact "gravel overlaid by a deposit of sand and clay" did not exist at all on the land, we think it could not be questioned that appellee should be held excused from the obligation to take it out and to pay for it, even if it had been gully of negligence in failing to discover this fact before making the contract. Or if it had been discovered that, while some of the material existed, yet there was only a limited quantity, and not as much as under the contract appellee was required to remove, it would have been entitled to be relieved of the obligation pro tanto. It could not be denied that this would have been a mistake as to the subject-matter, going to the very essence of the contract. This might be placed on the ground of mutual mistake, or, if appellants knew of this nonexistence of the subject-matter of the contract, it would have been a fraud on their part to take advantage of appellee's ignorance, as to such a matter. Bishop on Contracts, § 588; 9 Cyc. 390. We think there can be no substantial difference in the application of the principles referred to, between the nonexistence of the material and its existence on the land, in fact, but not in a gravel bed or beds as contemplated, but so scattered and in such quantities in each place, as that it could not be removed except at a ruinous expense, so that appellee or any other person, if compelled to pay for it, would still prefer to let it remain as it is rather than attempt to appropriate it. Appellee at least, and we think appellants also, contracted with reference to a gravel bed where the material existed in such quantity as that it could be taken out with a steam shovel; its track to be built into the deposit for that purpose. This seems to us to have been the subject-matter of the contract, and its very essence. Certainly, but for appellee's belief as to this, it would not have made the contract, which really would amount to a gift to appellants of the amount stipulated to be paid. The trial court does not find that the material in sufficient quantity did not exist on the land, but it does find that, if it does exist, the conditions are such that it cannot be utilized, and that, if required to pay for it, appellee would still leave it the property of appellants. It cannot be said that appellee was guilty of such negligence in failing to discover these facts as would close the door of equity to it in seeking to be relieved of the obligations of the contract. 2 Pom. Eq. Juris. 856, supra. The gravel was under the surface, and not exposed to view, only as actual working of the deposit would be likely to reveal the deficiency in either quality or quantity. So far as the application of the principles referred to is concerned, we can see no reasonable ground for making a distinction between a suit to compel specific performance in cases where that relief is sought and the present case. If, in the present case, it would be inequitable to compel appellee to remove and pay for the gravel, if no other obstacle existed to such relief, it would be, to the same extent, inequitable to require him to pay damages for failure to remove it. The fundamental principle is that appellee, for the reason stated, is entitled in equity to be relieved of the obligations to perform the contract.

We must not be understood as holding that a mere mistake on the part of appellee in the cost of removing the gravel, whether arising from miscalculation of such expense, or from change in, or failure to take into account, any of the circumstances affecting such expense, would authorize the relief granted in this case. Such mistake would not, ordinarily, authorize rescission or cancellation of the contract.

For the reasons given, we are inclined to agree with the conclusions of the trial court, and to hold that there is no error in the judgment. None of the assignments, or propositions thereunder, present ground for reversal, and they are severally overruled, and the judgment affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

Upon request of appellants, on motion for rehearing, we make the following additional findings of fact:

Before the contract was executed, appellee, through some of its engineers, made some investigation of the premises with the view of determining the location and extent of the gravel beds on the land, and they made a blue-print map showing such location and extent which was attached to the contract and is part thereof. This blue print shows the location and situation of the gravel bed with reference to appellee's line of railway. On July 12, 1907, W. E. Green, who was then vice president and general manager of the company, wrote appellant Edwards stating, in substance, that investigation had developed the fact that there was not to exceed 6,000 yards of suitable gravel on the land that could be used for ballast, and that, such being the case, it would be a waste of money to undertake to put tracks in to get out that small amount of gravel. Edwards testified, and it is not contradicted, that, after the receipt of this letter, appellees took out some, he does not state how much, sand, gravel, and clay. No point was made of this in any of the assignments of error.

The motion for other additional findings, and for rehearing, is overruled.

Overruled.

McLEAN v. GULF & I. RY. CO. OF TEXAS
et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 8, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 117*)—PERISHABLE FREIGHT—FAILURE TO TRANSPORT WITH REASONABLE DISPATCH.

A car of cabbage was loaded by 10 o'clock a. m. March 15, 1907, and defendant carrier immediately notified. Defendant permitted the car to stand on the siding without refrigeration until the night of the 16th, and the car was not then iced until the morning of the 17th, when it was found that the cabbage had already begun to deteriorate. On arrival at destination, the cabbage was a total loss. Ninety-five per cent. of all shipments of perishable produce were carried by defendant on its passenger trains, and the car in question could have been shipped on a passenger train which went north at 6 o'clock on March 15th but for defendant's rule against carrying more than one freight car at a time on its passenger train, and that a tank car was being carried on the train in question. Held, that such rule was no defense for defendant's failure to sooner move and refrigerate the shipment, under its obligation to transport perishable property with reasonable dispatch.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 548*)—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

Where there is no statement of facts in the record, and the court's findings are not controverted, the judgment, being one that the court could render under the findings, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; W. H. Pope, Judge.

Action by Marrs McLean against the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company of Texas and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered in part.

W. D. Gordon and Thomas J. Baten, for appellant. Hiram Glass and H. M. Whitaker, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. This is a suit by Marrs McLean, successor to McLean Bros., against the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company of Texas and the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, to recover as damages the value of two cars of cabbages shipped over the railways of defendants. From a judgment, rendered by the court without a jury, in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

The court's findings of facts are as follows:

"I find that the firm of McLean Bros. were engaged in shipping cabbages from points along the Gulf & Interstate Railway during the year 1907, and that Marrs McLean is now, and was at the institution of this suit, the successor in interest of the said firm of McLean Bros.

"2. With reference to what is termed shipment No. 1, I find the following facts:

"(1) I find that this car was properly loaded at Stowell, Tex., on March 14 and 15, 1907; the loading being finished about 10 o'clock a. m. of Friday, March 15, 1907.

"(2) I find that the cabbages were fresh, hard, and green stock, and in good condition.

"(3) I find that immediately after said car was loaded Henry Hughes, who superintended the loading of said firm at Stowell, called up McLean Bros. at Beaumont, and notified them that the car was loaded and ready for shipment.

"(4) I find that Jack McLean, now deceased, for McLean Bros. immediately thereafter called up No. 308, over the Southwestern telephone, which was the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company's office number, and talked to some party whom he called Moffett, and notified this party that the car was loaded at Stowell, and asked that it be shipped at once. I find that these conversations occurred on the morning of March 15, 1907.

"(5) I find that this car was loaded on the side track of the Gulf & Interstate Railway at Stowell, and that this was the customary way of loading and shipping cabbages. I find that there was no agent of the Gulf & Interstate Railway at Stowell at this time.

"(6) I find that Marrs McLean, plaintiff herein, and one of the firm of McLean Bros., came up from High Island on the passenger train on Saturday evening, March 16, 1907, and as he passed Stowell about sundown, he saw this car of cabbages standing on the side track at Stowell.

"(7) I find that this car of cabbages arrived in Beaumont over the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company's line on Sunday morning, March 17, 1907, at about 5 o'clock; that it was immediately transferred to the icehouse, and iced about 9 or 10 o'clock a. m., and delivered to the Kansas City Southern Railway Company for transportation north to its destination.

"(8) I find that in ordinary weather cabbages will keep without icing about 24 hours after they are loaded in the cars, but, if not iced within 48 hours, that they will begin to decay, and refrigeration thereafter will not remove the decay.

"(9) I find that this car arrived 9 days after leaving Beaumont at St. Louis, Mo., and that the cabbages were entirely rotten, and absolutely worthless.

"(10) I find that the Kansas City Southern Railway Company and the Texarkana & Ft. Scott Railway Company hauled this car properly, and while in their custody was properly iced and re-iced.

"(11) I find that the value of this car when loaded, and the loss to plaintiff to be, $405.73, and that the market price at destination was in excess of this amount.

"(12) I find that the distance from Beaumont to Stowell over the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company's line is 28 miles.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"(13) I find that the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company has a passenger train that passes Stowell, coming to Beaumont at about 6 o'clock p. m. each day, and that said passenger train came to Beaumont about this time on the 15th day of March, 1907, and that it did not pick up this car of cabbages at Stowell.

"(14) I find that over 95 per cent. of the car load shipments of cabbages during the season of 1907 originating along the line of the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company was handled by the passenger train which made daily trips, leaving Beaumont about 8 a. m., and reaching Bolivar, 70 miles distant, the southern terminus of said line, about 12 m., and returning leaving Bolivar about 4 p. m., arriving at Beaumont about 7:30 p. m., and that the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company had no regular freight service, and handled nearly all of its perishable produce shipments by said passenger train through its office at Beaumont, Mr. Moffett having charge thereof, and operating same from Beaumont to Bolivar and intermediate points by a private railroad telephone line, and by instructions given to the conductors.

"(15) I find that this car was picked up by a freight train some time during the night, and brought to Beaumont about 5 a. m. on Sunday, March 17th, as stated in subdivision No. 7, supra.

"(16) I find that if said car had been brought to Beaumont on the 15th of March, 1907, and then iced, the produce would not have been decayed, but that when it got to Beaumont on Sunday morning it was already heated and decaying, and that the icing of the car thereafter did not stay the decay.

"(17) I find that it was the custom of the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company office at Beaumont not to issue bills of lading until the cars were brought by the company to the yards at Beaumont, and that pursuant to this custom the car in question had a bill of lading issue therefor on the morning of March 17, 1907, and that it was then promptly turned over to the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, after being iced and forwarded without fault on its part to its destination.

"(18) I find that when said car arrived in Beaumont Sunday morning, Jack McLean, a member of said firm, inspected the same, and reported to the defendant's agent Scholibo that the contents were badly heated and decaying, and that in response to the latter's inquiry as to why he was sending the car north, the said McLean replied that he was going to send it out anyway to try to get his money out of it.

"(19) I find that the reason given to McLean Bros. by the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company's agent for not having said car brought to Beaumont on the passenger train on the 15th of March, 1907, was that it was against the rules of the company to bring more than one freight car on the passenger train at a time, and that said passenger train had an oil car which it was bringing to Beaumont on that trip, and that the reason it was not picked up by the Saturday evening passenger train was that it was ordered to be picked up by the freight train, which was to follow the passenger that night.

"3. With reference to what is termed shipment No. 2, I find the following:

"(1) That said car was a refrigerator car which was sent down to Caplen loaded with 4,000 pounds of ice before it left Beaumont, and placed at Caplen by the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company, the morning of March 4th, about 11 o'clock a. m.; that it was then partially loaded by McLean Bros., immediately after placed on the side track, and then brought back to High Island, a distance of 10 miles from Caplen, and 40 miles from Beaumont, where it was finished loading on the 5th of March, 1907, and then brought by the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company's passenger train to Beaumont, arriving at the latter place on March 5th, at 7:45 p. m.

"(2) I find that it was immediately switched to the icehouse at Beaumont on the evening of March 5th, and there iced with 6,900 pounds of ice, and then, on the morning of the 6th of March, 1907, delivered to the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, and started north to Kansas City, its destination.

"(3) I find that this car was loaded with first-class produce, as described in plaintiff's petition, and that it was expeditiously and promptly handled by the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company, and that it arrived at Kansas City, Mo., at 12:20 p. m. March 10th, with the ice bunkers half full of ice.

"(4) I find that this car was not re-iced after leaving Beaumont until it arrived, at 2:40 p. m., March 8th, at Mena, Ark., 360 miles north of Beaumont, Tex., where the Kansas City Southern Railway Company re-iced it with 6,000 pounds of ice, and it was not re-iced thereafter until it arrived at Kansas City, Mo.

"(5) I find that the following is all of the evidence as to the icing of said car after it was brought to Beaumont from High Island, to wit: It was iced at Beaumont on the 5th of March, 1907, with 6,900 pounds of ice at a cost of $10.05, which was charged to the shippers with the freight, and paid by them. I find that the Kansas City Southern Railway Company rendered a bill for icing at Mena, Ark., of $21.50, March 8th, as aforesaid, and this was also paid by the shippers. The defendants' agent D. Salee, at Mena, Ark., testified that when this car arrived there, he looked in the bunkers, and judged that there was about 1,000 pounds of ice in the car, and that he put in 6,000 additional pounds. He stated that he was testifying partly from recollection and partly from data—recollection as to icing and data as to time of arrival and departure, and that the bunkers had a total capacity of 7,000 pounds. From this evidence I conclude that the car was kept properly iced by the Kansas City Southern Railway Company.

"(6) I find from the evidence that the car was kept properly iced after leaving Mena, Ark., until its arrival at Kansas City.

"(7) I find upon arrival at Kansas City that said cabbages were decayed as alleged in the plaintiff's petition, and that as result thereof the plaintiff sustained a loss of $340.14 as set up in plaintiff's petition.

"(8) I find that the cabbages when loaded in said car, and when brought to Beaumont on March 5, 1907, by the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company, were first-class produce of the character specified, and substantially as alleged in plaintiff's petition.

"4. I find that the bill of lading in each of the shipments was issued to McLean Bros., for said cars by the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company of Texas, shipment No. 1 on March 17, 1907, and shipment No. 2 on March 5, 1907, and that said bills of lading each had the words written in the face thereof, 'Ice at Beaumont—re-ice when necessary,' and that under these bills of lading both shipments were handled by the Kansas City Southern Railway Company after leaving Beaumont.

"5. I find that said refrigerator cars were both of proper character and construction, and that said produce was properly loaded therein, and that this character of produce, if the cars are properly iced, and kept iced with a sufficient quantity of ice, said produce would not decay or deteriorate, but would arrive at its destination in good condition."

As will be seen from the foregoing findings of fact, that the car at Stowell was loaded by 10 o'clock on the morning of the 15th of March, 1907, and the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company was immediately notified that the car was ready for forwarding; but, notwithstanding this said railway company permitted said car, loaded with perishable produce as it was, to stand on the siding without refrigeration from the morning of the 15th until the night of the 16th, and it was not iced until it reached Beaumont on the morning of the 17th, 48 hours after it was loaded. The excuse tendered by this railway company for its failure to sooner move the car avail it nothing. The fact that 95 per cent. of all shipments of perishable produce originating on the line of this defendant was carried into Beaumont by its passenger trains was found by the court. That defendant had a rule against carrying more than one freight car at a time in its passenger train cannot relieve it from its obligation to take and transport this character of property with reasonable dispatch, and this is especially true when the perishable quality of the shipment tendered is shown, and it is not shown that the quality of the shipment carried in the tank car was of a perishable nature, or that its contents would have been damaged by leaving it, and taking the car of cabbages in its stead. We think that the facts found by the trial court conclusively show that this defendant was negligent in not sooner moving and refrigerating the shipment, and that as to this there is not room for ordinary minds to differ, and that the court erred in holding otherwise, and further holding that the defendant Gulf & Interstate Railway Company of Texas is not liable for the value of the cabbage lost by plaintiff thereby. Appellant makes no contention that the defendant Kansas City Southern Railway Company is in any wise responsible for the loss sustained by him in this shipment.

As to the shipment designated as "shipment No. 2" in the findings of fact, the appellant admits that the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company is not liable for his loss, but seeks to hold the Kansas City Southern for its alleged negligence in failing to keep the cabbage properly iced during the time the car was under its control. Here we are confronted by apparent contradictory findings of fact, viz., that the cabbages, when loaded in the car, and when brought to Beaumont on March 5th (delivery was made to the Kansas City Southern on the morning of the 6th) was first-class produce of the character specified, and substantially as alleged in plaintiff's petition, viz., "Fancy Bulk Cabbage," and that said produce was properly loaded, and that "this character of produce, if the car is properly iced, and kept iced, with a sufficient quantity of ice, said produce would not decay or deteriorate, but would arrive at its destination in good condition," and that "upon arrival at Kansas City said cabbages were decayed, as alleged in plaintiff's petition, and that as a result thereof plaintiff sustained a loss of $340.14 as set up in plaintiff's petition." On the other hand, the court found that the car in question had an icing capacity of 7,000 pounds; that before it was sent out for loading it had 4,000 pounds placed in its bunkers; that when it was brought to Beaumont on the evening of March 5th it was iced with 6,900 pounds; that when it reached Mena, Ark., at 2:40 p. m., March 8th, it contained about 1,000 pounds, and 6,000 pounds were added, and that when the car arrived at Kansas City, its destination, its bunkers were half full of ice. Upon these findings of fact the court further finds that the car was kept properly iced by the Kansas City Southern, and upon this finding concludes, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff has failed to show that the Kansas City Southern was guilty of negligence in the matter of keeping the car properly iced. There being no statement of facts in the record, and the court's findings not be-

Southern Railway Company is affirmed; and, this court here proceeding to render such judgment against the Gulf & Interstate Railway Company of Texas as should have been rendered by the court below, it is ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff Marra McLean, do have and recover of and from the defendant Gulf & Interstate Railway Company of Texas the sum of $405.75, with 6 per cent. interest per annum thereon from the 15th day of March, 1907, and all costs of suit, except the costs incurred by reason of the Kansas City Southern Railway Company having been made a party to this suit, which costs are adjudged against the plaintiff, for all which execution may issue.

Reversed and rendered in part. Affirmed in part.

TOMPKINS et al. v. THOMAS et al.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 8, 1909.)

BOUNDARIES (§ 9*) — CONSTRUCTION—OMITTED CALL.

A description of land in a deed gave the length and direction of three lines, running from the beginning point south, east, and north to a well-defined point, thence calling to go west and south far enough to include 400 acres conveyed. There was nothing to indicate that the lines thus given would not close, but a calculation demonstrated that a line running from the northeast corner only such a distance west as that a line running south from the northwest corner would reach the beginning point would not embrace the 400 acres within the boundaries described. The defect in the description consisted in the failure to state the length of two of the lines, and the omission of a line necessary to close the survey. Held, that the description was not fatally defective, but would be sustained by supplying the line necessary to close the survey, which would include the quantity.

Appeal from District Court, Tyler County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Action by Richard Tompkins and others against J. W. Thomas and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and rendered.

P. E. McMahon and A. T. McKinney, for appellants. Joe W. Thomas and W. A. Johnson, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. This suit was instituted by appellants against appellees to recover title and possession of 400 acres of land, part of the Wm. Cherry 1,476-acre survey in Tyler county. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of appellees upon a second trial. The shown themselves entitled to a judgment, if the deed from Wm. Cherry to A. B. Worsham, under which they claim, contains a sufficient description of the land in controversy to identify it.

Appellants' fifth assignment of error is as follows: "The trial court erred in its first conclusion of law, which is as follows: 'First. I conclude that the deed offered in evidence from Wm. Cherry to A. B. Worsham, of date August 28, 1854, does not describe the land as set out in plaintiffs' petition with sufficient certainty to entitle plaintiffs to recover. I therefore find for the defendants, there being no extrinsic evidence to aid the description of said deed'—because said finding of law is contrary to law, and the evidence introduced on the trial of said cause, for the following reasons: The said deed from Wm. Cherry to Worsham does describe the land sued for in this case with sufficient certainty to identify the same, and to pass the title to said land from the said Cherry to the said A. B. Worsham by the terms of said instrument, because the terms of said deed, taken in connection with the location of the lines of the tracts conveyed out of said survey by the said Cherry to W. B. Dillon in 1849, and to H. M. Farrier in 1855, and the recitals in said deeds as shown by the evidence, and other extrinsic evidence adduced on the trial of said cause, conclusively show that the said Cherry intended to convey, and did convey, to the said Worsham the premises described in plaintiffs' amended petition, and delineated on the map thereto attached." We are of the opinion that the assignment must be sustained. The description of the land in the deed from Cherry to Worsham, under which appellants claim, is as follows: "A certain tract or parcel of land & being in Tyler county, situated on Cypress creek, a branch of Village creek, being a part of said Cherry headright, beginning at the N. E. corner of a survey for Elizabeth Strong, a stake from which a pine 15 in dia mkd J. P. brs S. 72 deg. din survey; thence west and south far enough to include four hundred acres of land."

It was clearly the intention of the grantor to convey to Worsham 400 acres of land; and, in describing this quantity, he gave the length and direction of three lines, running from the beginning point south, thence east, thence north to a well-defined point, thence calling to go west and south far enough to include the 400 acres conveyed. There is nothing to indicate that the lines thus given will not close, but a mathematical calculation demonstrates that, a line running from the northeast corner only such distance west as that a line running south from the northwest corner would reach, the beginning point would not embrace 400 acres within the boundaries described. The defect in the description consisted in the failure to state the length of two of the lines, and the entire omission of a line necessary to make the survey close. That it was intended to convey to Worsham 400 acres is manifest from the fact that the last two calls show that the tract should extend far enough west to include this quantity, and from the further fact that the unsold balance in the tract of 1,476 acres was supposed to be 576 acres, as shown in the recitals in the deed from Cherry to Farrier, after deducting the 500 acres sold to Dillon, as to the proper description to which there is no question, and the 400 acres sold to Worsham. Now in order that the tract should extend far enough west to include the 400 acres, it was necessary to run from the northwest corner a distance of 2,283.25 varas, which would carry it far beyond the point where a line running south would reach the beginning point. But a line run from a point 2,283.25 varas from the northeast corner, and thence south 456 varas to the south boundary line of the Cherry survey, would include the 400 acres, but would need another call, viz., east with Cherry's south boundary 1,066.25 varas, to close the survey. It is obvious that this call was inadvertently omitted. By supplying this line the requisite quantity is conveyed, the survey is properly closed and the description complete. The omission by mistake of the calls for one line in a set of filed notes is a matter of not infrequent occurrence. "While, therefore, the proposition that the calls of description in question correct themselves, and show the land intended to be described, is not capable of mathematical demonstration, yet that it is true is reasonably certain. Upon such certainty we act in all the highest concerns of life, and it is sufficient for the purpose of the law." Mansel v. Castles, 93 Tex. 414, 55 S. W. 559.

As will appear from our opinion rendered on the former appeal, we held the description of the land in plaintiffs' petition, and in the deed under which plaintiffs claim, was so incomplete as to render the petition demurrable and the deed incompetent as evidence, in the absence of allegations of extraneous facts which would clear up the misdescription. At that time we overlooked the case of Mansel v. Castles, and our attention was not called to it in the briefs of either party. Following that case, we think our opinion reversing the judgment and remanding the cause was wrong, and that the judgment should have been affirmed. As all the facts appear to be fully developed, and as on the undisputed evidence appellants are entitled to a judgment for the title and possession of the land in controversy, this court will here render such judgment as the court below should have rendered. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the appellants do have and recover of the appellees the title and possession of the land described in their petition, and recover of appellees all costs in this behalf incurred, for which they may have their writs of possession and execution.

Reversed and rendered.

3. BROKERS (§ 49*)—COMPENSATION—CONTRACT.

Defendants, who had platted a subdivision, contracted with plaintiff for sale of the lots, giving him the exclusive right of sale for six months. Plaintiff was to exercise reasonable diligence to sell the property within the time specified. Defendants were to receive the proceeds until they amounted to $2,300, after which the proceeds were to be divided with plaintiff as compensation for his services; and, if there should be any unsold lots after defendants had received $2,300 an undivided quarter interest was to be conveyed to plaintiff. Held, that the provision requiring defendants to convey a part of the unsold lots, being only a part of the consideration, was independent of the provision requiring plaintiff to exercise reasonable diligence to sell all the lots; and, upon selling $2,300 worth of lots, he was entitled to the share of proceeds of subsequent sales within

4. BROKERS (§ 80*) — COMMISSIONS—ACTION—DEFENSES.

The undertaking of plaintiff to exercise diligence to sell all the property was one for the breach of which defendants could recover in a separate action for damages, or by a plea in reconvention in the present suit.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1177*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REVERSAL—NECESSITY FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF VERDICT.

In an action for compensation under a contract for the sale of lots in a subdivision, where an issue of fact was raised as to what lots were properly included in the description in the contract, and a general verdict for defendants was rendered, so that it could not be said that the jury had passed upon the question, on reversing the judgment, the cause will be remanded for a new trial, that the issue may be determined.

Appeal from District Court, Bosque County; O. L. Lockett, Judge.

Action by L. B. Mitchell against J. A. Rushing and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

S. H. Lumpkin, for appellant. J. S. Bounds and Cureton & Cureton, for appellees.

HODGES, J. The appellees were the owners of a tract of land situated in the suburbs of Walnut Springs in Bosque county, a portion of which they had mapped and platted, caused a copy to be placed of record in the office of the county clerk of that county, and designated it as "Fairview and Roundhouse Addition to Walnut Springs, Tex." Being desirous of selling those lots, on the 24th day of July, 1906, they entered into the following contract with the appellant, Mitchell: "This instrument is intended to witness the following contract, executed in duplicate, this day entered into by and between J. A. and C. C. Rushing, of the county of Bosque, state of Texas, hereinafter styled parties of the first part, and L. B. Mitchell, of Dallas county, state of Texas, hereinafter styled party of the second part, to wit: The said parties of the first part in consideration of the terms and considerations hereinafter specified give to the party of the second part the sole and exclusive right to sell for a period of six months from this date, the following described property, to wit: All those certain lots and blocks of land known as "Fairview and Roundhouse Addition to the Town of Walnut Springs, Bosque County, Texas," except those heretofore sold, upon the following terms and conditions: Said party of the second part agrees and binds himself to exercise reasonable diligence in his efforts to sell and dispose of the said property within the time specified and upon the terms hereinafter named. The said second party also agrees to direct and supervise the improvement and laying out said property by grading the necessary streets, staking off the lots and blocks and advertising the same preparatory to offering it for sale. All lots and blocks are to be sold for one-third in cash, balance in vendor's lien notes due in six and twelve months from date of sale, with interest at the rate of 10% per annum, unless other terms offered are mutually acceptable to the parties to this contract. The said party of the second part agrees and binds himself to deliver and pay to the parties of the first part all moneys and notes received from the sale of said land, lots and blocks until the said parties of the first part shall have received the sum of twenty-three hundred dollars, and all moneys and notes received from the sale of said land in excess of the sum of twenty-three hundred dollars shall be divided between the parties to this contract on the basis of 75% to the parties of the first part and 25% to the party of the second part as his compensation for selling said lots and blocks. The parties of the first part agree and bind themselves to make general warranty deeds to the purchasers of all lots and blocks sold. The parties of the first part are to defray the expenses incurred in the preparation, advertising, and sale of said property. Should there be any unsold lots after said parties of the first part have received the sum of twenty-three hundred dollars coming to them, a one-fourth undivided interest in said lots so remaining unsold is to be conveyed by general warranty deed by the parties of the first part to the party of the second part. Should the entire property be sold within the time specified the said parties of the first part are to take their proportion of one-third in cash and two-thirds in notes, and the said party of the second part shall take the same proportion in cash and notes."

After the execution of this contract the appellant superintended the laying off and grading of the streets, according to the terms of his contract, and advertised an auction sale to take place on the 29th day of August following. On that day a large number of the lots were sold, and from which was realized in cash and notes the sum of $3,410. The sum of $2,300 was retained by appellees, and the excess over that sum was divided between the parties in the proportion specified in the contract. The appellant, who resided at Dallas, did not again return to Walnut Springs till a short time before the expiration of his option. Before leaving the latter place, however, he had an agreement with Bird & Morris, a firm of real estate agents, who also owned an interest in the property described in the contract, by which they were to represent him during his absence, and to accept and close with any offers for the purchase of lots at satisfactory prices. Bird & Morris, in pursuance of that authority, sold a number of the lots, and the appellees also sold several of them. The exclusive right to dispose of the lots, which had been given to the appellant, expired on the 24th day of January, 1907. After that time a large number of the lots were sold by the appellees, from which they realized the aggregate sum of $2,935. Of this they paid the appellant $172.82, which they claimed was his proportion of the receipts from lots sold during the six months in which he had been given the exclusive right to make sales, but refused to pay him any portion of the proceeds realized from the sales of the lots made after that time had expired. On the 12th day of February, 1908, the appellant filed this suit to recover one-fourth of the proceeds of the sales of the lots made by the appellees, and which they had refused to pay over to him, for a one-fourth undivided interest in the lots then unsold, and for partition. The appellees answered by general and special exceptions, a general denial, and specially denied that the contract sued on embraced any of the lots in Fairview and Roundhouse addition, north of what was called Denmark street as laid off and designated in the plat; that if the contract included any of those lots, it was inserted by a mistake. They further pleaded a failure of consideration, in that the appellant had failed to exercise reasonable and proper diligence in his efforts to sell said property. They also alleged that the appellant had agreed to return and hold other auction sales for the purpose of disposing of the remainder of the unsold lots, but had refused to do so. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the defendants, from which the appellant prosecutes this appeal.

In addition to the facts above mentioned the testimony shows that a plat of what was known as "Fairview and Roundhouse Addition to Walnut Springs" was placed of record in the office of the county clerk of Bosque county, showing the location of streets and alleys, together with the blocks and lots, numbered in the usual way. Denmark street is shown as one of the public streets running east and west, and north of it are quite a number of lots and blocks included in the recorded map. In view of the manner in which the errors charged have been presented by the appellant in his brief we find it more convenient to discuss the questions involved without reference to the assignments in detail. But we think it proper, in this connection, to call the attention of counsel for appellant to the fact that in the preparation of his brief he has ignored most of the rules adopted for guidance in the preparation of cases for appeal. To refuse to consider the assignments in this case because of the failure to comply with those rules would, we think, result in a miscarriage of justice, and for that reason alone we decline to sustain the objections made by the appellees.

The vital question presented is. Was the evidence sufficient to support the verdict and judgment? The suit is based upon the written contract hereinbefore set out, and this clearly entitled appellant to a judgment, unless his engagement to exercise reasonable diligence to dispose of the property during the six months of his exclusive option be treated as a condition upon the faithful performance of which his right to compensation was made to depend, and, further, unless the evidence justified the jury in finding that he had failed to comply with that provision of the contract. The appellant relies upon the following provision in the contract: "Should there be any unsold lots after said parties of the first part have received the sum of twenty-three hundred dollars coming to them, a one-fourth undivided interest in said lots so remaining unsold is to be conveyed by general warranty deed by the parties of the first part to the party of the second part [appellant]." The only defense urged against the enforcement of this provision is the alleged failure on the part of the appellant to exercise reasonable diligence, as he had agreed to do, in making sales of the lots after the auction sale by him on the 29th of August, 1906. This defense is presented in the form of a plea of failure of consideration. The court below submitted the question to the jury, with instructions to find in favor of the appellees in the event they found that appellant had not complied with this provision of his agreement. Generally it is the duty of the court to construe written contracts, and instruct the jury as to their legal effect; and it is error to submit such issues to the jury. Soell v. Hadden, 85 Tex. 187, 19 S. W. 1087; 1 Thompson on Trials, § 1196. But such an error, when committed, is available on appeal as a ground of reversal only in the event the jury places a wrong construction on the written instrument; otherwise the error will be harmless. The verdict of the jury in this case can be accounted for only upon a construction which we think is erroneous; that is, that the right to an undivided interest in the unsold lots depended on the performance of the agreement to exercise reasonable diligence to sell the remainder of the property. The language of the contract is plain and unambiguous, and there is no necessity for resorting to extraneous circumstances, or parol testimony, to aid in its interpretation. But should this be done, the testimony which the appellees offered in that connection strengthens the construction which we have placed upon it.

It will be observed that the contract contains the provision that the appellant was not to receive any commissions on sales till after he had sold a sufficient number of lots to realize the sum of $2,300. One of the appellees testified that the reason for inserting that provision was that they desired to first get back what the land had cost them and the expenses of making the sale. They estimated this at $2,300. This accounts for why appellant's right to compensation was thus postponed till that sum was realized from his sales, and for the further fact that his commissions were fixed at the amount stipulated. The undisputed testimony shows that on the first day of the auction sales more than $2,300 was received from the sale of lots. According to the plain language of the contract, he had then earned the compensation which appellees had agreed to allow him—one-fourth of the cash and notes in excess of $2,300, and an undivided one-fourth of the lots remaining unsold. Any other construction would be treating the agreement to exercise reasonable diligence to dispose of all of the property, and that in which appellees bound themselves to convey an undivided one-fourth interest in the unsold lots, as mutually dependent covenants. The right to an undivided one-fourth of the unsold lots was only a part of the consideration which the appellant was to have for his services in selling a sufficient number of lots to make the receipts amount to $2,300. It is not contended that at the end of the first day's sales appellant was not entitled to one-fourth of the excess of the money realized, nor is it disputed that he was also entitled to one-fourth of what his agents, Bird & Morris, sold thereafter. How, then, can it be said that he was entitled to one portion of the consideration which the contract gave him, and not to the other? No question is raised about appellant's having performed his contract in part at least, and that appellees had accepted the benefits of his services and paid him a portion of that consideration. Having done this, they cannot now be heard to say that he is not entitled to the remainder, unless they can point to a provision in the contract which confers upon them the right to do so. Wiley v. Inhabitants of Athol, 150 Mass. 426, 23 N. E. 311, 6 L. R. A. 343; Kauffman v. Reader, 108 Fed. 171, 47 C. C. A. 278, 54 L. R. A. 247. The stipulations in this instrument must be treated as independent. The covenant by which the appellees agreed to convey a part of the unsold lots, being only a part of the consideration, must be regarded as independent of that provision requiring the appellant to exercise reasonable diligence to sell all of the lots. Broumel v. Rayner, 68 Md. 47, 11 Atl. 833; Antonelle v. Kennedy, 140 Cal. 309, 73 Pac. 966; Deacon v. Blodget, 111 Cal. 416, 44 Pac. 159; Ry. Co. v. Butler, 50 Cal. 577.

The dominant purpose in construing a contract in all cases is to ascertain the real intent of the parties. Had the parties intended that a failure to press the sale after the auction on the 29th of August should forfeit the right of the appellant to any of the unsold lots remaining thereafter, they failed to use any language expressive of such a purpose. We must therefore regard the undertaking on the part of the appellant to exercise reasonable diligence to sell all of the property as an independent covenant, for a breach of which the aggrieved parties might seek recompense in a separate action for damages, if any there were, or by a plea in reconvention in the present suit. There was no reason why they should have intended a forfeiture, on the part of the appellant, of any or all of his commissions for a failure to continue to exercise reasonable diligence to the end of his term of six months, because it was to his interest, as well as to that of the appellees, that he should sell the remainder of the property as rapidly as possible, and for as high a price as was practicable. The evidence is in conflict as to whether or not he agreed to have any other auction sales, or whether he did in fact exercise reasonable diligence in undertaking to sell the remainder of the lots; but, in view of the disposition we make of the case, we think a determination of that issue is wholly immaterial, and that it should not have been submitted to the jury. The contract sued upon had the effect of investing the appellant with an undivided one-fourth interest in the lots belonging to the plat of land which he was to sell, and which remained unsold after the auction sale made by him on the 29th of August, 1906. Moss & Raley v. Wren (Tex.) 113 S. W. 739. The court should have so instructed the jury.

There is some controversy as to whether those lots lying north of Denmark street were a part of the addition which the appellant was to sell. The contract merely describes the property as "all those certain lots and blocks known as 'Fairview and Roundhouse Addition to Walnut Springs.'" No reference is made to any deed or record for the purpose of identifying the lots and blocks specified. The appellant testifies that he was shown the plat which was of record, and this was pointed out to him as the property he was to sell. It is an issue of fact as to how many lots, and what lots, were properly to be included within the description mentioned in the contract. The appellees having raised that question by a proper pleading, it was a pertinent issue to be submitted to the jury. On account of the verdict being general, we cannot say that the jury has passed upon that question. The case will therefore have to be remanded in order for this issue to be determined, and also for a partition of such property as the contract shows the appellant is entitled to have awarded to him in the division between him and the appellees.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

On Rehearing.

In their motion for rehearing the appellees insist that this court should not have considered the assignments presented in the appellant's brief in the original disposition of the case. A sufficient reply to this is found in the fact that we have already considered the assignments objected to. We understand that the rules which it is claimed were violated in presenting the assignments on this appeal were adopted for the convenience of the appellate courts, to aid in the rapid and orderly dispatch of the business, and are directory only. Having once waived the authority to disregard those assignments for noncompliance with the rules, and having performed whatever additional labor was thereby entailed, it would be inexcusable in us to now set aside what we have done solely on account of the objection made.

It is also contended by appellees that we erred in our construction of the contract made between the parties to this suit. They insist that the appellees and the appellant sustained the relation of principals and agent; that appellant's contract was that of a broker, in which he undertook to perform certain services for a stipulated compensation, and that the failure to perform those services in whole or in part would be a good defense against an action to recover compensation, or at least as to so much thereof as had not been properly earned. They further claim that the disposition we make of the case puts them in the attitude of having to pay the agent his compensation and then sue him for damages for a failure to perform the services he contracted to perform. This argument indicates a misconception of the nature and terms of the contract and of the true subject-matter of this suit. It may be conceded as a fact that appellant, Mitchell, was a broker, and as such entered into the contract to sell certain real estate for the appellees, and that this suit is for his compensation for making the sales in pursuance of that undertaking. The compensation Mitchell was to receive, and that for which he sues, was not to be gauged by the time he gave, or the energy he expended, or the degree of diligence he exercised in his efforts to sell the property, but by the results which he accomplished. When those results amounted to sales sufficient to enable the appellees to realize $2,300, then, according to the plain terms of the contract, Mitchell had earned his compensation, and was entitled to demand its payment. Had he been hired for a salary to give his services for a designated term as an agent, or broker, and had failed in whole or in part to render the services which he had agreed to perform, then the rule relied on by the counsel for appellees would be applicable. Mitchell's agreement to exercise reasonable diligence to sell the property during the time he had the exclusive right to handle it was a covenant for the protection of the appellees against damages such as might result from the loss of advantageous sales while the property was exclusively in Mitchell's hands, and was no part of the consideration for his commissions. Let us suppose that Mitchell had given his entire time, and had exercised the utmost diligence to sell this property, but had failed to sell any or enough to realize the sum of $2,300, clearly he would not have earned any part of the commissions, and would be entitled to no compensation. On the other hand, if he had given only a small fraction of his time to the sale of the lots, and had been ever so careless in his efforts, but had succeeded in making sales of all of the property, there could be no controversy about his having earned his full commissions. Hence whatever injury may have been sustained by the appellees by reason of the failure of Mitchell to exercise reasonable diligence in selling the lots would properly be classed as damages, recoverable in an action for that purpose, and could not be made available as a defense under a plea of failure of consideration. It cannot be said that a failure to exercise reasonable diligence in his efforts to sell the property was a failure to perform the consideration in this contract, unless it can also be said that the exercise of that diligence was itself the services for which he was to be paid. Appellees' construction of the contract is untenable, and the argument based upon it is equally so.

Appellees complain that in disposing of the case in the manner we have they are left practically remediless in recovering damages against Mitchell for the failure to exercise the reasonable diligence which he agreed to exercise in his efforts to sell the property. They claim that they filed in the trial court a plea in reconvention claiming damages, but that it was stricken out on exception. No cross-assignments having been presented in the record calling in question the correctness of this ruling of the court, we are not called upon to say whether or not the trial court erred in so doing. They were not forced to submit to that ruling without complaint, but, having done so, must abide the consequences.

The motion is overruled.

Appeal from District Court, Anderson County; B. H. Gardner, Judge.

Action by A. G. Burton against A. A. Goodwin and others, in which defendants A. A. Goodwin and another seek judgment from codefendant Mrs. Mollie E. Pickens, executrix of S. N. Pickens, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and against defendants A. A. Goodwin and another on their cross-action against codefendant, defendants A. A. Goodwin and another appeal. Affirmed.

G. R. Whitley and Jno. F. Weeks, for appellants. W. B. Morris and Thos. B. Greenwood, for appellees.

PLEASANTS, C. J. This suit was brought by appellee Burton against A. A. Goodwin and E. J. McFarland, makers, and against Mrs. Mollie E. Pickens, independent executrix of the last will of S. N. Pickens, deceased, who was indorser, of two notes for $493.27 each, executed January 30, 1907, and payable to S. N. Pickens or order six and twelve months after date respectively, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum and 10 per cent. attorney's fees in event default should be made in the payment of said notes at maturity. The petition alleges the execution and delivery of the notes, their transfer by S. N. Pickens to plaintiff for a valuable consideration on June 19, 1907, without notice to plaintiff of any defense which the makers might have to same, and the failure and refusal of defendants to pay same, though often requested so to do. Recovery is asked against all of the defendants for the amount of the principal and interest due upon said notes and the 10 per cent. attorney's fees as therein provided.

The defendants Goodwin and McFarland filed plea of privilege to be sued in Palo Pinto county where they both reside, and, in connection with and support of said plea of privilege, they also filed the following plea:

"Now comes A. A. Goodwin and E. J. McFarland, two of the defendants in the above styled and numbered cause, and say that the plaintiff cannot prosecute this suit against their defendants, viz., Mrs. Mollie J. Pickens, executrix of S. N. Pickens, deceased, and A. A. Goodwin and E. J. McFarland, jointly, because there is not, nor can there be, any joint cause of action existing against them; that, if in this cause there could be a cause of action at all, it would first be against Mrs. Mollie J. Pickens, the administratrix of the estate of S. N. Pickens, deceased, and that no suit could be brought against her at this time because as these defendants are informed and verily believe, and now charge the fact to be, the pretended claim against her by the indorsement of the said S. N. Pickens, deceased, of the note herein sued on, which has not in due form been presented to her as said executrix, and that the same has not been refused by her, and, if the same is not a binding obligation against the deceased S. N. Pickens, then this court could have no jurisdiction against her as administratrix of such estate, and that the joinder of these defendants, together with the said Mrs. Mollie J. Pickens, administratrix, is a nonjoinder of defendants for the sole purpose of giving this court jurisdiction against these defendants. That, if such note ever existed, it was not a binding obligation against these defendants, then they say that they are not properly joined as defendants with the said Mrs. Mollie J. Pickens, for the reasons above stated. Wherefore they pray the court. A. A. Goodwin. E. J. McFarland, per A. A. G.

"Now comes A. A. Goodwin, for himself and his partner, E. J. McFarland, and says on oath that the above and foregoing allegations are true as to the best of his knowledge and belief. A. A. Goodwin.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 26th day of November, 1907. J. F. Brown, Clerk District Court, Anderson County. [L. S.]"

Subject to these pleas, said defendants filed an answer containing a general exception and several special exceptions to plaintiff's petition, the nature of which is unnecessary to set out, and also the following plea:

"And the defendants A. A. Goodwin and E. J. McFarland say that the note sued on by plaintiffs in this cause never was in fact executed and delivered by them to the said S. N. Pickens, or any other person, and that the said note was, in fact, never delivered to any person for any purpose whatsoever, and that the execution of same was made without defendants' knowledge or consent, and that they nor either of them have never at any time since ratified or confirmed the same. Wherefore the defendants pray that said note or instrument in writing is not their acts or deed and of this he puts himself upon the country, and for further plea in this behalf the defendants A. A. Goodwin and E. J. McFarland deny each and every allegation in plaintiff's petition, and say that the same is untrue and demand strict proof of the same."

This plea was verified by the affidavit of defendant Goodwin. They further answer, in substance, that the notes sued on were executed by said defendants in payment of the purchase money of an insurance business in the city of Mineral Wells sold to them by S. N. Pickens, on or about the 20th day of January, 1907; that they agreed to pay the said S. N. Pickens the sum of $2,500 for said business, provided the premiums upon insurance then in force upon the books of said Pickens amounted to the sum of $2,500 per annum; that they paid the said Pickens the sum of $1,100 in cash and signed the two notes before mentioned with the distinct understanding that they were to remain in the safe in said insurance office until an examination of the books of said business by an expert should show that said annual premiums amounted to the sum of $2,500, and were not to be delivered to, or become the property of, said Pickens, unless said examination of the books developed the fact before stated; that, after the examination of said books by an expert examiner began, said Pickens, knowing that the examination would show that the premiums on the policies in force on said books would not amount to $2,500, and having a key to the safe in which the notes were deposited, took them from said safe without the knowledge of defendants, and said notes were never delivered by these defendants, but were stolen from said safe as aforesaid; that the examination of said books by the expert examiner demonstrated that the premiums on the policies in force therein did not amount to more than $600 per annum, and that upon ascertaining the facts that said notes had been stolen, and that the amount of said premiums was less than $2,500, these defendants on June 12, 1907, before the pretended purchase of the notes by plaintiff, by an advertisement in the Daily Index, a daily paper published in the city of Mineral Wells, advised the public of the facts in regard to said notes and warned every one from purchasing same; that the plaintiff was in Mineral Wells at the time said notice was published and was a reader of said paper and saw and read said notice, or by the use of ordinary care could have seen the same before he acquired said notes, and is therefore charged with notice of the fact that the notes were void for want of consideration. It is further specially denied that the plaintiff purchased said notes or that the same were transferred to him as collateral security for any indebtedness due him from said Pickens. The answer concludes with a prayer that plaintiff take nothing against said defendants, and that they recover against their codefendant, Mrs. Mollie J. Pickens, executrix, the sum of $1,100.

The defendant Mrs. Pickens answered by general denial of both the allegations of the petition and the answer of her codefendants, and, specially answering the prayer of said defendants' answer for judgment against her for the $1,100 paid by them to her testator as part of the purchase money for said insurance business, she avers that, if the facts stated in the answer of said defendants are true, said defendants "with full knowledge of all material facts elected to affirm and did affirm and ratify the purchase by them of the insurance business of S. N. Pickens & Co., and their said promissory notes and the delivery of same to S. N. Pickens, and they cannot now successfully defeat payment of same after having so ratified their contract with S. N. Pickens & Co., and the delivery of said notes to him, and after having appropriated all the benefits of their purchase from S. N. Pickens & Co., and this she is ready to verify, wherefore she prays judgment," etc.

Upon the trial in the court below the case was submitted to a jury upon special issues, and upon the return of verdict judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his petition, and against defendants Goodwin and McFarland on their cross-action against Mrs. Pickens. From this judgment, the defendants Goodwin and McFarland have appealed.

The special issues submitted to the jury and the findings thereon are as follows:

"Question First: Did Goodwin and McFarland execute the notes sued on? To the first question we answer 'Yes.'

"Question Second: Were the notes sued on delivered to S. N. Pickens by Goodwin & McFarland, or by their authority? To the second question we answer 'Yes.'

"Question Third: Did Pickens without the knowledge or consent or authority of Goodwin or McFarland abstract the notes sued on from their possession? To the third question we answer 'No.'

"Question Fourth: Were the notes sued on ever transferred by Pickens to Burton, and, if so, when and for what purpose? To the fourth question we answer 'Yes; June 19, 1907, for indebtedness.'

"Question Fifth: At the time Burton acquired possession of the notes from Pickens, if he acquired them, did he have any notice that Goodwin & McFarland had repudiated the payment of the notes or any part thereof? To the fifth question we answer 'No.'

"Question Sixth: Did Burton receive the notes sued on for collection as the agent of Pickens? To the sixth question we answer 'No.'

"Question Seventh: Did Burton receive the notes sued on as a creditor of Pickens? To the seventh question we answer 'Yes.'

"Question Eighth: Were the notes sued on with or without consideration? To the eighth question we answer, 'With consideration.'

Appellants' first, second, and third assignments of error complain of the action of the trial court in not sustaining their plea of privilege and their plea questioning the right of appellee to maintain this suit against Mrs. Pickens. If Mrs. Pickens was a proper party to the suit, it is not contended that appellants' plea of privilege should have been sustained; but it is earnestly insisted that the evidence shows that appellee did not purchase the notes from S. N. Pickens, but only held them for collection for Pickens' account, and therefore he has no claim against Mrs. Pickens, and she was only made a party defendant for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon the trial court over the non-residents, appellants, herein.

The findings of the jury in answer to the fourth, sixth, and seventh questions, before set out, are to the effect that the notes were transferred by Pickens to appellee in payment of or as security for an indebtedness due him by Pickens, and that appellee did not hold the notes for collection as agent of Pickens. These findings are supported by the evidence. The appellee testified that Pickens owed him on June 19, 1907, a sum of money largely in excess of the amount of the notes, and that on said date "he indorsed them [the notes], and said he wanted to turn them over to me. I was to collect them and take them to Mr. Royal, and credit his account with them." He further testified that he never heard of any claim on the part of the appellants that they had a defense to the notes until June 21st, after he "had bought the notes." He also states: "At the time the notes were transferred to me, I did not pay him [Pickens] a cent. He was considerably in my debt and had been for a long time. I did not receipt for them. I took them for collection. I took them as my notes. He said: 'Here, take these.' I expected to give him credit for them when they were paid."

Mrs. Pickens testified: "I have never claimed possession of these notes. I knew that Mr. Pickens had transferred them to Burton, and they were his property."

Mr. Royal, cashier of the Royal National Bank of Palestine, testified that appellee kept an account at his bank, and that under instructions from appellee he paid insurance premiums due by Pickens and had charged the amount so paid to appellee's account, and that the sums so paid by him which were charged to appellee's account amounted to over $1,800, and at the time these notes were indorsed to appellee the account at the bank showed that Pickens owed appellee about $1,200.

Appellee also testified that: "If the court were to hold that these notes were not good and were not a charge against these parties, I would still be in the same attitude towards the estate as if I were to receive the money. I would still have a claim against the estate as if I had never had the notes. I never gave him credit for them." This evidence shows that appellee is the legal holder and owner of the notes, and it matters not whether he holds them as security for the indebtedness due him by Pickens or took them in payment of such indebtedness. In either case he could maintain a suit thereon against Pickens as indorser if he were living, and can maintain this suit against Mrs. Pickens as independent executrix of said indorser. While Mrs. Pickens was not a necessary party, she is a proper party to the suit, and, such being the case, the fact that the other defendants reside in Palo Pinto county would not entitle them to require the suit to be brought in that county, and the pleas of privilege and misjoinder of parties were properly overruled.

The fourth assignment complains of the ruling of the court in admitting the notes in evidence over the objection of the appellants that there was no proof of their execution, and that defendants had filed plea of non est factum.

The appellant Goodwin testified that he and McFarland signed the notes, but that the rate of interest and the place of payment were inserted in the notes after they were signed. There is no issue raised by the evidence as to the actual signing of the notes by the appellants; the only issue being as to whether they were delivered to Pickens. Goodwin testified that they were placed in the safe in the office, and it was understood that they were not to be delivered to Pickens until the business was checked up; that Pickens had papers in this safe, and had access thereto; and that witness did not know the notes had been taken therefrom until the 14th or 15th of June, 1907. He further testified that the examination of the books had shown that the business was not what it had been guaranteed to be by Pickens, and that under their agreement Pickens was not entitled to the notes.

A. M. Blount testified for the defendants that he was present at the time the trade between Pickens and appellants was made, and that the amount of the consideration was to be determined by the amount that the insurance business would receive from policy renewals during the year succeeding the date of the sale, such amount to be determined by the amount of premiums on the policies carried by the business at the time of the trade and shown by the books to be then in force. He further testified that the notes were executed and placed in the safe in the office with the understanding that, if the checking of the books showed the business to be less than the consideration for the sale, the notes were to be credited with the difference. He further testified that the understanding was that the notes were not to bear interest, and that the place of payment was not named. He investigated the books, and the amount of premiums on the policies carried on said books was about $1,000 less than the amount appellants had agreed to pay for the business, which difference would more than cancel the notes. At the time the notes were signed and placed in the safe, and for several weeks thereafter, Blount was in the employ of Pickens, and had charge of the office and safe. Pickens had the only key to the box in the safe in which the notes were placed. The appellee and the appellant Goodwin and several other witnesses testified that Pickens was a man of highest integrity and had the confidence of all who knew him. The written contract of sale contained no guaranty of any kind. When the notes were indorsed and delivered to appellee, they were taken by Pickens from a bank in Mineral Wells where he kept his papers. The undisputed evidence shows that if there was any guaranty as to the value of the business, as claimed by appellants, or any limitation upon Pickens' right to dispose of the notes, or any change made in the interest rate specified in the notes, appellee had no notice thereof at the time he purchased. We think this evidence sustains the finding of the jury that the notes were executed—that is, signed and delivered—by appellants. If it be conceded that the evidence shows that the notes were to be held by Pickens until the examination of the books should determine what amount, if any, they should be credited with, this agreement would not affect appellee, who purchased from Pickens without notice of the agreement. In placing the notes in Pickens' safe, or in a safe under his control, appellants put them in his possession, and cannot be heard to say, as against an innocent purchaser, that the notes were never executed because not delivered to the payee.

The sixth assignment complains of the judgment giving appellee 10 per cent. interest on the notes. What we have said under the foregoing assignment disposes of this assignment, which is also overruled.

The seventh assignment, which complains of the verdict on the ground that it is contrary to the evidence, is too general to require consideration.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed, and it has been so ordered.

Affirmed.

HOLDER v. SHELBY et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 11, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1909.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 325*)—ACTIONS BETWEEN PARTNERS—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

A violation of the right of a partner to share in the management of the firm affairs and to participate in the profits is a sufficient breach of the partnership contract to warrant the appointment of a receiver, and such receiver can be appointed either while the business is in full operation or in process of dissolution, and the appointment may be made without notice on the sworn petition of a partner, where his petition shows that the partnership property is in the hands of a third person, and that the petitioner has been excluded from participating in the management of it, and such appointment will determine no right as between the parties nor affect the title to the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 273*) — DISSOLUTION — GROUNDS OF ACTION.

A violation of the right of a partner to participate in the management of the partnership affairs and in the profits is sufficient to warrant a decree dissolving the partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 620; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 322*)—ACTIONS BETWEEN PARTNERS—INTERVENTION BY CREDITORS.

In an action brought by a partner to dissolve the partnership and for an accounting and a receiver, creditors of the partnership may intervene to have their established claims ordered paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 322.*]

4. ESTOPPEL (§ 75*)—ACQUIESCENCE BY PERMITTING SALE OF PROPERTY.

Where the owner of goods intrusts the same to a partnership, and permits it to hold itself out as the sole owner of the goods and to conduct the business in its name, the owner is estopped, as to creditors of the firm, from claiming the goods or the proceeds of the sale of the same so long as such creditors are unpaid.

plished the stock, and at the expiration of such time turn it back to the owner or so much as was on hand, and to turn back goods of a like kind to an amount equal to the value of the original stock, and to pay the owner for the use thereof 10 per cent. on the invoice price, is not a contract which is against public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 186*)—RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS—APPLICATION OF ASSETS TO LIABILITIES.

Where the owner of a stock of goods transfers them to R. under an agreement by which R. is to handle the stock for a year, and then turn back to the owner a stock of goods of similar kind and equal in value to the original stock, and to pay the owner for the use thereof 10 per cent. on the invoice price, and R. enters into partnership with S., if S. knew when he went into the firm of the contract with the owner, then, on dissolution of the firm, after the firm debts were paid, the owner would have the right to have set aside to him out of the surplus property the value of the original property in proportion that the value of the property R. put into the partnership bears to the aggregate value of the stock put in by both partners when the partnership was created, and the owner, as against the partners, will have the right to the proceeds of this distribution to him in priority of equities between the partners, but, if S. did not have notice of the contract with the owner when forming the partnership, then the owner would have a personal claim only against R. for the value of the goods under his contract, and in payment of such claim could have the interest of R. in the surplus of the firm property, after firm debts were paid, subjected to the payment of his claim, but in no event would the claim of the owner be a firm liability.

Appeal from District Court, Franklin County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Action by C. A. Shelby against T. A. Holder and another to dissolve a partnership between C. A. Shelby and H. F. Ramsey, and for a receiver. The Paris Grocery Company, a creditor of the partnership, intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Holder appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part and remanded.

Appellee Shelby brought the suit to dissolve a partnership, and for an accounting, and for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the stock of merchandise. It was alleged that said appellee and H. F. Ramsey on February 2, 1906, entered into a copartnership at will for the purpose of engaging in the sale of groceries and the manufacture and sale of leather goods; that they continued in said business until about the 1st day of January, 1907, when it was mutually agreed that the partnership should be dissolved; that notwithstanding the terms of said partnership agreement the defendant Ramsey on January 2, 1907, turned the ence of said partnership the firm contracted debts, which were due, and the defendants refused to pay same, and had refused to permit the appellee to have anything to do with the partnership business, and had refused to account to him for the proceeds of the goods sold; that, on an accounting, the defendant Ramsey would be indebted to him in the sum of $1,500. Upon presentation of the petition, which was verified by affidavit, to the judge of the court in vacation, a receiver was appointed who took charge of the merchandise, and, upon an order of the court, reduced the entire stock to money. Appellant Holder pleaded that he and Ramsey on November 1, 1905, entered into a contract, whereby appellant, who at the time exclusively owned the stock of goods, turned over the same to Ramsey for the space of 12 months; that Ramsey agreed to take the goods and carry on the business for said time, and from time to time replenish the stock and keep it up, and at the expiration of such time to turn it back to appellant, or so much as was on hand, and to turn back goods of a like kind to an amount to equal the value of the original stock, and to pay appellant for the use thereof 10 per cent. on the invoice price; that Ramsey took the said stock and continued the business under said agreement; that appellee Shelby, knowing at the time about the contract with appellant, and knowing his interest and the value thereof, and agreeing and assenting thereto, entered into the partnership with the said Ramsey. The prayer was for the value of the goods, or the amount received for them in the sale by the receiver, or for judgment against the firm for their value, and that he be paid pro rata with the other creditors, and for general and special relief that he might be entitled to in the premises. The appellee the Paris Grocery Company intervened in the suit, alleging that it was a creditor of the firm of Ramsey & Shelby, and prayed for judgment for its debt, and, that the same be paid out of the proceeds of the said firm property then being administered by the court in receivership proceedings. The case was tried to a jury, and, in accordance with their verdict, a judgment was entered in favor of the intervener against the firm of Ramsey & Shelby, and directing the payment out of the proceeds of the partnership property in the hands of the receiver and in favor of Ramsey the sum of $504.45 against appellee Shelby, the amount on accounting found due him. The court further ordered the receiver after paying all costs of the receivership to pay all the partnership creditors as set out in the petition and the judgment, and, if there were not sufficient funds for such purpose, to prorate the same among them. The court directed a verdict against appellant, Holder, who, from the judgment so entered against him, brings the case on appeal.

W. L. Tittle and R. T. Wilkinson, for appellant. A. L. Burford, R. E. Davenport, and C. A. Sweetor, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). Assignments Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 are directed to the action of the court in overruling the appellant's motion to vacate the order appointing a receiver. The receiver was appointed on January 5, 1905, in vacation, and at once qualified and took possession of the stock of goods. After taking possession, and by order of the court, the receiver sold all the property for cash. This provisional order appointing the receiver was not contested or appealed from. The motion to dissolve now in question was not presented until the March term of the court, 1908, at which time the court overruled the motion. We do not think that this ruling of the court could in this case be disturbed, for the reason that, under all the pleadings, it could be affirmatively determined that the appointment of a receiver was warranted. The facts stated show a conflict of interest in the property and the exclusion of a partner from participation in the partnership business. As each member of a partnership has the right to share in the management of the firm affairs and to participate in the profits, a material violation of this right is a sufficient breach of the partnership contract to warrant a decree dissolving the firm and the appointment of a receiver; and it makes no difference whether the exclusion takes place while the business is in full operation or in the course of mutual dissolution. Alderson on Receivers, § 460; Rische v. Rische (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 849; article 1465, Rev. St. 1895. Because the provisional order of appointment was made on the sworn petition, and without notice, did not in this case render the appointment of the receiver void. The allegations of the petition were sufficient, and were not subject to the objection urged. In order to warrant the appointment of a receiver on an application for that purpose, it does not have to appear conclusively that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Cemetery Co. v. Drew, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 36 S. W. 802. The appointment of a receiver determines no right as between the parties, nor does it as between the parties, affect the title to the property in any way. That appellant was in possession of the property would not prevent the appointment. It is sometimes necessary to appoint a receiver of property where the interests of the parties to the suit are so connected with those of third persons that the necessary possession of the receiver conflicts with the legal rights of such third persons. These third persons, however, have the legal right to test the question of their rights in the case, and the court will make such order for the protection of their rights, if any they show themselves to have, as may be just and equitable.

The court did not err in refusing to dismiss the intervention of the creditors named, and the sixth and seventh assignments are overruled. If the interveners, as simple creditors, and not lienholders, had sought the appointment of a receiver in the case, another question might be presented. But when partnership funds, as in this case, pass into the hands of a court for administration, this gives the creditors of the partnership such an interest therein as entitles them to intervene in that proceeding to have ordered paid their established claims. The Texas Produce Company had already obtained judgment for its debt in the justice court, and the amount of the claim for which the Paris Grocery Company sought judgment in the intervention was within the jurisdiction of the district court. As against appellant, we think these two interveners and the other partnership creditors of the firm of Ramsey & Shelby could legally claim to have the partnership property and assets of the said firm applied to the payment of their claims in preference to any claim appellant could show himself entitled to in this case. By permitting Ramsey and the firm of Ramsey & Shelby to hold themselves out as the apparent sole owners of the stock of goods, and to conduct the business in their names, the appellant is estopped, as to such creditors of the said firm, from claiming the goods, or the proceeds of the sale of the same, so long as such creditors remain unpaid. By reason of the estoppel, appellant's claim, as he may or may not establish, is postponed in participation of the proceeds of the sale of the property until such creditors are first paid therefrom.

The remaining assignments of error present the question of the rights of appellant in the case against Ramsey & Shelby and Shelby individually. The answer of appellant sets up the facts authorizing a judgment against Ramsey individually, but he does not in words pray for a judgment against him. He, however, does pray for such general relief as he may be entitled to in the premises; and, under such pleading, we are inclined to think that the questions presented could be successfully asserted. The court gave a peremptory instruction to find against appellant, and we are of the opinion that this was error. The contract made between appellant and Ramsey was not as between the said parties void and against public policy, and for that reason issuable facts in relation to such contract arose between the parties in the case, and which should have been submitted to the jury. If the appellee

Shelby knew at the time he went into partnership with Ramsey of the contract that appellant had with Ramsey about the goods, then, after the partnership debts were paid, the appellant, as beneficial owner, would have the right to have partitioned and set aside to him out of the surplus partnership property the value of the property in proportion that the value of the goods and property which Ramsey put in the partnership at the time of forming the partnership bears to the aggregate value of the entire stock put in by both partners at the time the partnership was created by Ramsey and Shelby. And appellant, as against both Ramsey and Shelby, would have the right to the proceeds of this distribution to him in priority of equities between the parties. If, however, Shelby did not have notice of the contract with Holder at the time of his forming the partnership with Ramsey, then the appellant would have to look alone to a personal claim against Ramsey for the value of the goods and interest under his contract, and could in payment of his claim have subjected the interest of Ramsey in the surplus of the partnership property after firm debts were paid, together with such interest, if any, that might be awarded Ramsey in the accounting between him and his partner as the evidence might warrant. We do not think that the claim of appellant in the case could be held to be a partnership liability in any event. Neither could there be a liability to appellant on the ground of conversion of the property by the firm. Appellant by the contract with Ramsey authorized the daily sale of the goods; and, if either Ramsey or the firm of Ramsey & Shelby sold the goods, it was the use and disposition of the property in a way not inconsistent with authority from appellant so to do.

The judgment will be affirmed so far as it directs the payments of firm creditors and authorizes and requires the receiver to pay the partnership debts, but is reversed and remanded for a trial of the issues between appellant and Ramsey & Shelby.

DAWSON v. BALDRIDGE et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 837*)—REVIEW—SCOPE—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

No notice can be taken of an unsworn answer in determining whether a trial court erred in dissolving a temporary injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 837.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 172*)—DISSOLUTION—ANSWER TAKEN AS TRUE.

On motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer, the answer, when sworn to in so far as responsive to the bill, is taken as true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 876; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 172*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—DISSOLUTION—WHEN PROPER.

A temporary injunction will be dissolved when the answer is sworn to, and equivocally denies all the material allegations of the bill, unless irreparable mischief is likely to ensue from its dissolution, or unless some peculiar circumstances exist.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 374-384; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 266*)—SALE BETWEEN—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

A pretended sale by a husband of a stock of merchandise to his wife, purchased by the wife with money borrowed upon the faith of her separate property as security, was ineffectual, as it is not the separate property of the wife, but community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

5. INJUNCTION (§ 171*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—DISSOLUTION—BILL TAKEN AS TRUE.

On motion to dissolve a temporary injunction, the bill must be taken as true, in the absence of a sworn answer traversing the equity of the bill.

Appeal from Edwards County Court; A. P. Allison, Judge.

Action by J. A. Dawson against J. D. Baldrige and others. From an interlocutory order dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

This is an appeal from an interlocutory order dissolving a temporary injunction issued in this case, restraining the defendants J. D. and M. S. Baldrige from handling, using, appropriating, or in any manner consuming or withdrawing, any part or parcel, item or article, of property belonging to the mercantile business of Baldrige, Whatley & Allen, located at Barksdale, in Edwards county, until further order of the court. It would be foreign to this appeal to state more of the proceedings in the case, or express any opinion upon the merits of the case, than is necessary to a decision of the question whether the temporary writ of injunction should have been dissolved.

The grounds upon which the writ was granted, as disclosed by plaintiff's petition, which was filed February 12, 1909, are, substantially, that on October 4, 1904, plaintiff's wife, Una Dawson, was the owner in her own right, as her separate property, of a general stock of goods, wares, merchandise, and fixtures of the value of $1,200, which were in Bandera, Bandera county, Tex., and in possession of the defendant J. D. Baldrige, who had theretofore been conducting in that town a mercantile business; that on said date the indebtedness of such business was ascertained to be $893, and then plaintiff entered into a written contract with Baldrige concerning said stock of goods, etc., which is as follows: "The State of Texas, County of Bandera.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

This agreement made and entered into this 8th day of October A. D. 1904, by and between Mrs. Una Dawson, who is herein joined by her husband, J. A. Dawson, for the sole purpose of expressing his assent hereto, party of the first part and J. D. Baldrige, party of the second part, both parties being residents of Bandera county, Texas, witnesseth: First. The said party of the first part, being the owner in her own separate right, of that certain stock of goods, wares and merchandise and store fixtures, situated in the town of Bandera, valued at twelve hundred dollars, and with which the said party of the second part, has heretofore been doing business as a merchant, agrees, consents and contracts to and with the said second party, that he the said second party may remove the said stock of goods, wares, merchandise and fixtures, to the village of Concan in Uvalde county, Texas, and there enter into copartnership with the firm of Caddell Bros., or with either of them, and shall there remain in the full and peaceable possession of the said goods, wares, merchandise and fixtures, upon the faithful performance by him, the second party, of the stipulations and agreements entered into and agreed to be done by him. The said party of the second part hereby agrees, contracts and binds himself to take charge of said stock of goods, wares, merchandise and fixtures, and of the said business of merchandising, at said village of Concan, or other place that may be mutually agreed upon hereafter and enter into said copartnership with said Caddell Bros., and conduct said business in a good, careful and prudent businesslike manner, in his own name, or in the name of said Baldrige and Caddell Bros. and from the proceeds thereof, pay off all the present indebtedness, owing by said business heretofore conducted by him at Bandera, and elsewhere amounting to the sum of eight hundred and ninety-three no/100 dollars. To keep good and accurate book accounts of each and every transaction had by him in the management of said business, which said books shall be at all times open and subject to the inspection and examination of the said party of the first part, her agent or attorney. The said party of the second part shall receive as full compensation for his said services the sum of thirty dollars per month, from the proceeds of said business, from this date until the said indebtedness shall be paid, when the stock of goods, wares, merchandise and fixtures then on hand shall be equally divided, or in the event that said parties shall desire to still do business together, then articles of copartnership may be entered into by them. Third. In the event that either party to this contract shall fail, refuse or neglect to perform the conditions by her or him herein entered into, then this contract shall at once terminate, and the party so failing, refusing or neglecting to perform his or her agreements shall forfeit to the other party all his interests and rights herein conferred. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto signed their names in Bandera, this the day and date first herein written, signing in duplicate. Una Dawson. J. A. Dawson. J. D. Baldrige." This instrument was duly acknowledged by the parties thereto.

The petition then alleges that the defendant J. D. Baldrige retained possession of the property under the agreement, for the purposes stated in the agreement, charged with the duties he obligated himself thereby to discharge; that, while no time was specified in the agreement within which Baldrige should pay off the indebtedness, a reasonable time was contemplated by the parties, which is alleged in the petition to be four years; that a reasonable time has elapsed, and that Baldrige has in fact heretofore, on October 8, 1908, paid off and discharged said indebtedness, and that during the period from the date of the contract up to that time he had used and consumed the $30 per month allowed him by the contract for his services; that there was on hand on October 8, 1908, after paying off the indebtedness of $893 as stipulated, and in Baldrige's possession merchandise belonging to said business of the total value of $800, which was then subject to division, one-half of which was the property of plaintiffs; that, though often demanded, the defendant has failed and refused to deliver to plaintiffs their share of the goods, or pay them the value thereof, and that under the last paragraph of the contract, by reason of Baldrige's failure to perform his part of the agreement, plaintiffs became entitled to all the merchandise on hand, or the value thereof, amounting to $800, but that, if they are mistaken in this, they are at least entitled to an undivided half interest in the stock of goods, or the value thereof, which is alleged to be $400; that about two years ago, the exact date being unknown by plaintiffs, the defendant J. D. Baldrige, without their knowledge or consent, made some pretended sale or transfer of said stock of merchandise to his wife, M. S. Baldrige, by which he attempted to pass the title thereto for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff out of said goods; that the attempted sale being a sham, fraudulent and colorable only, passed no title to said property.

The petition then alleges that Baldrige, some time after the pretended sale to his wife, the date being unknown to plaintiffs, after removing the stock of goods to Barksdale, Edwards county, formed a partnership in the mercantile business with one W. N. Whatley, who brought additional capital thereto, the firm then organized being known as Baldrige & Whatley; that the interest and capital placed in that firm by Baldrige was the identical stock of goods, in its various changes and mutations, that he had received from plaintiffs; that about January, 1906, one G. M. Allen bought an interest in said firm of Baldridge & Whatley, and the firm name was changed to Baldridge, Whatley & Allen, and is still continued at Barksdale under such firm name; that Allen brought additional capital into the firm, but that the only capital placed in the firm by Baldridge was that placed in the partnership of Baldridge & Whatley, which was as before alleged; that the capital in the present firm is of the value of about $4,000, of which Whatley and Allen each own about two-fifths or $1,600, and the Baldridges the remainder of about one-fifth, or $800; that each and all the members of said firm are in possession of said business, and handling and carrying on therewith a general merchandise business, each having the privilege of withdrawing from the business and appropriating to his own use whatever he may desire; that Baldridge is withdrawing therefrom constantly, and appropriating the corpus and interest thereof to his own use in large quantities and values, to plaintiffs' injury and great damage, without legal right so to do; that said property is in danger of being lost, removed, and materially injured; that Baldridge is insolvent, and to permit him to consume said property will work great and irreparable injury to plaintiffs, who will lose all he withdraws and consumes; that Whatley and Allen are each resident citizens of Edwards county, Tex., and are the owners of the four-fifths interest in said firm and business, as aforesaid, and became such owners without notice of plaintiffs' interest in the property brought into the firm by Baldridge, and are in possession thereof, and for the purpose of affecting them with such notice they are made parties defendant.

Plaintiffs aver that the facts alleged require the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and manage said business, at least as to the interest of the Baldridges, which interest should be taken from their possession and control, and that they should be enjoined from having or exercising any right or control thereof, or from withdrawing therefrom, or appropriating to themselves in any manner any part thereof, until the question of ownership shall be decided by the court, and that, unless they are so enjoined, plaintiffs will suffer great loss and irreparable injury. Plaintiffs suggest the appointment of Whatley and Allen as receivers, pray for an accounting, etc., showing the interest of the Baldridges in the firm property, etc., and for an injunction such as was temporarily granted, for judgment against Baldridge such as plaintiffs may be entitled to under the allegations and proof thereof in their petition. The allegations in the petition were duly sworn to by J. A. Dawson; and, upon such petition, the temporary writ of injunction was awarded and issued. The defendants Baldridge answered at great length; but, as their answer was not sworn to, no notice can be taken of it by this court in determining whether the trial court erred in dissolving the temporary injunction.

The motion to dissolve the injunction contains the following statement made and sworn to by J. D. Baldridge, viz.: "I, J. D. Baldridge, do solemnly swear that I am one of the defendants in the above-entitled and numbered cause, and that my wife, M. S. Baldridge, is also a defendant in said cause; that the stock of goods in which plaintiffs had an interest at the date of the contract alleged and set up by them in their petition in this cause was moved from Bandera, Tex., to Concan in Uvalde County, Tex., and with said stock of goods defendant J. D. Baldridge conducted a mercantile business for about nine months, until the latter part of June, 1905, at which date said business was suspended, for the reason that it was being run at a loss, and that when so suspended said stock of goods, wares, and merchandise and accounts then on hand and belonging to said business was of the invoice price of $1,000.10, but was not of a market value of more than $900, and that at said date when said business was suspended, there was existing as valid subsisting indebtedness against said business an aggregate amount of $1,056.13, including $100 then due to J. D. Baldridge for services rendered by him in attending to said business; that on or about July 1, 1906, deponent says that, in order to pay off said indebtedness due on said business, he was compelled to sell said goods, wares, and merchandise, and did sell the same, to M. S. Baldridge for a valuable consideration, a consideration in excess of the value of said goods, wares, and merchandise, and that said M. S. Baldridge paid therefor, by and with her individual, separate funds borrowed by her, and for the repayment of which she gave her personal obligation, and pledged her separate estate; that said sale to M. S. Baldridge was not made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, nor for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs, but was made for the purposes stated above; that said M. S. Baldridge is the legal and equitable owner in her own separate right of said goods, wares, and merchandise, representing the Baldridge interest in the firm of Baldridge, Whatley & Allen, and that J. D. Baldridge has no interest whatever in said business in his own right." No evidence was heard nor considered by the court in determining whether the injunction should be dissolved; but it seems the court acted alone upon the statement contained in defendants' motion to dissolve.

Ben H. Kelly and Fisher & Walker, for appellant. W. D. Love and J. T. Friestman, for appellees.

NEILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Upon motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer the answer, when sworn to, in so far as it is responsive to the bill, is taken as true. And the rule is that, when the sworn answer fully and unequivocally denies all the material allegations of the bill upon which complainant's answer rests, the injunction will be dissolved. This rule, however, requires positive averments in the answer, and not merely general allegations of denial based on information and belief. The denial must be of the same positive character as the averments in the bill on which the complainant's equities are based. Nor will an answer suffice where it is not fully responsive to the bill. But where the allegations of the answer are full and responsive to the bill, and fully deny its equity, the injunction will be dissolved, unless apparent irreparable mischief is likely to ensue from its dissolution, or unless some peculiar circumstances exist to warrant a departure from the rule. High on Injunction, § 1505. But the dissolution, like the granting of the interlocutory injunction, is largely a matter of judicial discretion, to be determined by the nature of the particular case under consideration. A dissolution, therefore, does not necessarily follow upon the coming in of the answer denying the material allegations of the bill upon which the injunction issued, and the court may, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, refuse a dissolution and continue the injunction for a hearing, where the circumstances of the case seem to demand this course. Especially will this discretion be exercised where fraud is the gravamen of the bill, or where it is apparent to the court that a dissolution of the injunction would result in greater injury and hardship than its continuance to the hearing, or where it is apparent that by the dissolution complainant would lose all the benefit which would otherwise accrue to him should he finally succeed in his cause. A temporary injunction should not be dissolved where its dissolution would result in irreparable injury to the plaintiff. High on Inj. § 1508.

Taking the view of the pleadings and the proceedings most favorable to the action of the court in dissolving the injunction, and regarding the facts set out in the motion as the defendants' answer to plaintiffs' bill, it will be seen that there is not a full and unequivocal denial of all the material allegations relied upon by plaintiffs for the injunction. But on the contrary, it rather intensifies the plaintiffs' showing of their right to the writ, in that it shows that defendant J. D. Baldrige, in violation of the trust reposed in him by plaintiffs, as shown by the written agreement, has without authority made a simulated sale of plaintiffs' property, intrusted to his care and management, to his wife, and is claiming possession and the right to dispose of it under such fictitious sale. The pretended sale to his wife is no better than a sale of the property by Baldrige to himself; i. e., no sale at all. For, as is held in Heidenheimer v. McKeen, 63 Tex. 229, merchandise purchased by the wife with money borrowed upon the faith of her separate property as security is not the separate property of the wife, but community property of the husband and wife.

The sworn allegations in defendants' motion to dissolve the injunction being no answer, such as equity requires, to the plaintiffs' bill, which must be taken as true in the absence of such an answer, it necessarily follows that the court erred in dissolving the temporary injunction. Wherefore such interlocutory order is reversed and vacated, and judgment is here rendered reinstating said injunction to its original force and effect, to so remain until the case is finally disposed of on its merits.

Reversed and rendered.

HOUSTON & T. O. R. CO. v. SHAPARD.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 27, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

Where the court charged that the burden was on plaintiff to prove that he was injured as the direct result of defendant's negligence, and that if the open switch, into which plaintiff's train ran, was not the result of the negligence of defendant's servants, the jury should find for defendant, and that they should construe all parts of the charge together, an instruction that if the open switch was the result of the negligence of defendant's servants in not properly closing it, or in not keeping it closed, and plaintiff's injuries, if any, were the direct result of the negligence of defendant's servants in regard to the switch, and plaintiff did not assume the risks, then he was entitled to recover, was not objectionable as assuming that defendant's servants were negligent "in not properly closing the switch."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 428-430; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Such instruction was also not objectionable as submitting the negligence of defendant's employees in not "properly" closing the switch, on the theory that the only negligence charged was that the switch was not "closed"; there being no distinction presented by the evidence between "closing" and "properly closing" the switch.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1156; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

3. TRIAL (§§ 251, 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

It is error to charge on an issue not presented by the pleadings or on which there is no evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587, 596; Dec. Dig. §§ 251, 252.*]

erly closing it or in not keeping it closed, and plaintiff's injuries were the direct result of defendant's negligence in regard to the switch, etc., he was entitled to recover, was not objectionable as assuming the negligence of defendant's employes in not keeping the switch closed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 428-430; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 276*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—OPEN SWITCH—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a railroad fireman by his engine running into an open switch, evidence held not to warrant a conclusion that the switch was closed by the brakeman of another train and was afterwards forcibly thrown open by an unauthorized person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 959; Dec. Dig. § 276.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 852*)—REVIEW—THEORY OF VERDICT—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION.

The fact that the evidence preponderates strongly in favor of the verdict is of weight in determining whether the verdict was the result of an alleged erroneous theory resulting from one of the instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3402; Dec. Dig. § 852.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 291*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RAILROADS—OPEN SWITCH—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff was injured by his engine running into an open switch and colliding with a freight train. The court charged that if the freight brakeman closed the switch, and it was afterwards, and before the arrival of plaintiff's train, opened by some unauthorized person so that the act could not have been prevented by defendant's use of ordinary care, or if the jury believed that such opening could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been discovered by defendant's servants in time to have closed the switch before plaintiff's train arrived, or if the jury believed that the switch being open was not the result of negligence on defendant's part, they should find for defendant. Held, that such instruction was not objectionable as placing the burden of proof of showing that the switch being open was not due to defendant's negligence on it; the court having also directly charged that the burden was on plaintiff to show that his injury was the direct result of defendant's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1140, 1141; Dec. Dig. § 291.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 38*)—EARNING CAPACITY—IMPAIRMENT OF MIND.

That plaintiff's mind was not as accurate as it was before he was hurt may be considered on the question of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 237; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

9. WITNESSES (§ 236*)—MANNER OF TESTIFYING—EXPLANATION.

Where, in an action for injuries, plaintiff on direct examination hesitated and apparently thought or studied before answering questions, and his counsel asked him why he did this, his answer, that he did not know, except that his mind was not as accurate as it was before he was hurt, was not objectionable on the ground that it was for the jury to determine

10. EVIDENCE (§ 9*)—X-RAY PHOTOGRAPHS—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Courts will take judicial notice of the accuracy of an X-ray photographic view of the bones of a living body, when properly taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

11. EVIDENCE (§ 359*)—X-RAY PHOTOGRAPHS.

In an action for injuries, X-ray photographs shown to have been properly taken were not objectionable on the ground that, without cutting away intervening tissue, it was impossible to tell whether the pictures correctly represented the condition of plaintiff's injured bones.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1510; Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

12. TRIAL (§ 29*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REMARKS BY COURT.

Defendant's counsel asked a witness if he frequently found switches opened by persons not connected with the road, and if he knew of any method by which railroad companies could avoid such conditions. After this question had been answered in the negative, plaintiff's counsel said that he did not object to it, but did not think it was a proper question, and the court remarked, "I don't think the question is proper." Held, that the court's statement was improper, but related to the admissibility rather than the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

13. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1046*)—STATEMENTS BY COURT—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a railroad fireman by running into a freight train on a siding because of an open switch, the evidence preponderated in favor of the theory that defendant's brakeman on the freight train standing near the switch had failed to close it, and it was improbable that the switch after having been closed had been tampered with by some miscreant, an erroneous remark of the court that he did not believe a question, calling for a witness' opinion as to whether there was any method by which railroads could prevent switches from being tampered with, was proper, though not objected to, was not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4134; Dec. Dig. § 1046.*]

14. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

It is not error to refuse requests to charge substantially covered by the instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 651; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

15. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Plaintiff, a railroad fireman, 27 years of age, was injured by his engine colliding with a freight train on a siding because of an open switch. He was earning at the time of the accident $125 a month, but his earnings for five months before had averaged $65 a month. He sustained a compound fracture of both bones of one leg between the knee and the ankle. One of the bones never properly united, in consequence of which his foot was turned in, interfering with his walking. He would never have proper use of that leg, but in time would secure some substantial use of it. When he lay in the hospital, about a dozen small pieces of bone were taken from his leg. After he was thrown from the cab, as he lay on the ground, his legs and feet and some parts of his body were severely burned. Held, that a verdict allowing plaintiff $25,000 was excessive and should be reduced to $17,500.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Norman G. Kittrell, Judge.

Action by Charles P. Shapard against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed on condition.

Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood and Lane, Jackson, Kelley & Walters, for appellant. O. T. Holt and Lovejoy & Parker, for appellee.

REESE, J. This is a suit by appellee against appellant to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received by him as the result of a collision between an engine on which plaintiff was riding, and on which he was employed as fireman, and another engine on defendant's railway line. It was alleged by plaintiff that the accident, which was the occasion of his injuries, was caused by the engine on which he was fireman, and on which he was riding, leaving the main track and colliding with an engine attached to a freight train standing on a side track, and that the switch leading from the main track to the siding had been left open through the negligence of defendant's agents and servants. Defendant pleaded general denial and assumed risk. Upon a trial with a jury, there was a verdict for plaintiff for $25,000, and from the judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The facts with regard to the accident, as disclosed by the evidence, are as follows: Appellee was in the employ of appellant as a fireman on a passenger engine, which, with its train of 10 cars, left Houston, north bound, at 9:20 o'clock p. m. on December 18, 1906. The train, which had been running at a speed of about 60 miles an hour, when approaching the station at Thornton, slowed down to about 30 miles an hour, and was running at about this speed, approaching the station. When the engine got within about 50 yards of a switch just south and a short distance from the station, the engineer discovered that the switch was open. An engine attached to a south-bound freight train was standing on the side track into which the switch led, and about 75 feet from the switch. The passenger engine plunged through the open switch into the freight engine. Appellee, who had just previously been engaged in testing the water in the boiler of his engine, had just gotten back into his seat on the left side of the cab when the engineer exclaimed that the switch was open. He tried to get through the window in front of the cab, intending to get out on the running board alongside of the boiler and jump from there to the ground; but his clothing caught, and when the collision occurred he was thrown back into the cab, and caught in some way, and his leg broken, and from there he was thrown to the ground, where he lay until some one came to his relief and carried him to a place of safety. An oil tank car was next to the freight engine, and in some way the oil escaped therefrom and covered the ground. This oil caught fire, and appellee suffered some injuries by being burned before he was removed. Both of the bones of his leg were broken between the knee and the ankle. The passenger train was due to arrive at Thornton at 2:30 a. m., but was about 13 minutes late. The evidence justifies the conclusion that the freight train south bound arrived at Thornton, finished the switching, and went in on the siding a few minutes earlier. One Maddox was the head brakeman of the freight train, and in the discharge of his duties as such he opened the switch to let the freight engine in on the siding. It was his duty to then close the switch, "lining it up" for the main line for the passage of the north-bound passenger train then due. He testified: That he closed the switch and locked it securely after the freight engine passed into the siding, and then went up to the station, lay down, and went to sleep; that, when the passenger train approached, the conductor sent him down to the freight engineer, who with his fireman had remained on his engine, with orders; and that as he was standing by the freight engine the passenger train came in and the engine crashed into the freight engine. Whether Maddox closed the switch, and it was afterwards opened by some unauthorized person before the arrival of the passenger train, or failed to close it, was the issue upon which the case turned. It was further charged, however, by plaintiff, that, if Maddox closed the switch, appellant, its agents and employes were guilty of negligence in failing to see that it was kept closed until after the passage of the passenger train. The headlight of the freight engine, as was customary in such cases, after it passed into the siding, was covered so that it gave no light in the direction of the passenger engine. When the engineer of the passenger train discovered that the switch was open, he did everything possible to prevent the disaster, but it was impossible to materially check the speed of the train in the short distance intervening. He could not have discovered the open switch in time to avoid the disaster. When the freight engine went in on the siding, it stopped at a distance of certainly not more than 75 feet (appellee testified about 30 feet) from the switch, and both the engineer and his fireman remained on the freight engine up to the moment of collision. The switch was unquestionably

...heard trying to throw it back, or "fooling with it," which was denied by him. It would have required considerable force and violence to break the lock, and it could not have been done without being heard by the engineer and fireman on the freight engine. The evidence fully authorized a finding that Maddox was mistaken about having closed the switch after the freight train went into the siding. The injuries received by appellee were permanent and serious. The court submitted to the jury the issues of negligence of appellant in leaving the switch open, and also in failing to use proper care to keep it closed, and the issue of assumed risk on the part of appellee.

By its first assignment of error, appellant assails the following charge given by the court: "Guided by these instructions, if you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the said switch being open, and said train being so deflected, was the result of the negligence of defendant's servants and employes in not properly closing the switch, or in not keeping the same closed; and further believe that plaintiff's injuries, if any, were the direct result of the negligence, if any, of defendant's servants and employes in regard to said switch, and that he did not assume the risks, then you will find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages as hereinbefore instructed." The first objection to this charge is that it assumes that appellant's servants and employes were guilty of negligence "in not properly closing the switch." We think this is not a fair criticism of the charge. Standing alone, the jury could not have so understood it. If there were any doubt, however, on this point, it is relieved by reference to paragraph 4 of the charge immediately preceding, whereby the jury was instructed that the burden of proof was upon appellee to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that he was injured as the direct result of the "negligence" of appellant, and to paragraph 6, immediately following the paragraph containing the charge objected to, that, if the jury believed that the switch being open was not the result of the negligence of appellant's servants or employes, to find for appellant. The jury was carefully told to construe all parts of the charge together. It must have been understood by the jury that negligence vel non in the matter of the open switch was a matter to be determined by them. One part of the charge may be looked to for the purpose of qualifying another. Baker v. Ashe, 80 Tex. 361, 16 S. W. 36; Railway v. Matulla, 79 Tex. 581, 15 S. W. 573.

There is no merit in the second objection to this charge, that it submitted to the jury the issue of negligence of appellant's

...closed, only that it was not closed. The evidence did not present any ground for a distinction between "closing" and "properly closing" the switch. If it was not "properly closed," it was not closed.

The third proposition under this assignment presents the same objection, with the added qualification that there was no evidence that the switch was not "properly closed." The proposition that it is error to charge upon an issue not presented by the pleadings, or upon which there is no evidence, is sound; but it has no application here. The substance of the issue, as stated by the charge, was presented by both the pleadings and evidence.

The fourth objection to the charge is that it assumes the negligence of defendant's employes in not keeping the switch closed; whereas, there was no evidence tending to show that there was any duty imposed on said employes to see that the switch was kept closed, after it was once closed and locked. Certainly this was not assumed by the charge, but the issue was submitted. We are not prepared to say that, in the circumstances of this case, the duty did not rest upon the employes of appellant to use ordinary care to see that the switch was kept closed until the passing of the passenger train, for the protection of the freight train as well as the passenger train. The freight engine was just inside of the switch not more than 75 feet away, according to Maddox's testimony, 30 feet according to that of appellee. The passenger train was due then and must have been expected to arrive every moment. The brakeman of the freight train was on the ground. He testified that, when he came down to give the engineer his orders, as he stood by the engine, if he had thought of it, by glancing at the switch target, in a few feet of him, he could have seen that the switch was open. An open switch in such circumstances was fraught with such frightful danger, of the destruction of life and property, that it is too much to say that, whatever may have been the duty of employes of the appellant as to safeguarding switches scattered along the line, they should have used some degree of care to see that this one remained closed until the passenger train passed, and, if the accident was due to want of ordinary care in this regard, appellant would be liable; but, if we are mistaken in this, the evidence is so preponderating that Maddox is simply mistaken about having closed the switch, and that it was not afterwards violently and forcibly thrown open, or in any way opened by any unauthorized person, that the conclusion cannot be escaped that the verdict of the jury was based upon this theory and could not have been influenced by the charge referred to. That the switch was open is practically admitted. At least it is established beyond question by the undisputed testimony. If Maddox closed it, then some miscreant, in a spirit of pure and wanton deviltry, in the short time elapsing from the closing of the switch by Maddox to the arrival of the passenger train, went to the switch, broke the lock, or in some way opened it, and threw the switch, and this in 100 yards of the station, and in from 30 to 75 feet from where the engineer and fireman of the freight train sat in the cab of the engine. The thing is improbable to the verge of incredibility. Such a thing might have been done in some lonely out of the way place, but at that time and that place, and all without attracting the attention of the engineer and fireman of the freight train, is so extremely improbable of occurrence that it is inconceivable that the jury so found, when all of the evidence points to the conclusion plainly and clearly, in spite of Maddox's testimony, that, while he may have intended to close the switch, and may have thought he did so, he is mistaken. He testifies in one place that his "recollection is that he lined up the switch for the main line." It might possibly have been unlocked by some one having a key and changed without noise; but even this, with the engineer and fireman so near, is barely possible. Clearly the lock was not broken. Some evidence was offered that it had disappeared and had never been found; but, on the other hand, the testimony showed that it would have been practically impossible to have broken the lock and thrown the switch without attracting the notice of the engineer and fireman on the freight engine. Maddox would naturally shrink from admitting even to himself that he had left the switch open, and doubtless has deceived himself into believing that he closed it. Taking all the evidence into consideration, we conclude that it is not conceivable that the jury should have been influenced by the charge referred to, in basing their verdict upon the theory presented. As said by this court in Railway Co. v. Groves, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 63, 97 S. W. 1084, 16 Tex. Ct. Rep. 897: "Again, however, the question is whether the jury were misled, for, in the absence of some feature of the charge apparently indicating a contrary opinion on the part of the trial judge, all the probabilities are that the jury found according to the undisputed proof. It is a common thing for appellate courts to look to the state of the proof in determining whether some slight error either of law or procedure is harmless. The fact that the evidence strongly preponderates in favor of the verdict is of weight in such an inquiry."

The fifth proposition under the first assignment presents substantially the same objection, and is, we think, equally without merit.

The objection presented in the sixth proposition is not sound.

The first assignment of error, the various propositions under which we have discussed, presents no ground for reversal, and is overruled.

The second assignment of error presents the objection to the paragraph of the charge upon the defenses urged by appellant that it shifted the burden of proof and placed it on defendant to show that the switch being open was not due to its negligence. We do not think, in view of the entire charge, which must be looked to, that the paragraph referred to could have been so understood by the jury. The charge is as follows: "On the other hand, if you believe the brakeman, Maddox, properly closed the switch, and that it was afterwards, and before the arrival of the passenger train, tampered with and opened by some unauthorized person, whether an employé of the company or not, if his duties were in no way connected with the throwing of said switch, and that it was so tampered with and opened at such time and in such manner that such action could not have been prevented by the use of ordinary care on the part of the agents and servants of defendant, or believe that such tampering with an opening could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been discovered by the agents and servants of defendant in time to have closed the switch before the passenger train arrived, or if you believe said switch being open at the time of the accident was not the result of negligence on the part of defendant's servants or employes, then, in either event named in this paragraph, you will find for defendant." The difference between believing that a thing did not occur, and not believing that it did occur, while it is a real distinction having reference to a state of mental equilibrium between the two states of mind of belief or unbelief, cannot be supposed to have been in the minds of the jury, or affected their proper determination of the issue of negligence, especially in view of another portion of the court's charge directly instructing them that the burden of proof was upon plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that appellee's injury was the direct result of the negligence of defendant. A further answer to this assignment is that the charge referred to, at all events, does not present affirmative error. The assignment is without merit.

The third assignment does not require discussion, and is overruled.

While the plaintiff was testifying, seeing that he stopped and apparently thought or studied before answering questions put to him, his counsel asked him why he did this, to which he replied that he did not know any reason, except that his mind was not as accurate as it was before he was hurt. The question and reply thereto were objected to by appellant on the ground that it was for the jury to determine from witness' appearance and manner his credibility and the weight of his testimony, and that this explanation was self-serving. The objection was overruled, and appellant excepted. The correctness of this ruling is assailed by the fourth assignment of error. If the answer conveyed the impression that appellee's mental processes had been affected by his injury, it was proper for him to so state. It was a legitimate subject of inquiry as affecting the question of damages. It was not properly objectionable that the information should have been elicited, as it was, in explanation of his hesitation in answering questions. The witness' reply was, in substance, that his mind and memory did not compare with what they were before his injury, which was the reason he did not reply more promptly to questions put to him. There was no error in the ruling complained of.

There was no error in the matter of the admission in evidence of the photographs of the bones of appellee's injured leg, taken with an X-ray instrument, in connection with the testimony of Dr. Boyd, as to the character and use of the instrument and the manner in which the photographs were taken. The burden of appellant's objection seems to be that, without cutting away the intervening flesh, skin, etc., it was impossible to tell whether these pictures correctly represented the condition of the injured bones. It would be strange if in the trial of cases in courts use could not be made of facts elicited by means of a process, the usefulness and absolute accuracy of which has been so completely demonstrated as have been photographic views of the bones of a living body by means of the X-ray. When properly taken, as these views were shown to have been, it is a matter of such common knowledge that they accurately represent what they purport to show that even courts may take cognizance of the fact. There was no error in the admission of the photographic views, and the testimony of the expert medical witnesses in connection therewith. It was shown that the instrument used was a correct instrument of the kind, and had been frequently used by the witness. The fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments of error, presenting appellant's objections to the introduction of the pictures and the testimony of physicians, based thereon, as to the condition of the injured bones, are overruled. 16 Cyc. 856; Luke v. Calhoun Co., 52 Ala. 115.

The eighth assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in making certain remarks while the witness Ed. Maddox was upon the stand testifying, which testimony and remarks of the court were as follows: The witness testified: 'In my experience and within my knowledge switches are thrown improperly, and nobody can explain how they get that way. Very often switches are meddled with by outsiders, and thrown without the action of the train crew. That is done very often.' Whereupon defendant's counsel asked him the following question: 'Do you know of any way that it could be avoided, that you could keep people from throwing switches that way?' To which plaintiff's counsel objected, as follows: 'There is no evidence here that people throw any switches, except the people who have charge of the road. That is the only evidence so far.' Whereupon the court remarked: 'That is hardly a question of expert knowledge.' Defendant's counsel then asked this witness if he frequently found them that way, and if he knew of any method, in view of his experience, by which railroad companies could avoid such conditions. To which the witness answered: 'No, sir; I do not.' Whereupon plaintiff's counsel said: 'I don't object to it. I don't think it is a proper question, but I shall not object to it.' Whereupon the court remarked: 'I don't think the question is proper.' To which remark of the court defendant's counsel excepted. Whereupon the court stated that he meant to say that the evidence was inadmissible. The remarks of the court were clearly upon the weight of the evidence, and were upon a vital issue raised by the defendant in its behalf, and tended to destroy said evidence, and seriously prejudiced the rights of the defendant in this case."

We think that there is a marked distinction on this point, between this case and Thomson v. Kelley, 97 S. W. 326, 16 Tex. Ct. Rep. 637, decided by this court. Evidence in the latter case was admitted as to certain calls in a survey denominated "passing calls," upon the issue as to the true location of the lines of the survey. The trial judge in admitting this evidence remarked, and repeated the statement in the presence and hearing of the jury that these calls were of little or no force in locating the corners. This court held that this was a direct comment upon the weight of the evidence, which was clearly admissible, and as objectionable as if the jury had been instructed by the court as to the weight to be given these "passing calls" in the determination of the issue presented. In its probable effect on the jury we think there is a great difference between such a statement from the court and the remark made in this case that the evidence was not proper, or was not admissible. Such statement bore only upon the admissibility of the evidence which was admitted without objection. It was not proper, however, for the court to make even this statement. When counsel stated that he made no objection to the testimony, the court was not called upon to make any statement whatever upon its propriety, or admissibility, and should not have done so. In view, however, of the state of the evidence upon the issue as to whether Maddox failed to close the switch, or the same was, after having been closed, tam-testimony was not admissible—upon which point, as it was admitted without objection, we are not called upon to express an opinion—that fact did not deprive it of such probative force as the jury may have seen fit to give it. Railway v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 382, 48 S. W. 568, cited by appellee to support the contention, in answer to the assignment, that testimony not legally admissible can have no probative force, does not so hold. This court held to the contrary in Gray v. Fussell, 106 S. W. 455. Our conclusion is, however, that the action of the court does not present reversible error.

The appellant requested three separate special instructions presenting the issue as to whether Maddox left the switch open, or it was, after having been closed by him, tampered with by some other person. These charges are substantially the same and were all refused, and the refusal is complained of in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh assignments of error. We are mindful of the rule announced in the Rogers (91 Tex. 58, 40 S. W. 956), McGlamory (89 Tex. 638, 35 S. W. 1058), and Washington (94 Tex. 510, 63 S. W. 534) Cases, the entire correctness of which is not questioned, and the effect of which we are not inclined in any way to minimize; but we are of the opinion that the rights of appellant, in the presentation of its defenses, were sufficiently guarded in the court's charge, which, we think, in this particular, fully complied with the rule announced in the cases cited. In substance and effect the charge of the court was identical with the requested charges. In such case it was not error to refuse the special charges requested, and the assignments referred to are overruled. The charge of the court in this particular has been heretofore copied. One of the refused charges—and they are all the same in substance—is as follows: "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the switch, which connected the main with the side track on which the collision occurred, was properly closed by the switchman Maddox before the arrival of the passenger train, and that afterwards, and before the arrival of said passenger train, it was tampered with and opened by some unauthorized person (whether an employé of the company or not, if his duties were in no way connected with the throwing of said switch), and that it was so tampered with and opened at such time and in such manner that such accident could not have been prevented by the defendant, its agents, or servants, by the use of ordinary care, or at such time that such tampering with and opening could not, by the use of ordinary care, have of the verdict as excessive to such an extent as to indicate that it was not the result of a fair consideration of the evidence, but of "prejudice or passion or some other improper motive." The jury allowed appellee $25,000. The evidence showed that both bones of the leg were broken between the knee and the ankle, that one of the broken bones has never properly united, and in consequence the foot is turned in, interfering with his walking, and that he will never have proper use of that leg, although in time he will acquire some substantial use of it. While he lay in the hospital, about a dozen small pieces of the bone of his leg were taken out. The broken bone protruded through the flesh and clothes and stuck in the ground when appellee fell out of the cab. According to his testimony, the flames from the burning oil reached him and set his clothing on fire, and his legs and feet and some parts of his body were severely burned. He endured very great physical suffering for several months from the burns and from the wounds on his broken leg, which required some time to heal. Appellee at the time of the trial was 27 years old. His earnings the month previous to the accident were about $125. The average for five years before had been $65 a month. Giving full faith to the evidence upon this issue, including appellee's testimony as to the amount of his physical suffering, we cannot agree that the verdict should stand. The amount is so unreasonably large, in view of all the evidence, as to indicate that it was not the result of a fair consideration of the evidence. Upon this ground the trial court should have granted appellant's motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. A remittitur of $7,500, reducing the amount to $17,500, will still allow appellee, in our judgment, liberal compensation for his injuries.

If appellee will file in this court within 20 days from March 18, 1909, a remittitur of $7,500, the judgment will be reformed and affirmed for $17,500; otherwise, for the reasons given, it will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

BRUNNER FIRE CO. v. PAYNE.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 30, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 649*) — RECORD — STATEMENT OF FACTS—MOTION TO CORRECT.

Where, on disagreement of counsel, the trial judge certified the statement of facts in the record as a correct statement made by him, it was error to refuse to consider appellant's motion, filed the last day allowed, to correct the same and require the court stenographer to present his notes of the testimony.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 649.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1074*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

Such error was harmless, where, considering the corrections as made, the evidence was such that there could have been no judgment other than that rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1074.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 938*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—QUALIFICATION OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

In the absence of a bill of exceptions signed by the judge or bystanders, it will be assumed on appeal that a qualification of a bill of exceptions presented by appellant was made with appellant's consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 938.*]

4. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 59*)—ALLOWANCE—QUALIFICATION.

Where appellant presents a bill of exceptions, the court has no right to qualify it, but, under the express provisions of Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, arts. 1367-1369, must either sign it, or, if not correct, indorse his refusal to do so, and then file what he considers a proper bill, leaving appellant to his remedy of a bill by bystanders, if not satisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 501*)—REVIEW—RECORD—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Rulings as to the admission of evidence will not be reviewed, where the record fails to show that the rulings were excepted to, or any bill of exceptions taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases; see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2300, 2303; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

6. DEDICATION (§ 51*)—USE OF STREET BY PUBLIC—EXTENT.

Where a street was laid out and dedicated as a public highway, the fact that the public confined its actual use for purposes of travel to a narrow portion, grading and working it for that purpose, did not affect its right to use the entire width, nor the effect or extent of dedication and acceptance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

7. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 92*)—PAYMENT OF TAXES—CLAIMANT NOT IN POSSESSION.

Payment of taxes by one who has never been in possession will not avail under the statute of limitations of five years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 515; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

An assignment of error not followed by a statement from the record will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3000; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—UNCONTROLLED EVIDENCE.

Where the undisputed evidence establishes a fact, it is not error for the court to so instruct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 452; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

10. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

An instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence that a certain person, one of the owners in plaintiff's chain of title, had 10 years' peaceable and adverse possession of the premises, using and claiming the same against all other persons, they should find for plaintiff "on this issue," is not objectionable as requiring, if there was a finding for plaintiff as to such adverse possession, a general finding for plaintiff on the entire case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

11. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence showed that a certain person, from whom plaintiff claimed title, bought a certain tract of land and built a residence thereon and resided on the same more than 10 years thereafter, and that the lots in question were a part of such tract, the issue of adverse possession was raised, justifying an instruction thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

12. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 671*)—OBSTRUCTIONS IN STREET—ACTION TO ABATE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence of 10 years' adverse possession of land by one in plaintiff's chain of title and of plaintiff's possession for more than 10 years is sufficient evidence of title to entitle plaintiff to maintain an action for the removal of a building in the street, obstructing the entrance to such premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 671.*]

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; W. P. Hamblen, Judge.

Action by T. B. Payne against the Brunner Fire Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. O. Van Velzer, for appellant. Tharp & Whitehead, for appellee.

REESE, J. T. B. Payne instituted this action against the Brunner Fire Company, a corporation, alleging in his petition: That he was the owner of lots 108 and 109 in Magnolia addition to the city of Houston, holding title from the sovereignty, and especially from one Isaac Brashear, who acquired title in 1852, and who had title under the statute of limitations of 5 and 10 years; that lot 108 fronts 148 feet on Patterson street, a public street, part of said Magnolia addition, which had been regularly laid off in lots and blocks and streets; that he bought in 1894; that plaintiff was about to erect his residence on said two lots for the purpose of making his home there, when defendants constructed a building 20 feet high and 40 feet long and extending along Patterson street, in the street, and within a few feet of said lot 108, thereby cutting off his entrance to said property on Patterson street and rendering it unfit for a home. Plaintiff prayed that said building be declared a nuisance and be ordered to be removed. Defendants made general denial and specially denied plaintiff's ownership of that the building was in Patterson street, or that it interfered with plaintiff's use and enjoyment of his property. Much other matter was set out in the answer which is not material to the case as presented on this appeal. Upon trial with a jury there was a verdict for plaintiff, upon which judgment was rendered declaring the building a nuisance and ordering its removal. From the judgment, its motion for a new trial having been overruled, defendant appeals.

It is proper that we should, in limine, dispose of the matters urged in the twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth assignments of error, which relate to the alleged refusal of the trial court to hear and consider appellant's motion to correct the statement of facts, and to correct the same, and the matters connected therewith. The corrections, which it is claimed should have been made, are set out in the twenty-sixth assignment. The statement of facts in the record is certified by the district judge as a correct statement made by him, upon disagreement of counsel. On the same day it was filed, which was the last day allowed, appellant's counsel filed with the court a motion to correct the same, and asked also that the court stenographer be required to present his notes of the testimony and be sworn as to the same. The court refused to consider the motion, or to allow the stenographer to be sworn in support thereof, and refused to sign appellant's bill of exceptions to such action. This action is shown by bills of exception in the record signed by bystanders, under the statute. No attempt is made by appellee in the brief filed by his counsel to explain or deny the matters set out in these assignments, or to rebut the statements in the bystanders' bills of exceptions. He objects to their consideration for violation of the rules in their preparation and presentation. The assignments are not strictly in compliance with the rules, but the matters presented involve so grave an abuse of judicial discretion that we are not disposed to pass them by without consideration, on this account.

Appellant's counsel was confronted with a novel condition, and may be pardoned from a strict compliance with the rules. We think the court committed grave error in refusing to consider the motion, and in failing to lend appellant's counsel all the assistance possible in determining whether there were any errors in the statement of facts, and, if there were, in correcting the same, so that it might indubitably present the facts as they were given in evidence. The record suggests that in some respects the statement of facts does not do this. It was at least incumbent upon appellee, not-true. In the interest of fairness and a proper administration of justice, we would reverse the judgment and remand the case for a new trial, but for the fact that, assuming that the statement of facts should be corrected as claimed by appellant, and considering such corrections as made, the evidence still would be such that no judgment could have been rendered other than the one that was rendered. Upon the undisputed evidence the court would have been authorized to instruct a verdict for appellee. In this state of the record, it would not be proper to remand the case for a new trial.

Appellant complains further, in the twenty-seventh assignment of error, of the refusal of the court to settle his eighth bill of exceptions in the form in which it was presented, and in qualifying the same. In the absence of something in the way of a bill of exceptions signed by the judge or bystanders, under the statute, we cannot say that the qualification of the bill by the court was not done with consent of appellant. Without such consent the judge had no right to qualify the bill, but should have either signed it, or, if not correct, should have indorsed his refusal to do so, and should then have made out and filed what he considered a proper bill, leaving appellant to his remedy of a bill by bystanders, under the statute, if he was not satisfied with such bill. The statute (Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, arts. 1367-1369) prescribes very clearly the duty of the judge, and the rights of litigants in such cases, and should be observed.

Taking up the other assignments of error in the order in which they are presented, the first, second, third, and fourth assignments are addressed to the action of the court in the admission of evidence of certain maps or plats. These assignments are all presented together in a group. Each of them present a different question. What propositions there are are presented as under the four assignments. The statements under the proposition are altogether insufficient to show that error was committed, and finally it is not suggested in either the assignments, the propositions, or any of the statements thereunder, or in the argument upon the propositions, that any bill of exceptions to any of the rulings complained of was taken. No reference is made to any bill of exceptions, without which the error, if any, would not be reversed. The assignments will not be considered.

The fifth and sixth assignments of error complain also of the admission of the testimony of certain witnesses. No bill of exceptions is referred to in the assignments, propositions, statement, or argument. The statement does not show or even refer to the evidence objected to. It is not suggested that the ruling of the court was excepted to, or any bill of exceptions taken. The assignments will not be considered.

The seventh and eighth assignments of error, presented together, are addressed to the refusal of the court to give two special charges requested by appellant. The general nature of these charges is only vaguely suggested by the assignments. The charges are not set out, either in substance or form, in either the assignments, propositions, statements, or arguments. It appears probable from the brief that they were upon the issue of dedication of Patterson street. If we are correct in this, the assignments, if considered, are without merit. The undisputed evidence shows that, when Colby laid out and platted Magnolia addition in 1888, he laid out a 50-foot street along one side of the addition, and named it "Patterson street." It was so laid out for a public street, and has been used by the public as a public highway or street ever since. The evidence of dedication by Colby and acceptance and use by the public is complete and is undisputed. A plat showing the division into lots, blocks, and streets was at once recorded. Appellant undertook to prove by certain witnesses that the actual use of the ground so laid out as a street, by the public for purposes of travel, has been confined to a comparatively narrow space, near the middle of this street, which has been graded and used, and that part of this ground, on which the firehouse is erected, has never been so used for travel, and "does not belong to anybody," and lies between appellee's lots and the street. This is the sum and substance of the evidence tending to rebut the evidence of dedication and use as a street of the ground next to appellee's lots. It does not raise an issue as to such dedication and use. If Colby laid out a 50-foot street and dedicated it as a public highway—and this is shown by the undisputed evidence—and the public confined its actual use for purposes of travel to a narrow portion of said 50 feet, grading and working it for that purpose, which is the extent of appellant's evidence, this would not affect the right of the public to use the entire 50 feet whenever it chose, nor the effect or extent of dedication and acceptance. The effect of appellant's contention is that, to preserve its rights to a highway, the public must use for purposes of travel every foot of it. This is not the law. Probably it was not necessary to grade, work, or build bridges across the entire width of the dedicated strip. It appears that when the town of Brunner was laid off, adjoining the Magnolia addition, a strip 25 feet wide alongside of Patterson street was left for a street, increasing the width of Patterson street to 75 feet. The evidence indicates that the graded and used roadway covers a part of the 50-foot strip and a part of the 25 feet added on the Brunner side. If appellant's contention that the portion not graded and used had never been accepted as a street be sound, the result would be that the ground on which the building is erected would belong to appellee as a part of his lot abutting thereon. There was no issue of complete dedication and acceptance by long use by the public of the entire 50-foot strip called Patterson street.

We are inclined to think that the evidence did not present the issue of title in appellee under the statute of limitations of five years, as set out in assignments of error 9 to 11. There was no evidence of payment of taxes by any one except appellee, who has never been in actual possession. The assignments will have to be sustained, but, for reasons hereafter shown, this does not require a reversal of the judgment.

The thirteenth assignment is not followed by any statement from the record, and will not be considered. It appears, however, to be entirely without merit.

The fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth assignments, presented together, complain of the refusal of special charges requested, and of the court's charge. They are not accompanied by any statement showing, either in form or substance, the charges referred to. We can only conjecture, in a general way, what they relate to. This is not sufficient to require a consideration of the assignments.

The court did not charge that plaintiff had shown a record title down to himself, but that he had shown such title from Isaac Brashear to himself. There was no error in this. Where the undisputed evidence establishes a fact, it is not in error for the court to so instruct the jury. The seventeenth assignment of error, presenting this objection to the charge of the court, is without merit.

The eighteenth assignment does not present reversible error. The court, on the issue of title, charged the jury that, if they believed, from the evidence, that Isaac Brashear, one of the owners in appellee's chain of title, had 10 years' peaceable and adverse possession of the premises, cultivating, using, and enjoying the same, and claiming the same against all other persons, they should find for plaintiff "on this issue"; that is, the issue of title. The other issues, as to location of the lots and the existence of the street contiguous thereto, were submitted in other portions of the charge. Appellant's objection to the charge that, under it, a finding in favor of appellee as to the 10 years' adverse possession by Brashear required a general finding for plaintiff on the whole case, is not tenable. Nor can the objection be sustained that the evidence did not raise the issue of such adverse possession. In fact the evidence on this point is not disputed, and shows: That same more than 10 years thereafter; and that the lots in question, which came by consecutive conveyance to appellee, were a part of this 50 acres out of said lot 23 of the Hollingsworth survey aforesaid. Upon the issue of title, as well as upon all other issues on the case, the court might very well have instructed a verdict for appellee. The eighteenth assignment is overruled.

The other assignments and the propositions thereunder are overruled without further discussion. They present no reversible error.

There was no evidence introduced by appellant to rebut the evidence of appellee, except such as tended to show that only a portion of the 50-foot strip dedicated as Patterson street has ever been graded or used as a highway by the public, and that this used portion did not extend to appellee's lots; but there was a vacant strip between upon which the firehouse was erected. Otherwise the evidence introduced by appellee was undisputed, and showed, on the issue of title: That Brashear bought, in 1852, 50 acres of land, on which he then settled, and upon which he continued to reside with his family for more than 10 years; that in the partition of his estate this land, or a part of it, was set apart to his daughter, Mrs. Jones, who sold it, in 1887, to the Ohio Wool-growing Company, who in turn, in 1888, sold and conveyed to F. W. Colby; that Colby had it divided and platted into lots and blocks and streets, as Magnolia addition, in 1888, laying off Patterson street as a public street, and having the plat duly recorded; that appellee's lots are a part of this Magnolia addition, and by a regular chain of mesne conveyances have come down to appellee, who bought in 1894. Upon this evidence, both by virtue of Brashear's 10 years' adverse possession, use, and enjoyment, and by virtue of his naked possession alone, appellant showing no right, appellee was entitled to maintain this action. Boyd v. Miller, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 165, 54 S. W. 412. He was not required, we think, to show such title as would have been required to entitle him to recover in an action of trespass to try title. Railway v. Wallace, 74 Tex. 581, 12 S. W. 227; Tel. Co. v. Wofford (Tex. Civ. App.) 42 S. W. 119; Pac. Ex. Co. v. Dunn, 81 Tex. 86, 16 S. W. 792; Linard v. Crossland, 10 Tex. 461, 60 Am. Dec. 213.

Upon the other issues the evidence is equally conclusive in showing the existence of Patterson street as a public highway, that appellee's lot abuts thereon, and that the firehouse interferes with appellee's action street. The evidence was of such a character as to authorize a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff, and in such case the errors committed by the trial court do not require a reversal of the judgment. So the assigned errors not considered would not, if considered and sustained, authorize a reversal.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

GAFFNEY et al. v. CLARK et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 29, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 66*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

It is presumed that a vendor knew the boundaries of the land which he sold.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 86; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 38*)—PROCEEDINGS—PLEADINGS—NOT GUILTY—EFFECT.

A plea of not guilty in trespass to try title, as to the part of land not disclaimed by defendant, put plaintiff on proof of his title, and, on his failure to show title, defendant would be entitled to judgment denying a recovery of the land not disclaimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 47*)—CROSS-ACTIONS.

Defendant in trespass to try title, after pleading not guilty by plaintiff, could seek affirmative relief by having disputed boundaries between them established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

4. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 47*)—CROSS-ACTIONS—PLEADING—EFFECT.

In trespass to try title, defendant pleaded not guilty as to the part of the land described in his answer, and further alleged that the boundary between his and plaintiff's land was in dispute, and in effect admitted that plaintiff owned the land east of the true boundary of a certain survey, but was estopped from claiming it. Held, that defendant's plea to establish the boundary was an affirmative defense, and, having failed to show that plaintiff was estopped to claim to the true boundary, defendant was bound by his admission that plaintiff owned the land up to that boundary, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff failed to prove title to the land in controversy, so that defendant was not entitled to have the boundary established as asserted by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

5. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 38*)—CROSS-ACTION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in trespass to try title, defendant pleaded not guilty and, in a cross-action, sought to have the boundary established between himself and plaintiff, the burden was on defendant to prove that the boundaries were as alleged by him, even though plaintiff failed to sustain the burden of showing title in the principal action.

On motion for rehearing. Motion overruled.

For former opinion, see 115 S. W. 330.

Moore, Park & Birmingham and Lennox & Lennox, for appellants. A. L. Beaty, for appellees.

LEVY, J. We have carefully considered the record and the questions presented in this case and on motion for rehearing, and feel constrained to adhere to our former ruling in the case.

It is insisted that we are in error in holding the evidence insufficient to support estoppel. We do not think so. It is argued that the case of Hefner and Lockhart v. Downing, 57 Tex. 576, is decisive of the principle involved in the instant case and rules the same. We think there is a clear distinction between that case and the instant one. Downing had run and marked a line as the boundary for a part of the way between the land owned by him and the land belonging to Hefner. Afterwards the latter had extended and completed the line and sold to it as the true line a part of the land to another party, who sold same to Lockhart. There was evidence tending to show that during a number of years Downing had recognized and treated the line so run and marked as the true boundary line, that he had cut timber in accordance with it, and stood by and without objection had permitted Hefner's vendees to occupy and improve it as their own. The question was as to whether the evidence made an issue as to an estoppel as against Downing to deny that the line so run, marked, recognized, and acquiesced in was the true boundary line. The court held that it was sufficient to raise such an issue. There the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that Downing intended his acts and conduct to influence the acts and conduct of Hefner, and sufficient to support a further finding that Hefner's acts and conduct with reference to the land were so influenced. Hefner, as against Downing, clearly was in a position to assert an estoppel. Having acquired his rights by their purchase of the land without notice of facts which might preclude them from doing so, Hefner's vendees as clearly were entitled to assert, as against Downing, the estoppel as against him in favor of Hefner. Independent therefore of acts and conduct of Downing, with reference to the land, which might be held to create a further estoppel in their favor as against him, they might have been entitled to protection against Downing's claim to the land. There is no evidence here that Charles Gaffney's acts and conduct were intended to influence, or that same did influence, the then owners of the Caudle survey to act with reference to it or in a way they otherwise would not have acted. Appellees therefore can claim nothing on account of their being the successors to the rights of the then owners of the Caudle survey, and must rest their claim of an estoppel on acts and conduct of Charles Gaffney intended to influence, and which did influence, them to buy the land. There is no pretense in the evidence that the acts and conduct of Charles Gaffney were intended in any way to induce appellees to buy the land. The acts and conduct acted upon occurred five years before they became, or pretended to have become, the purchasers. Another marked distinction between the two cases, as we understand them, lies in the fact that Hefner sold, and his vendee bought, the land to the boundary line as they claimed it to be. There is no evidence in this case showing, or tending to show, that appellees' vendors sold to the line as appellees claim it to be. The presumption would be that their vendors knew the boundaries of the land they sold to appellees; and in the absence of evidence showing that appellees in purchasing did not acquire from their vendors information as to the true line, and in the absence of evidence, if they did acquire such information, showing how in the face of such information they were misled by the acts and conduct of Charles Gaffney complained of, we think they are not in a position to claim an estoppel.

It is insisted that the appellants did not prove title and the case should be affirmed. Appellees disclaim title to all of the Martin survey except the portion thereof described in their answer, as to which they defended by a plea of not guilty. The effect of this plea was to put appellants on proof of their title. They proved no title. Appellees therefore were entitled to a judgment denying to appellants a recovery as against them of the portion of the Martin survey not disclaimed. Such a judgment would have left as an open question the location of the west boundary line of the Martin survey. Anticipating such a result of the litigation, and wishing the line to be established, appellees did not rest upon their plea of not guilty and its consequences, but by further pleading, as they had the legal right to do, invoked the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of securing a decree establishing the line. By such pleading they asserted that appellants owned land adjoining theirs on the east, and that there was a dispute between them as to the location of the boundary line between them. They asserted that the boundary line was at the point designated in their pleading, or, if it was not, that appellants were estopped to deny that it was at that point. A trial of the issues resulted in a finding of the jury that the true line was west of the point where appellees claimed it to be, but that appellants were estopped to deny that it was any farther west than they (appellees) claimed it to be. This court held, and adheres to the ruling, that appellants were not so estopped, and therefore that the judgment, in so far as it must be rested on that finding, was erroneous. It would seem to follow logically that the judgment in so far as it established the boundary line between the parties was erroneous, for the jury found the true line to be farther west, and the judgment establishing it at the point designated therein necessarily was rested entirely on the supposed estoppel. Could it be contended that such is not the result because the effect of appellees' plea of not guilty was to put appellants on proof of their title to the land in dispute, and that, having failed to prove such title, it is no concern of theirs that the judgment established the line at a place not authorized by the evidence, and that this court is without authority to revise the judgment in that particular? We are not willing to agree that such was the effect of the plea of not guilty. Appellees' pleading seeking an establishment of the line, except in so far as it attempted to set up an estoppel, was not in any sense a defensive pleading; instead, it was for affirmative relief. In it they expressly averred ownership in appellants in the land in the Martin survey adjoining their land on the east. In trying that issue there was no occasion for appellants to prove title to the land east of the true west boundary line of the Martin. Admittedly they owned that land. The contention, in effect, was: Appellants owned the land east of the true west boundary line of the survey, but are estopped from claiming it, and therefore appellees should recover it.

Now that it has been determined that appellants are not estopped, can the appellees contend that the land should be decreed to be in them because appellants, relying upon the admission in the pleading, failed to prove that they owned the land? We cannot agree that the law supports such contention. Had appellees not by their cross-action presented and had tried an issue strictly as to the boundary, unquestionably on appellants' failure to prove title the judgment should have been against them. If appellees had then by another suit sought to have the line established, after such a suit the burden of establishing title would not have been on appellants, and unquestionably, with like proof in the record with the finding of the jury, the line would have been established at a point west of the point it was established by the judgment here complained of; and title to the land in dispute thereby in effect would have been determined to be in appellants, instead of appellees. Can it be held that merely because the two issues were tried in one instead of two suits, the law, measuring the property rights of the parties, is different? Does the defendant, in a trespass to try title suit, who seeks by a cross-action to establish the boundary line between his own and the plaintiff's land, occupy a position different from that occupied by him as the plaintiff in the suit to establish such line? As defendant seeking affirmative relief of the court, should he be held unaffected by an admission of title, which, if made by him as a plaintiff seeking the same relief, would bind him? We think not. In either case, as to the affirmative relief sought by him, the suit is his. As to such affirmative relief in either case, he has the same rights and is charged with the same burdens. In either case, asserting the boundary line to be at a given point and asking a decree to establish it accordingly, he must prove it to be at that point. Failing in such proof, he is not entitled to such a decree. We are unable to see how, when he happens to be a defendant asking such relief, he should be held entitled to it notwithstanding he fails to make such proof, because the plaintiff failed on another issue in the case to discharge the burden on him. We do not mean to be understood as saying that a defendant in a trespass to try title suit pleading not guilty does by pleading other defenses relieve the plaintiff of the necessity of proving title; but when such defendant, in a cross-action, seeks affirmative relief, and with reference to such issue admits title to be in plaintiff, then we think he is as much bound by such admission as he would be if a plaintiff presenting such issue for adjudication.

The motion for rehearing was ordered overruled.

BLAIR v. GUARANTY SAVINGS, LOAN & INVESTMENT CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 16, 1909.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 445*)—FORECLOSURE BY ACTION—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where vendees of land mortgaged the same to secure a loan applied for the purpose of taking up or extending vendor's lien notes and a mechanic's lien, with the understanding that the notes and lien were to be assigned to the mortgagee as additional security, and the money was so used, and the notes and lien were, together with the vendor's superior title, assigned to the mortgagee, that the petition to foreclose the mortgage failed to set up such facts was immaterial; there being no defense that the property was a homestead.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Norman G. Kittrell, Judge.

Action by the Guaranty Savings, Loan & Investment Company against J. M. Blair. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Reformed and affirmed.

Blair & Kirkpatrick, for appellant. Hutcheson, Campbell & Hutcheson, for appellee.

REEDSE, J. The Guaranty Savings, Loan & Investment Company instituted this action in the district court against J. M. Blair in trespass to try title for a certain lot in the city of Houston. Plaintiff also set up the purchase by Blair of said lot under a judgment for city taxes and sought to redeem. Plaintiff afterwards abandoned its action of trespass to try title, and the suit became one solely to redeem from the tax sale. Upon trial plaintiff had judgment sustaining its right to redeem upon payment of the amount of taxes, costs, and penalties sued for in the tax suit, with interest thereon, together with costs of that suit. From the judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The facts are as follows: J. L. Britton sold and conveyed the property to William and Mary Bartley January 25, 1896, reserving the vendor's lien to secure eight notes for $50 each, given for the purchase money. The Bartleys, being desirous of securing an extension of these notes, procured from the appellee a loan of $600. The Bartleys on February 1, 1899, executed to appellee a deed of trust on the property to secure the $600. The money thus procured was applied, in accordance with the agreement and understanding of the parties, to take up the vendor's lien notes aforesaid and also a mechanic's lien given by the Bartleys, husband and wife, executed as required by the statute, for improvements on the property, for $150, and the vendor's lien notes and mechanic's lien were assigned and transferred to appellee, as was also the superior title of Britton, as vendor. The assignments of the notes and superior title were dated March 1, 1899, and of the mechanic's lien March 7, 1899, and were both duly recorded in March, 1899. The deed of trust recites that the money was for the purpose of extending the vendor's and mechanic's liens, that the liens are not waived, but appellee is expressly subrogated to the rights of the holders thereof as additional security. At the date of the deed of trust, the property was occupied by the Bartleys as a home, and they continued to so occupy and use the same until some time thereafter, but abandoned the same prior to the institution of the suit to foreclose the said deed of trust, as hereafter set out. On July 16, 1906, appellee instituted suit against the Bartleys, husband and wife, on the note for $600 and to foreclose the mortgage or deed of trust lien. This suit was numbered 40,518 in the district court of the Sixty-First district of Harris county. Service was had January 22, 1907, and thereafter judgment was rendered against the defendants for debt and foreclosure. Order of sale was issued, under which sale was made, and deed executed to appellee. In cause No. 89,043 in the district court of the Eleventh district of Harris county, on October 15, 1906, the city of Houston recovered judgment against William and Mary Bartley for $62.15 taxes, costs, and penalties due the city on the property in question, and foreclosing the tax lien on the property. Order of sale issued on this judgment, under which appellant became the purchaser of the property, and the property was conveyed to him. The date of the institution of this suit is not shown. The proceedings in both of the cases aforesaid were in all things regular. Appellant paid at the sale to him $85.43, being the amount of the tax judgment and also costs of that suit, and costs of sale. The date of appellant's purchase is not shown, but it seems to be assumed that it was prior to the date of service on the defendants Bartleys in cause No. 40,518. The date of appellee's purchase is not shown, but it appears that it was subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in the tax suit. Appellee was not made a party to the tax suit, nor was appellant made a party to the suit of appellee against the Bartleys. Appellant has had possession of the property since February 1, 1907, and the rental value is agreed to be $6 per month. The cause was tried February 6, 1908.

By the first two assignments of error, appellant questions the right of appellee to redeem at all, on the ground that the property was, at the time of the execution of its deed of trust, the homestead of the Bartleys, and the deed of trust therefore void. Incidentally to this the statement is made that, in the petition to foreclose the deed of trust, no reference is made to the vendor's lien and superior title transferred to appellee, nor of the mechanic's lien. It is indisputably clear from the evidence that the $600 loan was applied for by the Bartleys for the purpose of taking up or extending the vendor's lien notes and the mechanic's lien, with the understanding that these were to be assigned to appellee, as additional security, and that the money was so used and the notes and mechanic's lien assigned to appellee, together with Britton's superior title. Appellee thus became subrogated to all the rights arising from these liens, and became also vested with Britton's superior title as vendor. It does not matter that appellee did not set up these facts in the suit to foreclose the deed of trust. It was not necessary to do so except to meet a defense that the property was the homestead, on the part of the Bartleys. We gather that no defense was made to this suit; the property having been abandoned. Independently of all of this, however, having submitted to a judgment foreclosing the lien, it would be too late now for the Bartleys to set up the claim that the deed of trust was void, on account of the homestead character of the property. Certainly appellant cannot be heard to so impeach the judgment. The judgment establishes conclusively both the debt and lien. Barrett v. Eastham, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 189, 67 S. W. 199. This disposes of the contentions of appellant as set out in the first and second assignments of error, which are overruled.

This leaves only the question of the amount required to be paid by appellee to redeem the property from the tax sale. It is admitted by appellee that the tax lien was superior to its lien and title, and its right to redeem is resisted by appellant only on the ground that the property was the homestead of the Bartleys, and therefore appellee's deed of trust was void, which contention, as we have said, cannot be sustained. Both parties refer, in their brief, to the provisions of section 11, article 3, of the Charter of the City of Houston (Sp. Acts 29th Leg. 1905, p. 149, c. 17), upon the question of the right to redeem and the terms upon which redemption may be had. This section of the charter, we think, applies solely to summary sales of property delinquent for taxes by the tax collector, and the redemption thereof, and has no application to the present case, which is a sale under a judgment of foreclosure of the tax lien, the procedure in which is prescribed by section 8, article 3, of the Charter. Appellee held his title and right subject to the superior lien of the city for taxes. He had the right to pay such taxes and redeem the property from such superior lien. This right was not foreclosed by the judgment under which appellant bought; appellee not having been a party to that suit. Section 8, art. 3, of the Charter, provides that: "The proper persons shall be made parties defendant in such suits, shall be served with process, and other proceedings had therein, as provided by law for suits of like character in the district courts of this state, and in case of foreclosure an order of sale shall issue and the land be sold thereunder, as in other cases of foreclosure, which order of sale shall have all the force and effect of a writ of possession between the parties to the suit and any person claiming under the defendant by any right acquired after the filing of the suit." It is further provided that the deed made under such sale "shall be held in all courts of law or equity in the state to vest a good and perfect title in the purchaser thereof." By this is meant, we think, a good and perfect title as against the parties to the suit. 2 Cooley, Taxation, 886; Blackwell, Tax Titles, 548; Yenda v. Wheeler, 9 Tex. 408; Id., 11 Tex. 562; Dyer v. Bank of Mobile, 14 Ala. 622; Stafford v. Flizer, 82 Mo. 393; Evans v. Robberson, 92 Mo. 192, 4 S. W. 941, 1 Am. St. Rep. 701; Nashville v. Cowan, 78 Tenn. 209.

The question, however, is not free from doubt under the authorities. See Ferguson v. Quinn, 97 Tenn. 46, 36 S. W. 576, 83 L. R. A. 689, and authorities cited in note. We think therefore that appellee was not bound nor its rights foreclosed by the sale to appellant. Not having been made a party to that suit, appellee, holding under the junior incumbrance, has the same right to redeem from the tax lien, which is the superior incumbrance, as it had before the sale. The sale and sheriff's deed, so far as concerns appellee's rights, only subrogated appellant to the lien of the city of Houston for the taxes, tax penalties, and tax costs, which appellant has paid. It cannot be said that appellee should be required to pay double the amount paid by the purchaser at the tax sale. The provision of the charter requiring the owner to do this only (and specially) applies to summary sales by the tax collector. Sections 8 and 11, art. 3, Charter City of Houston (Sp. Laws 29th Leg.); San Antonio v. Berry, 92 Tex. 319, 48 S. W. 496. What appellee should be required to pay, then, in order to redeem, is the amount of the claim of the city for taxes, penalties, and costs, not including the costs of the tax suit or the costs of the sale. This amount is $62.15, and appellant is entitled to interest at 6 per cent. upon this amount from the date of the sale to him, October 15, 1906, to October 15, 1907, when appellee made the tender and offered to redeem. 2 Jones, Mortgages, § 1075. To the extent that the judgment of the trial court required appellee to pay the costs of the tax suit and sale, it was erroneous, and the first cross-assignment of error of appellee is sustained.

By its second cross-assignment of error, appellee contends that appellant should be required to pay rents while in possession, or, at least, that the rents should be applied to the payment of the amount of taxes, etc., paid by appellant. To this we do not agree. Appellant's deed gave him the title and right of immediate possession as against Bartley, who was foreclosed. The case of Bente v. Sullivan (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 353, does not apply. The provisions of the charter of the city of Houston under which the sale was made especially provides that the sheriff shall put the purchaser in possession under the authority of the order of sale in 20 days. As the case stands we do not think appellant should be required to account to appellee for rents. 2 Jones, Mortgages, §§ 8, 11; Renard v. Brown, 7 Neb. 449.

None of the assignments of error of appellant, or propositions thereunder, present any ground for reversal of the judgment.

Upon the first cross-assignment the judgment will be reformed so as to require appellee to pay to appellant $62.15, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from October 15, 1906, to October 15, 1907, and as thus reformed the judgment is affirmed.

Reformed and affirmed.

ARTHUR v. PORTER.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 14, 1909.)

BROKERS (§ 44*) — COMMISSIONS — WHEN EARNED.

An owner employing a broker to effect an exchange of lands, without limiting the time of performance, may withdraw his proposition to exchange, before its acceptance, and thereby defeat the right of the broker to commissions, where the withdrawal is made in good faith, and based on the owner ascertaining that the property to be received in exchange was not worth as much as the broker had represented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

On motion to reconsider motion for rehearing or to certify questions to Supreme Court. Motion for rehearing granted, and the judgment of the trial court reversed, and cause remanded.

For former opinion, see 116 S. W. 127.

RICE, J. At a former day of this term, this case was affirmed and motion for rehearing overruled, since which time appellant has filed another motion asking us to reconsider the said motion for rehearing and to grant the same, and, if for any reason we cannot do this, then to certify the questions involved to the Supreme Court for their opinion thereon, because he insists that there is a direct conflict between the decision in this case and that of the Court of Civil Appeals of the Fourth District in the case of Evans v. Gay, 74 S. W. 575, wherein the trial court refused a similar charge to the one under consideration, and its refusal was held error.

It appears from the evidence that appellee, who was a real estate broker, was employed by appellant to effect an exchange of property owned by him for a certain house and lot owned by one Cox; but the contract was silent as to the time of performance. It was shown that appellee was acting for both appellant and Cox, and was to receive a commission from each of them in the event the exchange was consummated, and that this fact was known to appellant. Appellant went in company with appellee to inspect the Cox property, and was told by appellee that the buildings thereon cost about $3,000, and that the lot was very valuable. That upon their return therefrom appellant was induced by appellee to allow him to make a proposition for exchange of said property to Cox, just to start the trade; appellee saying that appellant would have ample time pending negotiations within which to ascertain the value of Cox's property. And with this understanding appellant consented for appellee to make the proposition to Cox for exchange of their said properties, which was done. It appears that negotiations for the trade were pending some time, and before Cox finally accepted appellant's proposition, but while considering the matter, he ascertained the value of Cox's property to be several hundred dollars less than appellee had represented it to him. Whereupon he came to the conclusion that he could not afford to make the trade, and went at once to Cox's store to tell him about it, but was unable to find him. That within a day or two thereafter he saw appellee, and told him that Cox's property was not worth what he had represented it to be, and that he could not afford to make the trade.

There was other evidence corroborative of appellant's statement that he had told appellee that he would not carry out the trade, and appellee, upon cross-examination, admitted that appellant had made such a statement to him, but that he had not informed Cox of it, because appellant had not requested him so to do. The general charge of the court failed to submit the issue raised by this evidence, and appellant asked a special charge, which told the jury that he had a right to withdraw his proposition at any time before Cox had accepted it, and notice to Porter would be notice to Cox of that fact, and if the jury believed that appellant had notified Porter that he would not make the trade before Cox accepted it, if Cox did accept it, then they should find a verdict for defendant. After a full consideration of the question raised, we think that we were in error in holding that this charge was properly refused, and now believe that the same ought to have been given. There was no time fixed for the consummation of this contract, so that if appellant, before his proposition was accepted by Cox, saw fit to change his mind and withdraw his proposition, and the same was done in good faith, he had a right to do so, and the evidence fails to disclose anything to indicate that the withdrawal of his proposition was influenced by bad faith on his part; but, on the contrary, it appears that it was induced by reason of the fact that he had ascertained that the Cox property was not worth as much as appellee had represented it.

In Evans v. Gay, supra, it is said: "There are two substantial reasons, however, why the judgment should be reversed. In the first place, if the contract did not fix a certain time in which plaintiff could sell, there was no obstacle to defendant's right to withdraw the property from sale by notifying the plaintiff. Such an act, however, might be done at a time and under circumstances of unfairness to the broker, which would entitle the latter to redress; but this case is not brought upon any such theory. Where the arrangement is that if the broker procure a purchaser for land, and the contract is silent as to the duration of the contract, the owner has the right to withdraw the land from sale at any time before a purchaser is found"—citing Mechem on Agency, § 968. And the court held that a special charge embodying this phase of the law was improperly refused.

In Mechem on Agency, § 968, it is said: "Where no time is agreed upon, the broker is entitled to a reasonable time in which to find a purchaser, after which, if he be unsuccessful, the principal may revoke the broker's authority, without liability at any time, subject only to this exception: That it be not done for the purpose of avoiding the payment of commissions while availing himself of the broker's efforts by taking into his own hands the completion of negotiations then pending. Upon this subject the language of Judge Finch of the New York Court of Appeals is worthy of reproduction: 'Where no time for the continuance of the contract is fixed by its terms, either party is at liberty to terminate it at will, subject only to the ordinary requirements of good faith. Usually the broker is entitled to a fair and reasonable opportunity to perform his obligation, subject, of course, to the right of the seller to sell independently; but, that having been granted him, the right of the principal to terminate his authority is absolute and unrestricted, except only that he may not do it in bad faith and as a mere device to escape the payment of the broker's commissions. Thus, if in the midst of negotiations instituted by the broker, and which were plainly and evidently approaching success, the seller should revoke the authority of the broker, with the view of concluding the bargain without his aid, and avoiding the payment of commissions about to be earned, it might well be said that the due performance of his obligation by the broker was purposely prevented by the principal. But if the latter acts in good faith, not seeking to escape the payment of commissions, but moved fairly by a view of his own interest, he has the absolute right, before a bargain is made, while negotiations remain unsuccessful, before commissions are earned, to revoke the broker's authority, and the latter cannot thereafter claim compensation for a sale made by the principal, even though it be to a customer with whom the broker unsuccessfully negotiated, and even though to some extent the seller might justly be said to have availed himself of the fruits of the broker's labor.'" See, also, Peach River Lumber Co. v. Montgomery (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 87.

Believing the evidence was sufficient upon this issue to justify the giving of said special charge, we hold that it was error to refuse the same, and now here grant appellant's motion for rehearing, and, for the error aforesaid, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 140*)—HEARING—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—BIAS OF JUROR.

Evidence on motion for new trial on the ground of prejudice by a juror held to show that the juror had formed and expressed a decided opinion as to the merits, and was prejudiced so that defendant had not had a trial before a fair and impartial jury.

2. JURY (§ 126*)—CHALLENGES—GROUNDS OF CHALLENGE.

Under Rev. St. 1895, art. 3208, defining a challenge for cause as an objection to a particular juror which disqualifies him to serve in the case or in the trial court's opinion renders him an unfit juror, and section 3209, relating to the examination on challenge for cause, a challenge for cause is proper on any ground which unfits one to act as a juror.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 555; Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

3. JURY (§ 97*)—COMPETENCY OF JURORS—BIAS.

Bias or prejudices by a juror in favor of or preconceived ideas of the rights of one of the parties are incompatible with a fair trial by an impartial jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 431-437; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 42*)—GROUNDS—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUROR—BIAS AND EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

Where a juror expressly stated on his voir dire that he had no prejudice or bias and had formed or expressed no opinion as to the merits, but the evidence on motion for new trial showed that he had stated about a week before trial that plaintiff ought to recover the full amount of his demand against defendant railroad, which fact defendant's attorneys did not learn until after trial, and also stated to the other jurors that he heard that defendant offered plaintiff a considerable sum to compromise, which was untrue, it was reversible error to deny a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 76, 79; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

5. DAMAGES (§ 48*)—SUBJECTS OF COMPENSATION—MENTAL ANGUISH.

While mental anguish resulting from negligent injuries is a subject of compensation, such anguish must be the natural result of the injury, and is not the subject of recovery where it is not connected with the bodily injury and is caused by the contemplation of the physical condition of the injured party, or of any extraneous suffering or inconvenience that might result therefrom, whether to the injured person or relatives.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

6. DAMAGES (§ 54*)—ITEMS OF COMPENSATION—MENTAL ANGUISH—HUMILIATION.

Mental anguish which an injured person would suffer upon meeting others because of his deformed condition, or because his injuries had made him an object of pity, sympathy, or curiosity to the public, is too remote to be the subject of compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 119*)—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—MATTERS NOT WITHIN ISSUES—SUBJECTS OF COMPENSATION.

Since a servant in an injury action was not entitled to recover for mental anguish of that nature, it was error for his counsel in argument to state that plaintiff would suffer mental anguish because of his injury whenever he met a stranger or went to a public gathering or place, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 284; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 204*)—INJURIES—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Act April 24, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 386, c. 163), providing that the plea of assumed risk, where the ground of the plea is knowledge of the defect and danger, shall not be available to a railroad where the employé notified the employer of the defect, etc., is not limited to cases of defective machinery, but applies to a brakeman's action for injuries by stepping into a hole in the track while coupling cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—CARE REQUIRED.

In a brakeman's action for injuries caused by stepping into a hole in the track while coupling cars, the use of the word "approaches," in an instruction that it was the company's duty to exercise ordinary care to keep its approaches to the track in a safe condition, meant those places where employes must approach the track to work, and not such an approach as a crossing, and the jury must have understood it in the former sense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 465, 466.]

10. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

A requested charge was properly refused which stated that certain facts would be contributory negligence, when the question was for the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Bell County; Jno. M. Furman, Judge.

Action by W. W. Dickens against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Terry, Cavin & Mills and A. H. Culwell, for appellant. A. L. Curtis and Winbaurn Pearce, for appellee.

FISHER, C. J. This is a suit by appellee for the recovery of damages on account of personal injuries received while engaged in the service of appellant as a switchman at Temple, Tex. It is alleged that, while he was engaged in the service of switching cars, he was caused to fall under the train, by reason of which he received serious and permanent injuries. The negligence charged is that, while he was in the performance of his duty in coupling a car, his foot slipped into a hole which was negligently permitted to be and remain near the railway track, and that the railway company failed to furnish him a safe place at which to work. Appellant answered by general and special exceptions, general denial, pleas of contributory negligence, and assumed risk. Verdict and judgment below were in appellee's favor against the railway company for the sum of $37,500.

Appellant's twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth assignments of error are to the effect that the trial court erred in refusing to grant appellant's motion for a new trial on account of the fact that one B. T. Wynn, who was a juror at the trial and participated in finding and returning the verdict against the appellant, was not a fair and impartial juror, in that he entertained a bias in favor of the plaintiff, and that he had, prior to the trial, expressed an opinion about the merits of the case, wherein he had substantially stated to one W. P. Cox and J. L. Durden that Dickens ought to recover the amount he had sued for, to wit, $50,000 or $60,000; that the juror on his voir dire was especially interrogated as to the fact whether he entertained any prejudice or bias for or against either of the parties to the suit, and whether he had entertained or had expressed an opinion as to the merits, all of which he answered in the negative; that neither the appellant nor any of its attorneys had any notice or knowledge of the fact that the juror was not a fair and impartial juror, and that he had had the conversation with Cox and Durden as stated until after the trial; that, if they had known at the time of his examination touching his service and qualification as a juror that he had so expressed himself in favor of the plaintiff, he would have been challenged for cause, and, if such challenge had not been sustained, they would have peremptorily challenged him. Therefore the appellant contends that the juror Wynn was not competent and qualified, and that he was biased in favor of the plaintiff and prejudiced against the defendant, and that he went into the jury box with his mind made up that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the evidence introduced upon the disposition of this question is substantially as follows: Wynn, the juror, testified: That he did not know anything about the merits of the case before he was taken on the jury. That he had heard that Dickens was run over and got cut up, and so stated in his examination before he was accepted, and he stated in his examination he did not have any opinion about the case, neither did he have any bias in favor of or prejudice against the railway company, nor had he any such bias or prejudice at that time. He knew Dickens when he saw him. That he had no opinion when he was taken as a juror. That he was not on the regular jury, but was picked up on the morning the case went to trial by the deputy sheriff. That he lived in Temple. That he knew Mr. W. P. Cox. That he had never had any conversation with Mr. Cox, but had had with the other man. This other man referred to was John L. Durden. That it was not a fact that on or about Sunday, January 26th, about a week before the case was tried, that he had a conversation with one or both of these parties, and he goes on and expressly denies that he had a conversation with either Cox or Durden near the Harvey House in the town of Temple about a week before the trial. Cox testified that he lived in Temple, and knew the juror Wynn, and stated that Wynn, in a conversation with him and Durden, asked the question how much Dickens was suing for, and he replied about $50,000 or $60,000. Wynn said that he thought he ought to have it. The case was discussed, and Wynn asked the question how it happened. Wynn expressed sympathy for Dickens. Durden undertook to tell him all he knew about it, and detailed how the accident occurred. This was the conversation that occurred near the Harvey House about a week before the trial. The evidence of Durden is substantially to the same effect as that of Cox. All of these parties, it seems, lived in Temple, where the accident happened, and where the plaintiff resided. It also appears that the juror Wynn on his voir dire was especially interrogated with reference to his bias and prejudice and his opinion as to the merits of the case.

The evidence further shows that the conversation referred to was not known to the appellant or its attorneys at the time of the formation of the jury, and was not discovered until after the trial. The bill of exceptions further states that the preponderance of the evidence showed that this conversation had taken place, and that that was the view of the court, and that it was the conclusion of the court that neither the defendant company nor any of its officers or attorneys in charge of the case knew of the conversation until after the conclusion of the trial; that the court, however, was further of the opinion that the conversation and statements there made by Wynn were not of such a character as disqualified him from jury service in this case; that the court was of the opinion that the defendant had not shown that the juror was biased in favor of the plaintiff or prejudiced against the defendant at the time he qualified, and that he had such an opinion relative to the merits of the case as would disqualify him from performing the service of a juror at the time of the trial of the case; that the fact that he had expressed the opinion to Cox and Durden one week before the trial did not show that he was disqualified from jury service herein or entertained the same views relative to this case at the time of trial hereof as he expressed to Cox and Durden. The views of the court upon this subject are possibly more tersely stated in this explanation which he appends to the bill: "I cannot say that the language imputed to the court is the exact language used by it from the bench, but it in effect is the meaning of what was intended. I concluded that, giving all parties credit for intending to be truthful, I would rather believe that the conversation of Wynn with Cox and Durden was so unimportant that it had escaped his memory than to believe that the evidence of any witness was false; and, as Wynn on his voir dire and as a witness in this hearing has testified he had no opinion as to the merits, I could not hold such conversation with Cox and Durden would overcome his sworn testimony and his sworn answers on his voir dire. Hence I find he was a competent juror." This statement of the court is to the effect that the conversation between Cox and Durden and Wynn, did occur as testified to by the former, although denied by the latter, but he undertakes to avoid its effect as showing the expression of the opinion of the juror as to the amount plaintiff was entitled to by the statement that the question was unimportant, and had probably escaped the recollection of the juror, and that his statement on his voir dire disclaiming any opinion should be given controlling effect in overcoming any statement he had previously made indicating he was not fair and impartial.

However difficult the task may be to produce satisfactory evidence of the unfairness of a juror, and however reluctant the courts may be to disturb verdicts on such alleged grounds, we have no hesitancy in this instance in reaching the conclusion that the proof is ample so far as concerns this juror to establish the fact that the appellant has not had a trial before a fair and impartial jury, a right accorded all litigants, even though one be a railroad corporation. The record discloses on other branches of the motion for new trial, the circulation among the jurors in their retirement of a statement by this juror to the effect that he had heard it stated that the railway company had offered the appellee a considerable sum in settlement, which fact the bill of exception shows was not true, nor was there any evidence upon that subject. This is merely referred to as having some bearing on the question we are now considering; that is, whether the juror was impartial, and as a fact having some weight to be considered on this branch of the motion in determining his partisanship. The trial court, while finding that the conversation was as testified to by Cox and Durden, concluded that it was so unimportant that he had rather believe that it had escaped his (Wynn's) memory than to believe that his evidence on his voir dire was false, wherein he stated that he had no opinion as to the merits. This is throwing over the juror a mantle of charity that he has no desire to wear, for he did not claim that he had forgotten anything, nor that anything that was said was unimportant, but he denied in toto the conversation, and says that no such conversation occurred, although the court had deliberately, after hearing all the evidence and giving him an opportunity to testify which he availed himself of, found that such conversation did occur. There is nothing to indicate that he has a poor recollection of events, and in his examination upon this subject, and in testifying as to other questions about his conduct when on the jury, he seems to have a distinct recollection of what transpired. And, if he may not have recollected on his voir dire the conversation, the testimony of the other parties to it when examined on the motion for new trial, together with the pointed inquiry made of him concerning it, would have revived and refreshed his recollection; if not as to all that was said, certainly as to the fact that there was a conversation which he denies. But is it likely that he had forgotten the conversation when on his voir dire he was asked the direct question whether he had expressed an opinion about the case? According to the witnesses who testified as to this conversation and who were believed by the court, Wynn's expressions were very emphatic in favor of the plaintiff to the effect that he ought to recover a large sum. He doubtless understood the responsibilities and duties of a juror, and admits on his voir dire that he was asked the question as to his opinion about the merits. We test his recollection or knowledge of the occurrence by the evidence that he was present and participated in the transaction, and, when that is found to be the fact, it is not likely that a matter of importance will be forgotten in so recent a time. That it was important he must have known; for, if he had admitted his statement as testified to, he would have been objected to as a juror, and he doubtless understood when on his voir dire that this was the purpose of his so being interrogated as to his opinion.

While the statute does not, in express terms, allow a juror to be challenged on account of having expressed an opinion or entertained an opinion about the merits of the case, still the general power given to the trial court by virtue of articles 3208, 3209, Rev. St. 1895, will permit a challenge to be entertained on any ground that unfits a person to sit on the jury; and for opinions entertained by jurors challenges were allowed under these articles in Couts v. Neer, 70 Tex. 473, 9 S. W. 40. A fair and impartial trial by a fair and impartial jury is what the law exacts, and this requirement becomes a delusion if men with bias or prejudice or preconceived ideas of the rights of one are allowed to sit in judgment on his case. Hughes v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 60 S. W. 565. The facts show that counsel for the appellants were misled into the belief that the juror was fair and impartial, and they did all that could be done to obtain from him the facts, and only learned the truth after the trial. We feel sure that the learned trial judge would have allowed the challenge to the juror if he had told upon his examination the facts that were developed on the motion for new trial. Consequently we are of the opinion that these assignments present reversible error, for which the judgment must be reversed.

The errors complained of in some of the other assignments as to the misconduct of some of the jurors and of their considering facts that were not offered in evidence will doubtless be guarded against, as far as possible, on another trial, and will not likely again occur.

The objection to the argument of Mr. Curtis will not likely again arise. His prompt withdrawal of it indicates the fact that he will probably not repeat it.

We have met with more serious difficulty in considering the argument of Mr. Pearce, which is complained of in the nineteenth assignment. In discussing the mental suffering of the appellee, he used this language: "He suffers in his mind. That he is not the same Will Dickens in his family that he was before he was chopped up. He suffers that to-day, he will suffer that to-morrow, and he will suffer that when his hair is white and whiter still—mental anguish. He will suffer that whenever he meets a friend. He will suffer that whenever he meets a stranger. He will suffer that when he goes to a public gathering. He will suffer mental anguish when he passes across the street." The argument at this point was objected to by counsel for defendant, whereupon Mr. Pearce responded: "I do not blame you. An exception is all there is." Counsel for the defendant responded: "I will take a bill of exceptions to that remark." Mr. Pearce then continued his address in the following language: "He testified upon the stand that he suffered in mind, and I am telling you what suffering in mind is, or rather, gentlemen of the jury, I am reminding you of what mind suffering is. As I started to say that he had, he would in crossing the street, or he would in going into a public house or private house, that he would be made the object of the curious eye—suffers mentally." Whereupon this was objected to and the bill of exceptions was taken. The court refused to check the argument, and it was permitted and did remain as a part of the argument of counsel to the jury.

In the case of Maynard v. Oregon R. R. & Navigation Co., 46 Or. 15, 78 Pac. 983, 68 L. R. A. 479, the question of what may be considered as elements of mental suffering is very fully discussed, and we think states the correct rule upon this subject: "In that case the injured party was asked the following question: 'Mr. Maynard, what, if any, mental suffering or agony have you sustained or had since the injuries that you received down here?' And he was allowed over objection to answer: 'Well, I suffered distress a good deal when I realize my condition. I am not able to work, and it distresses me to think about my little girl, and how I am going to support her and educate her and raise her up. Those are the matters that distress me.' Then followed a motion to strike out the whole of the answer last given as immaterial, irrelevant, and not responsive to an issue in the case, and as calculated to unduly prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant, which was denied. Based upon these premises, the defendant insists that the court erred (1) in permitting the plaintiff to testify that he had a little girl 13 years old, because it is apparent that the only object plaintiff had in inquiring concerning her was to show that she was dependent upon him for support, which could not properly be considered as an element of damages in the case; and (2) in refusing to take the last answer of the witness from the consideration of the jury, because the distress or mental anguish of plaintiff suffered on account of his own condition in not being able to work and earn a livelihood, or on account of his little girl, in not being able to support and educate her, were also not proper elements of damages upon which to base a recovery against the defendant. We will discuss these alleged errors in their inverse order, as counsel have so discussed and presented them. It is undoubtedly true that one suffering from injuries to his person due to the negligence of another may recover for mental distress and anguish resulting from the same cause. Cooper v. Mullins, 30 Ga. 146, 76 Am. Dec. 638; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Martin, 111 Ill. 219, 232; Chicago v. McLean, 35 Ill. App. 273; Ferguson v. Davis County, 57 Iowa, 601, 609, 10 N. W. 906; Kendall v. Albia, 73 Iowa, 241, 245, 34 N. W. 833; Kennon v. Gilmer, 131 U. S. 22, 26, 9 Sup. Ct. 696, 33 L. Ed. 110, 112. Such mental distress or anguish, however, as is not the natural result of the accident, but is produced by the operation of the mind in the contemplation of the physical condition to which the injured party is reduced, or in contemplation of any extraneous suffering or inconvenience that such condition might entail, whether it respects the person himself or others dependent upon him, is not regarded as matter proper to form the basis of consequential damages. The doctrine is enunciated in Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stables, 62 Ill. 313, 320, in the following language: 'It is the mind that either feels or takes cognizance of physical pain, and hence there is mental anguish or suffering inseparable from bodily injury, unless the mind is overpowered and consciousness is destroyed. The mental anguish which is not proper to be considered is where it is not connected with the bodily injury; but was caused by some mental conception not arising from the physical injury.' So anguish of the mind, wholly sentimental, arising from the contemplation of a disfigurement of the person, cannot be considered for the purpose of swelling the damage. The reason for the rule is forcibly stated in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hines, 45 Ill. App. 299, as follows: 'The law regards supposed injuries to sentimental feelings of this character as too remote and speculative to allow it as an element of damages in cases where no malice exists.' Of like character is Augusta R. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706, Giffin v. Lewiston, 6 Idaho, 231, 55 Pac. 545, and Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Caulfield, 63 Fed. 396, 11 C. C. A. 552, 27 U. S. App. 358. The same principle was controlling in Planters' month's rent of $6 on his house would soon be due and that he had just that amount with which to pay it; the appellate court saying: 'The mental anguish which appellee experienced on account of the fact that his house rent would soon be due, which he would be unable to meet, and which (such is the implication) would result in the inconvenience or suffering of his family, does not naturally result from the injury.' * * * Again, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Chance, 57 Kan. 41, 45 Pac. 62, it was said, which language indicates the state of the case also: 'The court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony to the effect that Finnigan was troubled by the sickness and confinement of his wife, and the fear that he would leave her and the child in a dependent and helpless condition. Under the decisions of this court a recovery may be had for mental suffering or anguish of mind resulting from physical pain and suffering endured by the injured party; but it is improper to admit evidence as to mental suffering on account of the circumstances or condition of others.' A like ruling was made in Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Douglass, 69 Tex. 694, 7 S. W. 77, upon a similar state of facts as appears in this last case. See, also, Parsons v. Lindsay, 28 Kan. 426. Now, in regard to the matter which it was sought to have withdrawn from the jury, there are two features involved: First. The witness says, in effect, that he suffered a good deal of distress by realizing his condition that he was not able to work. This related to his mental suffering, as he was asked about that, but it was not such as would naturally result from his physical infliction. It arose by reason of the consideration or mental deduction that his infliction rendered him unable to work—a cause arising independently of the injury sustained. The fact that he was rendered incapable of pursuing his labors was a condition entirely legitimate for swelling the damages, but his meditation upon that fact and the mental distress and anguish produced from such meditation would be wholly aside from and independent of any suffering caused by the accident or the physical infliction received; and, as the authorities say, it is too remote, speculative, and uncertain upon which to base an estimate of damages. The other feature consists in the distress that it caused him when he thought of his little girl and how he was going to support and educate her, and it needs no further remark to show that this is extraneous of any distress of mind arising from the injuries received. So we conclude that the trial court erred in not withdrawing the witness' answer from the consideration of the jury." The serious objection to that the appellee might be entitled to.

There is an assignment of error complaining that the verdict is excessive; and, while we are not prepared to express an opinion upon this question, and are not required to do so, still we will say this much: That verdicts for such amounts are not usual in cases of this character so far as shown by the records of this court, and it is doubtless the case that the jury in awarding the amount returned gave considerable weight to the mental suffering of the plaintiff on account of his injuries, not only what he had suffered up to the time of the trial, but what he may suffer in the future. And the statement made by counsel in his argument in informing the jury what might be considered along that line doubtless had its effect or was calculated to have the effect of inducing them to believe that they could consider as mental suffering those elements of mental emotion discussed by the counsel. The reference to the fact that Dickens would experience mental suffering to-day or to-morrow, or at one place as well as another, is possibly not objectionable, but the mental anguish that he would experience when he meets a friend or when he meets a stranger, or that will arise from the fact that he had become an object of pity, sympathy, or of curiosity to the public generally or individually, is not the kind of mental suffering that the law gives compensation for. It is too remote. A discussion of this question would really be only a repetition of what has been said in the authority cited. Therefore we are of the opinion that much of the argument quoted was objectionable.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, fifteenth, and seventeenth assignments, and possibly some not mentioned, all relate to the subject of assumed risk. The court submitted this case to the jury on the theory that the act of the Legislature of April 24, 1905 (page 386, c. 163, Sess. Laws), was not applicable. That statute relates to assumed risk, and qualifies the old doctrine, as fully explained in St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Mathis (Tex.) 107 S. W. 535. It was urged in argument that this statute is not applicable, that it merely related to defective machinery, etc. We do not think that this is merely the effect of the statute, and in our opinion it would apply to a defect of the character alleged in this case.

The charge which is requested in the seventh assignment of error and which the court refused to give, was substantially given in the main charge of the court.

There are some assignments of error that complain of certain charges, which, in effect, instructed the jury that it was the duty of the appellant to exercise ordinary care to keep its approaches to the railroad track in a reasonably safe condition. The word "approaches" employed in these charges was evidently intended to mean, and doubtless the jury so understood it, to correspond to the facts and the allegations of negligence charged. It was not intended to mean an approach, such as a crossing of the track, but was evidently intended as an instruction to the effect that the railway company should exercise ordinary care to keep those places where its servants must work—that is, those places where they must approach the track for that purpose, when engaged in the work—in an ordinarily safe condition.

The charge complained of in the tenth assignment of error was properly refused. It loses sight of the fact that it was a question to be determined whether the plaintiff had to get on the ground in order to make the coupling.

The point presented in appellant's eleventh assignment of error, wherein it complained of the refusal of the court to give a certain charge, is practically covered by the main charge of the court and some of those given at the request of the appellant. Furthermore, the charge requested was objectionable on the ground that it practically informed the jury that certain facts would constitute contributory negligence. Whether walking between the cars would be contributory negligence would be a question of fact to be passed upon by the jury.

There was no error in permitting the witness Blent to testify as to the condition of the coupling apparatus on the cars in question to show that the same was broken. That was all material as having some bearing on the question in accounting for the conduct of the plaintiff. The defect in the coupling apparatus was not presented as an issue of negligence, but it was proper to be inquired into as explaining why the plaintiff had to resort to the method that he did in order to undertake to uncouple the cars.

The twenty-third assignment, as to the question of variance, is overruled.

For the error pointed out, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. March 31, 1909.)

Appeal from District Court, Bell County; John M. Furman, Judge.

Action by the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Railway Company against W. W. Dickens to vacate a judgment for defendant herein in another suit on the ground of fraud. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer to the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Terry, Cavin & Mills and A. H. Culwell, for appellant. A. L. Curtis and Winbourn Pearce, for appellee.

FISHER, C. J. The reversal of the judgment of the court below in cause No. 4,373 (118 S. W. 612) disposes of this case.
Judgment affirmed.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. THOMPSON.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. April 1, 1909. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*) — TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS—PENALTY FOR DELAY OR DISCRIMINATION—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 4574, which provides that a railroad company which shall fail or refuse, under regulations of the Railroad Commission, to receive and transport without delay or discrimination, tonnage, etc., destined to any point on or over the line of a connecting line, shall be guilty of unjust discrimination, etc., and provides a penalty for such discrimination, being penal, the penalty can be recovered only by showing that acts complained of come within the very terms of the statute, and its terms cannot be extended so as to embrace acts not covered by their language.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 13*) — TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—"DELAY"—"DISCRIMINATION."

The term "discrimination" is used in the section in its ordinary acceptation as meaning a delivery showing a preference in favor of or against a shipper in the performance of any act essential to the completion of that service, and is synonymous with "delay" as used in the section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2099; vol. 2, pp. 1949, 1950.]

3. CARRIERS (§ 13*) — TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS — FAILURE TO FOLLOW OWNER'S ROUTING—"UNJUST DISCRIMINATION."

While the owner of goods shipped on a railroad generally has the right to designate the route, and it is the receiving carrier's duty to observe the owner's directions in delivering to a connecting carrier, the duty is one growing out of the particular contract of carriage or imposed as a common-law obligation, and a breach of the duty by requiring of a connecting carrier, as a condition upon which it should receive goods, that they should be transported over a different route from that selected by the owner, requiring a violation by the connecting carrier of Rev. St. 1895, art. 4535, under which a connecting carrier, receiving goods from another carrier destined to a point on its line, must carry them on its line to destination, unless the person having a right to do so had routed them otherwise, is not an "unjust discrimination" within art. 4574, making it unjust discrimination for a railroad to fail or refuse under regulations of the Railroad Commission to receive and transport without delay or discrimination tonnage, etc., destined to a point on or over a connecting line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 79*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—CONTRACT OF SHIPMENT.

The provisions of a contract of shipment, whether verbal or written, under which goods are carried by a railroad, determine the route and connections to be observed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 79*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACQUIESCENCE IN ROUTING GIVEN BY CARRIER.

After a carrier has refused to route cars as desired by a shipper, if the latter permits the carrier to take the cars for shipment, he acquiesces in the routing actually given by the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 51*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACCEPTANCE OF BILL OF LADING—EFFECT.

Where a shipper accepts a bill of lading with knowledge of its contents, it becomes binding upon him; and hence where he accepts a bill upon which the routing specified by him had been erased and another substituted, with knowledge of the change, he is bound by the bill as changed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 148, 149; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

7. MANDAMUS (§ 12*)—GROUNDS—PERFORMANCE OF LEGAL DUTY.

Mandamus lies only to compel the performance of an existing legal duty and cannot be the means of imposing that duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-92; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

8. MANDAMUS (§ 133*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ISSUE OF CERTAIN BILL OF LADING.

As Rev. St. 1895, art. 322, providing for the issuance of a written receipt or bill of lading by a carrier when demanded, stating the quantity, character, order, and condition of the goods, does not require it to specify the route desired by the shipper, there is no legal duty to incorporate the route in a bill of lading, and mandamus will not lie to compel it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

9. MANDAMUS (§ 133*)—SUBJECT OF RELIEF—DELIVERY OF SHIPPER'S ROUTE TO CONNECTING CARRIER.

There being no statutory requirement imposing on a carrier the duty of delivering to a connecting carrier the routing instructions of the shipper, and the common-law duty, when delivering a through shipment to a connecting carrier to also deliver a waybill or the routing instructions under which the shipment is to be made, not requiring such act, mandamus will not lie to enforce performance of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

10. MANDAMUS (§ 133*)—GROUNDS—EXISTENCE OF LEGAL RIGHT, DUTY, AND DEFAULT IN PERFORMANCE.

Under the rule that before mandamus will lie the party seeking it must show an existing legal right to the service demanded, a corresponding duty on the part of the one upon whom the demand is made, and a default in the performance of the duty, no person can be compelled by mandamus to render a particular service until he has been given an opportunity to perform it; nor can another claim that he has been deprived of a service until he has placed himself in a situation to make an immediate demand for its performance, and the writ will not lie to compel a railroad company to ship lumber by a certain route, and give the shipper a bill of lading specifying the route, upon a mere showing by the person asking the writ that he expected to remain in the lumber business at a certain place and expected in the future to buy lumber and tender it to the carrier with direction to ship it by the route specified.

Appeal from District Court, Travis County; Chas. A. Wilcox, Judge.

Action by James A. Thompson against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Flist & McClendon and D. K. Woodward, Jr., for appellant. Cochran & Penn, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This suit was instituted by the appellee to recover penalties for unjust discrimination provided for in article 4574 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1895.

Findings of Fact.

At the time of filing this suit, and for some years prior thereto, the appellee was engaged in the business of retailing lumber at Taylor, in Williamson county, Tex. He purchased a large amount of his lumber from the Thompson-Tucker Lumber Company at its mills at Willard, a small station situated on the line of the appellant railway company running from Trinity, in Trinity county, through Corrigan, in Polk county, to Colmesnell, in Tyler county. On different dates between April 1, 1906, and September 5, 1907, the appellee purchased of the aforesaid lumber company 57 car loads of lumber delivered f. o. b. the cars at Willard, for the purpose of having the same shipped to him at Taylor, and which was thereafter so shipped and delivered on different dates during that period of time. There were three routes by which such shipments could be made from Willard to Taylor; one over the appellant's T. & S. line to Trinity, thence over the International & Great Northern Railway to Houston, and from there over another line of the appellant's to Taylor; another from Trinity over the International & Great Northern Railway to Palestine, and thence over the same company's line to Taylor; still another from Willard to Corrigan, thence over the Houston, East & West Texas Railway to Houston, and from there over the appellant's line to Taylor. The distances from Willard to Taylor over these respective routes were as follows: Over the first mentioned 278 miles; the second, 236 miles; and the third, 272 miles. Over each route the Railroad Commission had established a rate, which was the same for all. The appellee had for some time previous to the first-mentioned date, and during all of the time the shipments were made, desired that his lumber should be carried over the appellant's line to Trinity, thence over the International & Great Northern Railway, via Palestine, to Taylor, claiming that it reached its destination by that route in a shorter time, and for other personal reasons. Acting for him in the method of routing the shipments, the agent of the Thompson-Tucker Lumber Company, on the several occasions when each of the 57 cars of lumber were to be delivered to the appellant for shipment, and before they were received by the appellant at Willard, tendered to the appellant's agents in charge of the trains upon which the cars were to be shipped duplicate receipts upon the following blank form:

The blanks "To," "At," and "Via" in each of the 57 receipts were filled in pencil so as to read: "To order J. A. Thompson, Taylor, Tex., % I. & G. N. Ry. Co. At Trinity, Tex., for continuous transportation by I. & G. N. Via Trinity, Palestine and I. & G. N. Ry." In the shipment of January 10, 1907, all the words in pencil (italics above) were erased; in 24 of the shipments the words "for continuous transportation by I. & G. N. (Via) Trinity, Palestine and I. & G. N. Ry." were erased; and in the balance the words "Trinity, Tex., for continuous transportation by I. & G. N. (Via) Trinity, Palestine and I. & G. N. Ry." were erased.

The bill of lading referred to in the above-mentioned receipt was that found on one of the blank forms in general use by the appellant railway company. Among other provisions, that form contains an undertaking on the part of the appellant to deliver the freight at the point of destination if that point is on its line; if not, then to deliver to its next connecting carrier; and also a provision limiting its liability for damages to that which occurs upon its own line.

There was no local agent at Willard, and the bills of lading, or "receipts," as they are called, were signed by the conductors in charge of the trains. The receipts were usually tendered by an agent of the lumber company called the "shipping clerk." This clerk was not present upon all of the occasions when the cars and receipts were tendered to the appellant for transportation. In most of the instances, whether present or not, a note was attached to the duplicate receipts left for the conductor to sign, in which he was requested that, unless he would handle the cars according to the routing instructions given in the receipts, not to undertake to handle them at all. The officials in charge of the management and control of the appellant's line were well aware of the desire of the appellee that the cars containing his lumber should be routed by way of Trinity and Palestine over the International & Great Northern Railway to Taylor; and the agents of the lumber company, at the time they tendered the duplicate receipts above referred to, in addition to the note attached, verbally requested that those wishes be carried out. The conductors, however, acting under orders from their superiors, disregarded those instructions, made the erasures before mentioned, and after doing so signed the receipts and delivered them to the shipping clerk of the lumber company if he was present, and, if not, left them where they could be obtained by him upon his return, and then would take charge of the car, transport it to Trinity, and there deliver it to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, accompanied by a waybill providing for its carriage to Houston, and there to be delivered again to the appellant for shipment to Taylor.

The court found that the appellee accepted those receipts as signed after the erasures showing the routing via Palestine had been made, and allowed the appellant to take charge of the cars of lumber with no routings except those remaining upon the receipts as shown. The testimony is sufficient to show that the desire of the appellee to have his cars containing the lumber shipped from Willard to Taylor routed by way of Palestine over the International & Great Northern Railway, while well known to the appellant and the officials in charge of that department of its business, had been uniformly disregarded, and all of the 57 cars were routed by way of Trinity and Houston, and thence over the appellant's main line to Taylor. The reason given by the appellant's general freight agent was that he desired his company to get the benefit of the long haul from Houston to Taylor, which it would not do if the routing was by way of Palestine over the International & Great Northern Railway. At the time these shipments were made, there was in effect between the appellant and the International & Great Northern Railway Company a traffic agreement, by which it was understood between the two companies that all freight originating on the appellant's T. & S. branch and destined to points on or over appellant's line south of Waco should be carried by way of Houston. This traffic agreement was then on file with the Railroad Commission, but there was no other evidence of whether or not it had been approved by the commission.

Some time previous to the date of any of the shipments here under consideration, there had arisen between the appellant and the appellee a similar controversy concerning the routing of his lumber from Willard to Taylor. This controversy ultimately resulted in a suit by appellee for the statutory penalties, but the litigation was settled by compromise. During the time of that controversy, the general freight agent of the appellant had informed the freight agent of the International & Great Northern Railway Company that, if the latter company did not respect appellant's routing of shipments originating at Willard destined to Taylor by way of Houston, all of the freight originating at Willard would be carried by way of Corrigan over the Houston East & West Texas Railway to Houston, thus diverting that traffic from the International & Great Northern Railway Company. By reason of this threatened diversion of the traffic, the International & Great Northern Railway Company thereafter followed the routing indicated in the waybills delivered to it by the appellant company. The refusal of the appellant to deliver the 57 cars of lumber to the International & Great Northern Railway Company with appellee's routing instructions contained in the receipts made out at Willard is the basis of this suit.

Conclusions of Law.

The petition is very voluminous, but avers the facts substantially as stated above. From a judgment in favor of the appellee for penalties aggregating $8,550, and a judgment awarding a writ of mandamus compelling the appellant at all times in the future, when the appellee shall tender to it on its line of railway at Willard any lumber in car load lots for shipment from that point to Taylor, at the freight rate established by the Railroad Commission, with directions to appellant given at the time of such tender that the same shall be carried by it over its line of road to Trinity and there delivered to the International & Great Northern Railway Company for carriage by it by way of Palestine to Taylor, to receive such shipments so tendered and to issue to appellee its receipt, or bill of lading, therefor, specifying the routing thereof given by the appellee, and further directing upon such receipts of any such shipments from plaintiff with such directions and routing instructions, to carry such shipments of lumber over its line of railway to Trinity, and there deliver the same to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, together with the routing instructions above referred to, this appeal is prosecuted.

Counsel for appellee thus states the proposition upon which he relies for a recovery in this case: "We contend that the instruction given by the appellee in the receipt tendered by him for each shipment, and the instructions given by the appellee to the appellant at the time of each shipment in addition to those contained in the receipt tendered, remain binding upon the appellant, notwithstanding the erasures by appellant of the routing in the receipt tendered, since no other routing was agreed to by appellee; and that when the appellant carried the shipment to Trinity and there delivered it to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, representing to said company that such shipment was routed by way of Houston, and demanding of said International & Great Northern Railway Company, as a condition upon which said shipment should be delivered to it, that it should carry the shipment to Houston and there deliver it back to appellant, thus giving a routing instruction different from that given by the appellee, and imposing upon the International & Great Northern Railway Company a condition which it had no right to exact, * * * appellant was guilty of unjust discrimination." Upon the correctness of that proposition he relies for an affirmance of this judgment.

Article 4574 of the Revised Civil Statutes, which defines the character of "unjust discrimination" here complained of, in subdivision 2 contains the following provision: "Every railroad company which shall fail or refuse, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the commission, to receive and transport without delay or discrimination the passengers, tonnage and cars, loaded or empty, of any connecting line of railroad, and every railroad which shall, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the commission, fail or refuse to transport and deliver without delay or discrimination any passengers, tonnage or cars, loaded or empty, destined to any point on or over the line of any connecting line of railroad, shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination; provided, perishable freights of all kinds and live stock shall have precedence of shipment." There are other provisions of the statute which prescribe the penalties that may be recovered by the aggrieved party on account of any violation of those requirements. The question, then, is: Did the appellant violate the provisions of this statute defining "unjust discrimination"?

By the terms of the article referred to, appellant was required to receive and transport without delay or discrimination the cars for any connecting carrier, and was prohibited from failing or refusing to transport and deliver without delay or discrimination cars destined to a point on or over the line of any connecting carrier. Under the well-established rule for the construction of penal statutes, such as that here under consideration, the appellee would be entitled to recover penalties only by showing that the acts complained of come within the very terms of the statutes; and these will not be extended so as to embrace acts not covered by their language, although those acts be wrongful. S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Stribling, 99 Tex. 319, 89 S. W. 963; Hill & Morris v. Railway Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 75 S. W. 874; Schloss v. Railway Co., 85 Tex. 601, 22 S. W. 1014. It is not here insisted that there was any delay or discrimination in receiving and transporting the cars on the line of the appellant, or that there was any failure or refusal to deliver the cars without delay to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, the connecting carrier in this instance. Unless we hold that the conduct of the appellant amounted to a violation of the duty to deliver without "discrimination," no offense for which a penalty may be recovered is charged or shown. The term "discrimination," as used in the requirement that carriers "shall deliver without delay or discrimination," etc., is only a part of the statutory definition of what it takes to constitute "unjust discrimination," and must be taken in its ordinary acceptation, and to mean a delivery without showing any preference in favor of or against a shipper in the performance of any act essential to the completion of that service. It has been held that the terms "delay" and "discrimination," as used in this article, are convertible, and that "discrimination" means "delay." G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Lone Star Salt Co., 26 Tex. Civ. App. 531, 63 S. W. 1025. The duty which devolved upon the appellant as a common carrier, when it received the appellee's cars of lumber destined to a point on another line of railroad, was to deliver the same to its connecting carrier in accordance with the statutory requirements. The terms of the statute do not exact anything more than that the physical delivery of the cars or freight shall be done without delay or discrimination. When this was done its statutory duty was performed. There is no complaint that this service was performed in a manner showing a preference in favor of other shipments or shippers, or that in the physical handling of the cars by the appellant the delivery was not made according to the requirements of law. Where, then, is the offense?

The appellee contends that it lies in the fact of the appellant's giving a routing different from that embodied in the instructions delivered to it at the time the freight was received at Willard, that the erasures made by the appellant's conductors in the receipts tendered them for signature at the time the cars were delivered did not change the legal effect of those instruments, and that the freight was in fact received routed via Palestine to Taylor over the International & Great Northern Railway Company from Trinity. We may concede this contention to be correct, and may also concede that the traffic agreement between the appellant and the International & Great Northern Railway Company, by which all freight originating on that line destined to points south of Waco should be carried by way of Houston, was insufficient to justify either road in insisting on carrying these cars by way of Houston over the objection of the appellee. Still, this would not constitute a statutory offense on the part of the appellant, although it might as to the other carrier. That the owner generally has the right to designate the route over which his goods shall be transported is well settled. Inman v. Railway Co., 14 Tex. Civ. App. 39, 37 S. W. 37; G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Irvine (Tex. Civ. App.) 73 S. W. 540. It may also be admitted that there is a duty resting upon the receiving carrier to transmit and deliver to its connecting carrier the routing instructions under which the goods are being transported. This duty, however, is one which grows out of the particular contract of carriage, or is one imposed as the common-law obligation of the carrier, and does not result from the statutory requirement. Hence no penalty can be recovered for its breach. In the Stribling Case, above referred to, the Supreme Court held that, while it was a wrong for the carrier to deny the owner the right to designate the route his freight should be carried, it was not one for which the statute had provided a penalty. The statutory definition of "unjust discrimination" no more includes the wrongful conduct of refusing to deliver to the connecting carrier the routing instructions of the owner than it does the offense of refusing to permit the owner in the first instance to name the route to be taken by the shipment. Whatever the contract of shipment provides, whether verbal or written, under which the freight is carried, determines the route and connections to be observed.

In this case it cannot be said that the appellant received the lumber for shipment via Palestine in the face of its positive and express refusal to do so. Whatever might be implied from its conduct in accepting the freight for shipment with the notice not to take the cars, unless it would handle them according to the routing instructions of the owner, is negated by the specific act of the appellant's agents in each instance erasing a stipulation to that effect from the bills of lading, and in its repeated express refusals to route those cars by way of Palestine, as desired by the appellee. This practice had continued for such a length of time, that, as one of the witnesses stated, the demand for the routing by way of Palestine became a mere matter of form. It is also in evidence that this persistent refusal on the part of the appellant antedated these shipments by several months, and had at one time resulted in a suit for penalties growing out of shipments being diverted to the line of the Houston, East & West Texas Railway. The evidence also justifies the conclusion that the International & Great Northern Railway Company was fully cognizant of the wishes of the appellee to have his freight routed by way of Palestine, and of the controversy with appellant, and yielded to the demand of the appellant to carry by way of Houston and there redeliver solely on account of the fear of losing all of the shipping from Willard. The court found that, after the appellant had refused to route the cars according to the wishes of the appellee, he then permitted appellant's agents to take the cars for shipment. If so, he must have acquiesced in the routing actually given by the carrier. The conclusion of counsel for appellee that the erasures did not alter the routing under which the cars were ultimately carried is not sustained. When a shipper accepts a bill of lading, with knowledge of its contents, it becomes binding upon him. Railway Co. v. Batte (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 345; 1 Hutch. on Carriers, § 171. The freight was promptly delivered to the International & Great Northern Railway Company. Its destination was Taylor, a point on the line of that road. Under the provisions of article 4535 of the Revised Civil Statutes, it became the duty of the International & Great Northern Railway Company, upon the receipt of the freight destined for that point, to transport it over its line to its destination, unless the party having a right to do so had routed it otherwise. The gist of the offending committed by the appellant therefore seems to consist, not in failing or refusing to deliver the freight to its connecting carrier without delay or discrimination, but in exacting from the latter, as a condition upon which it should receive the freight, that the same should be transported over a different route from that selected by the owner. Pushing this contention to its ultimate analysis, it amounts simply to a charge that the appellant wrongfully induced the International & Great Northern Railway Company, its connecting carrier, to violate its statutory duty, and forced that road to carry the freight over a different route and deliver to a different connection from that demanded by the owner. No penalty is provided by statute for such conduct as that charged against the appellant, even though it may be violative of the shipper's rights. S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Stribling, supra.

Counsel for appellee insists that the Stribling Case above referred to supports their contention in this suit. We do not think the analogy between the facts of that case and those here involved is sufficiently strong to make the ruling there in all respects decisive of this. In that case the controversy arose between the San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railway Company and the plaintiff in the suit regarding the shipment of four car loads of hogs from Kerrville to Graphite. The above-named railroad company was the initial carrier, and refused to route the cars according to the wishes of the shipper. The latter desired them carried over the road of the defendant in the suit to San Antonio, there delivered to the International & Great Northern Railway Company to be carried to Austin and from there over the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company to Graphite. The carrier insisted upon routing them by way of San Antonio, thence to Giddings over its own road, there to be delivered to the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company, to be carried to their destination. Three of the cars were shipped under bills of lading signed by the shipper according to the route selected by the carrier. The shipper testified that he signed the bills without reading them, and did not agree to the routing therein specified. The court, however, held that those were the contracts under which the shipments were made, and that, notwithstanding the shipper had the right to select the routing of his freight in this instance, he had in fact entered into a contract which routed them according to the way they were actually carried. In that connection the court said: "The penalty is not given for the refusal of the carrier to allow the owner of the goods to select the roads over which they shall be carried, but for the failure or refusal to transport and deliver as they are actually destined." For a refusal to receive and transport freight in accordance with the routing selected by the owner there are other remedies which may be invoked. For the fourth car the court held the plaintiff in the suit was entitled to recover a penalty, for the reason that the bill of lading under which that car was shipped only bound the appellant company to carry the freight as far as San Antonio, specifying Graphite as the ultimate destination. The court held that the initial carrier should have delivered this car to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, its connecting carrier, at San Antonio; but having failed to do so, and insisting on carrying the freight on to another point, Giddings, and there deliver it to another carrier, it had committed a violation of the law requiring it to deliver without delay or discrimination to its connecting carrier. In that case there was an actual failure and refusal to deliver to the connecting carrier named in the contract under which the shipment was made. Here there was an actual delivery to the proper connecting carrier, a compliance with the very terms of the statute.

We think both the evidence and the pleadings insufficient to support a judgment for the statutory penalties sued for. We are also of the opinion that the judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus was error. As a basis for that writ, the appellee alleges, in substance: That he expects to continue in the lumber business at Taylor, and expects and intends to purchase in the future large numbers of car loads of lumber from the aforesaid lumber company at ning through Willard, and he will be compelled to make all of his shipments over the line of the appellant as the initial carrier; that appellant refuses to allow him to have such shipments carried over the International & Great Northern Railway by way of Palestine to Taylor, and unless restrained will continue such refusal in the future, and will continue to refuse to accept such shipments from Willard to Taylor and to issue receipts therefor specifying that the same shall be carried by it to Trinity and there delivered to the International & Great Northern Railway Company for carriage by way of Palestine to Taylor, and will in future deliver shipments to the International & Great Northern Railway Company only upon condition that the latter will carry same to Houston and there deliver said lumber back to the appellant; that appellant will in future represent to the International & Great Northern Railway Company that all such shipments are destined to go by way of Houston, and will deliver waybills to said International & Great Northern Railway Company showing such routing by way of Houston, and will not, unless required by order of the court to do so, accept shipments of lumber from appellee at Willard and deliver same to said International & Great Northern Railway Company at Trinity with the routing desired by appellee, and unless restrained from so doing, and required to receive and transport in the future, appellee will suffer great inconvenience, annoyance, and damages, etc. In addition to a prayer for the penalties, he asks for a decree perpetually restraining appellant from in any manner attempting to prevent appellee from securing his rights under the law to have such shipments of lumber as he shall hereafter make from Willard to Taylor carried from Willard to Trinity by appellant, and thence over the International & Great Northern Railway via Palestine to Taylor, when he directs this to be done, and perpetually restraining appellant from carrying such shipments by any other route, and perpetually restraining appellant, when such shipments are delivered by it to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, from representing to that company that such shipment is routed by any other way than is directed by appellee, and also requiring appellant, when any such shipment is tendered to it at Willard with directions that the same shall be by it carried to Trinity and there delivered to said International & Great Northern Railway Company for carriage by the latter to Taylor via Palestine, to receive such shipment and "issue its receipt, or bill of lading, therefor, specicontinue in the lumber business at Taylor, and expected in the future to buy lumber in car load lots in the town of Willard and tender such shipments to the defendant company at Willard with directions to carry the same to Trinity and there deliver to the International & Great Northern Railway Company for transportation by that company by way of Palestine to Taylor. Allen, the general freight agent of the appellant company, testified: That he had known for the past four or five years that appellee wanted all of his shipments carried to Trinity and there delivered to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, and by it carried to Palestine, thence to Taylor; that he had denied him that right all the time, and expected, unless this court required them to do otherwise, to continue to deny him that right. In response to that portion of the petition, the court rendered substantially the following judgment: That appellant, its officers and agents, are required at all times in the future, when the plaintiff, Thompson, shall tender to it at Willard any car loads of lumber for shipment to Taylor, with directions that the same shall be carried by appellant over its line to Trinity and there delivered to the International & Great Northern Railway Company for transportation by it via Palestine to Taylor, to receive such shipments so tendered and "issue to plaintiff its receipt, or bill of lading, therefor, specifying the routing thereof given by plaintiff"; and further ordered appellant, upon receipt of such shipment with such directions for routing, to carry same to Trinity and there deliver it to the International & Great Northern Railway Company, "together with the routing instructions relating thereto as given by the plaintiff." It was further ordered that the clerk issue "the proper writ of mandamus commanding observance by defendant, its officers, servants, agents and employes of this judgment."

The complaint in this appeal being directed against the judgment rendered, and not against the full measure of what the pleader evidently sought, we may pass by as unimportant the question of whether or not the judgment was responsive to the pleading, and, by indulging that construction with which both parties appear to be satisfied, assume that the prayer of the appellee was for the very writ which was granted. It will be observed that the judgment awarding the writ commands the performance of two distinct services: (1) The giving of a receipt, or bill of lading, specifying the routing given by the appellee; and (2) the delivery of the cars to the connecting carrier, together with the routing instructions of appellee. A writ of mandamus will not lie except to compel the performance of an existing legal duty. The writ itself cannot be the means of imposing that duty. Arberry v. Bevers, 6 Tex. 457, 55 Am. Dec. 701; Screwmen's Association v. Benson, 76 Tex. 552, 13 S. W. 379; T. & M. Ry. Co. v. Jarvis, 80 Tex. 467, 15 S. W. 1089; 13 Ency. Plead. & Prac. 493, 497. Article 322 of the Revised Civil Statutes provides for the issuance of a written receipt, or bill of lading, by the carrier when demanded, "stating the quantity, character, order and condition of the goods." There is nothing in this provision requiring the receipt, or bill of lading, to specify the route over which the owner may wish his freight transported, and hence there was no legal duty devolving upon the agents of the appellant to do what the court here commanded them to do in making out the bill of lading. That portion of the judgment was wholly unwarranted by the statute. There appears not to be any common-law duty imposed upon the carrier to issue a written bill of lading. Johnson v. Stoddard, 100 Mass. 306; 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1415. As to the second provision of this order, we know of no statutory requirement imposing upon the carrier the duty of delivering to the connecting line the routing instructions of the owner or shipper. It is doubtless its common-law duty, when delivering a through shipment to a connecting carrier, to also deliver a waybill or the routing instructions under which the shipment is to be made. 4 Elliott on Railroads, §§ 1432, 1440; L. & N. Ry. Co. v. Stock Yards Co. (Ky.) 97 S. W. 787. This duty, however, would be discharged by the performance of service less than that which the court required in this case, and it is not necessary for us to discuss the full extent of this common-law requirement.

There are other reasons which we think are conclusive against the right of the appellee to the writ here granted. Before mandamus can be made available, the party seeking it must show an existing legal right to the service demanded, a corresponding duty on the part of the person or corporation upon whom the demand is made, and a default in the performance of that duty. No such a state of facts as that is here shown. The appellee testified that he expected to continue in the lumber business at Taylor, and expected in the future to buy lumber in car load lots at Willard and tender same for shipment to the appellant company with directions to carry to Trinity and there deliver to the International & Great Northern Railway Company for transportation by that company via Palestine to Taylor. Those are the facts upon which he predicates his right for the protection of which he sought the issuance of the writ. This, we think, is but the assertion of an abstract right of which he intends in the future to avail himself, and without indicating at what time in the future he expects to make these demands upon the agents of the appellant. Admitting, for the purposes of this discussion, that the appellant has indicated a purpose to continue in future to refuse to route such shipments in accordance with the wishes of the appellee, this could be considered as no more than a declaration concerning a future action or policy of the company. It was not the breach of an existing concrete duty which it was then called upon to perform. No person can be compelled by mandamus to render a particular service till he had been given at least an opportunity to perform it, nor can another claim that he has been deprived of a service till he has placed himself in a situation to make an immediate demand for its performance. The writ will not issue to protect an anticipated omission of duty, but it must appear that there has been actual default of a clear legal duty then due at the hands of the party against whom the relief is sought. Northern Warehouse Co. v. O. R. & Nav. Co., 32 Wash. 218, 73 Pac. 389; High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies (3d Ed.) § 12. How can it be said that the appellee was deprived of the service which he here seeks to have performed, until those conditions have arisen when he had a right to their performance? Or how can it be said that the appellant was in default, until it was placed in the attitude where it might have actually performed the service demanded at its hands and then refused?

We do not wish to be understood as holding that, upon a proper showing, the performance of the duties here referred to could be enforced through mandamus. That question is not here decided. Thompson having failed to say when he intended to make his shipments, Allen's declarations as to what he would do when shipments were tendered is nothing more than a threat upon his part to refuse to do what may or may not be demanded of appellant at an indefinite time in the future.

The judgment of the district court will therefore be reversed, and judgment here rendered in favor of the appellant.

118 S.W.—40 † Writ of error denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1909.

Stewarts and Geo. F. Burgess, for appellant. Joseph Coney, for appellees.

JAMES, C. J. The petition of McAdoo was in the ordinary form of trespass to try title, alleging that plaintiff owned an undivided half of a certain lot in Galveston, and that defendants Williams and wife owned the other half, and prayed for judgment for title and possession of plaintiff's half and for partition. Defendants pleaded not guilty; a general denial; that the land sought to be partitioned was and had been defendants' homestead for 20 years; that on or about July, 1900, defendants, being indebted to Wm. H. Smith, an attorney at law, for legal services in the sum of $200, executed to said Smith a mortgage to secure same, which was in the form of a deed to an undivided half of the lot, which deed was intended by all parties to constitute a mortgage only; that the plaintiff, McAdoo, purchased the said mortgage interest from Smith in their homestead, and he has no other claim, right, or title in the land, except that which he acquired from Smith; and that, whether the deed is a deed or a mortgage, the court can only ascertain the fact, "for it is estopped by the Constitution and the decisions of our Supreme Court from decreeing a partition of defendants' homestead to satisfy either claim."

Plaintiff filed no further pleading, and did not plead that he was entitled to be protected because he was a purchaser in good faith and for value from Smith, which would seem to be necessary in order to raise such an issue, in view of the special pleading by the defendants. Rivers v. Foote, 11 Tex. 662. However this may be, there was not sufficient testimony to show that McAdoo stood in the attitude of an innocent purchaser from Smith. The recital in the deed was not enough to prove payment of the consideration expressed. Bremer v. Case, 60 Tex. 151; Sickles v. Epps (Tex.) 8 S. W. 124. Besides, there were circumstances in the evidence which tended to show that McAdoo was a simulated, and not an actual, purchaser. The case was tried by the judge, who gave a general judgment for the defendants, without any findings of fact. The testimony showed that, at the time of the execution of the deed to Smith by Williams and wife, the property was occupied by the latter as their home, and that this has been its use ever since; and the testimony was amply sufficient to warrant the finding that the deed was not intended by the parties to it as a conveyance, but only as security for a debt. The deed having been found

3. ESCROWS (§ 12*)—TIME WHEN INSTRUMENT TAKES EFFECT.

A bill of sale of a half interest in property was placed in escrow, together with a note for the price, to be delivered on the buyer procuring an indorser of the note. The buyer procured an indorser, and the note was delivered to the seller, but the bill of sale was continued in escrow pursuant to an agreement to which the seller was not a party. Held, that the buyer and indorser were liable on the note from the time of its delivery to the seller.

NEILL, J. This suit was brought by appellee on August 23, 1906, against appellants, to recover a balance of $300, with interest and attorney's fees, due on a promissory note for $500, made by the latter to the former June 16, 1905, and payable six months after date. The defendant Ketterson answered by a general denial, a plea of failure of consideration, and of accord and satisfaction. Heaton, in addition to the matters pleaded by his codefendant, pleaded that he was an accommodation indorser, and that plaintiff, knowing such fact, had failed to fix his liability by instituting suit against the principal within the time prescribed by statute. He then, by way of a cross-action against Ketterson, pleaded that the payments on the note had been made by him for Ketterson as such indorser, and prayed judgment against him for the amounts so paid, and which might be recovered against him in this action, as an indorser on the note. By supplemental petitions the plaintiff denied all the matters specially pleaded by the defendants, except the allegation of Heaton that his relation to the note was that of an indorser, which was admitted. And, in replication to that part of Heaton's answer which pleads plaintiff's failure to sue in time to fix his liability, he pleaded the latter's waiver. The defendant Ketterson, in reply to his codefendant's cross-action for the recovery over against him of the $200 paid by the latter on the note, averred that such payment was not obligatory on Heaton as an indorser, but was voluntary, and that, therefore, he (Ketterson) is not liable to him therefor. The trial of the case resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendants for the amount due on the note, and a judgment in favor of Heaton on his cross-action over against Ketterson as prayed for. Both defendants have appealed from the judgment in plaintiff's favor against them, and have assigned errors. No error as to the judgment in favor of Heaton against Ketterson appears from the latter's brief to be insisted on.

The note sued on was executed by Ketterson as principal, in pursuance of a written agreement executed by him and the plaintiff alone on June 16, 1905, which, omitting its caption and signature of the parties, is as follows:

"This agreement between R. D. Inscho and Jno. B. Ketterson bears witness: Said Inscho agrees for the consideration herein-after mentioned to sell, convey and deliver unto the David Crockett Oil Company, certain articles, machinery and tools mentioned and described in a bill of sale of even date herewith from R. D. Inscho and H. S. Stevens to David Crockett Oil Company and which said bill of sale has not been delivered.

"Said Ketterson agrees, in consideration of said sale and conveyance to pay to the said Inscho for his portion of said property the sum of $50.00 cash, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and to execute and deliver to said Inscho his promissory note of even date with this instrument, for the sum of $550.00 payable six months after its date at Houston, Texas, bearing eight per cent. interest from date until paid and providing for ten per cent. additional on the amount of principal and interest then owing as attorney's fees if said note is placed in the hands of an attorney for collection or is sued upon, and further to procure an endorser on said note who shall be satisfactory and agreeable to said Inscho. Upon said Ketterson procuring said endorser to the satisfaction of said Inscho, said bill of sale shall be delivered to said Ketterson and the note delivered to said Inscho. It is expressly agreed and understood between said parties that in case said Ketterson shall fail to procure such satisfactory endorser on or before the 5th day of July, 1905, then, and in that event said amount of $50.00 already paid shall be forfeited by said Ketterson to said Inscho as liquidated damages and no title or interest in said property shall pass to said company in the interest of said Inscho therein."

The bill of sale stipulated for and described in this agreement was executed on the same day by Inscho and Stevens, and, according to the arrangement of the parties, placed with the note in escrow in the hands of W. H. Davidson, to be delivered to the grantee, in so far as Inscho was concerned or affected by it, upon Ketterson's procuring an indorser of the note to the satisfaction of Inscho, as stipulated in the agreement. He did procure Heaton as an indorser, who being satisfactory to Inscho, the note was then delivered to him (Inscho) by Davidson, with whom it had been placed in escrow to be delivered upon such condition. It seems, however, that the bill of sale to the property was still held in escrow, not for the performance of any agreement or condition as between Ketterson and plaintiff, but under another agreement between the David Crockett Oil Company and Wilson, who owned the other half interest in the property, that it should be so held by Davidson until the company paid Wilson according to agreement for his half interest, which it failed to do.

Under these facts, which are undisputed, there can be no doubt as to the liability of defendants upon the note in the respective capacities in which they executed it, unless the plaintiff is precluded from recovering by some act or omission on his part occurring after the note was delivered to him.

When a note is delivered in escrow, to be held until a certain event happens, or certain conditions are complied with, the liability of the maker and indorser commences as soon as the event happens or the conditions are fulfilled, even though there be no

Just as such a Ketterson procured Heaton as an indorser satisfactory to Inscho, the bill of sale to the latter's half interest in the property became effective, and vested title thereto absolutely and irrevocably in the David Crockett Oil Company. And the maker and indorser of the note became liable thereon to Inscho according to the tenor and effect of the instrument. It was not plaintiff's fault that the bill of sale remained in escrow, but it was the fault of the oil company in not paying Wilson for his half interest in the property, as it had agreed with him to do as a condition precedent to its being delivered to the company by the depository. This was an agreement which plaintiff was not a party to, and by which he could be in no way affected. It would be a monstrous doctrine to deprive a party, who has fully performed his part of a contract, of his rights under it because a party to another and different contract has not performed his contract.

Reduced to its logical sequence, according to defendants' theory, Inscho, though he had sold his half interest in the property in consideration of which the note sued on was given, would be compelled to pay the consideration to Wilson which the oil company had agreed to pay him for his half, so the bill of sale held in escrow could be delivered to the company, before he could recover upon the note given in consideration for the conveyance by him of his own half. Thus, the theory is brought to a reductio ad absurdum.

It clearly appears from the letters written by Heaton to Inscho on January 26, 1906, and July 15, 1906, that the former waived the latter's failure to fix his (Heaton's) liability as indorser by suit, as is provided by article 304, Rev. St. 1895.

The right of the plaintiff to maintain his action against Ketterson as principal on the note was not affected by plaintiff's making a bill of sale to the property for which the note was given, after its maturity, to Heaton at the latter's solicitation; for at that time plaintiff had no title whatever in the property to convey, and, besides, the pretended conveyance was wholly without consideration.

If there be any error in the court's charge, it arises from its being too favorable to the appellants. All special charges asked by defendants, on the refusal of which errors are assigned, were properly refused.

We have considered all the assignments of error and have concluded none of them requires a reversal of the judgment. It is therefore affirmed.

1. CARRIERS (§ 223*)—INJURY TO ANIMALS—DEFENSES—FREE TRANSPORTATION.

Where, pursuant to plaintiffs' subcontract for railroad construction, defendant transported their outfit from the place where they had finished work to another point free of charge to plaintiffs, that fact was no defense to their claim for damages to their mules from negligent transportation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 932; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 229*)—INJURIES TO ANIMALS—DAMAGES.

The measure of a carrier's liability for injuries to mules from negligent transportation was the difference between the market value of the mules at destination at the time of delivery and what would have been their market value at the same time and place in the condition they would have been had they been transported without negligence, and this, though the mules were kept for use and not for sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 930, 963, 964; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—INJURIES TO ANIMALS—MARKET VALUE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to mules resulting from negligent transportation, plaintiff could not recover where there was no evidence as to the market value of the mules at destination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 76*)—EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS—TIME.

An objection that a witness had not qualified himself to testify as to the market value of mules, not made until after plaintiff had made his opening argument to the jury, was too late.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 183-190; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 230*)—INJURY TO ANIMALS—MARKET VALUE.

Evidence that the value of two mules killed as the result of a carrier's negligent transportation was $200 each was sufficient to authorize submission of the issue of the market value of the mules at destination to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—COMPETENCY—MARKET VALUE.

Where a witness offering to testify as to the market value of certain mules at a certain time and place testified that his only knowledge was what one man had told him who came to buy mules, he was incompetent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 543*)—MARKET VALUE—COMPETENCY.

A witness otherwise qualified may testify as to the value of mules described to him, which he had never seen.

Appeal from Grimes County Court; T. P. Buffington, Judge.

Action by Gillespie & Carlton against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Terry, Cavin & Mills and A. H. Culwell, for appellant. T. C. Buffington and J. T. Bowen, for appellees.

REESE, J. This is a suit by Gillespie & Carlton in the county court against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company to recover damages for 2 mules killed and 27 others injured while being transported from Glen Flora to Navasota by defendant railway company. It is alleged that the loss and injury were occasioned by negligence of the railway company, and trial with a jury resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for $300 as the value of the two mules killed, and $250 damages for injuries to the others. From the judgment upon this verdict, its motion for a new trial having been overruled, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

Appellees had been working at Glen Flora as subcontractors under one Owens, who had a contract with appellant to grade its road-bed. Their contract with Owens required him, when they had finished the work upon which they were engaged, to transport, or have transported, their outfit, consisting of 29 mules, wagons, scrapers, etc., to Navasota, free of charge to appellees. When they had finished their work, they applied to appellant's agent at Glen Flora for a car in which to transport their outfit to Navasota, which was furnished them. They loaded the stuff, and it was billed to Navasota in Owens' name, and upon arrival there was delivered to them. They paid nothing for the transportation. There is no evidence that they practiced any deception upon the agent in order to procure the free transportation, or that the agent did not know all about the ownership of the property. The evidence excludes any loss from misrepresentation or fraud on the part of appellees. That they paid no freight to appellant for the carriage of the mules is no defense to their claim for damages here set up. The fourth assignment of error presenting this objection to the judgment is without merit.

By the first assignment of error appellant assails the action of the court in refusing its motion for a new trial on the ground therein urged that the evidence did not authorize the submission to the jury of the issue of damage to the 27 mules. The following is all the evidence on this point:

James Gillespie, one of the plaintiffs, testified: "The mules were shipped to Navasota, Grimes county, Tex., over the Santa Fé Road, and were in good condition and sound when received by defendant for shipment, 29 head. The 27 mules were badly injured, bruised, and skinned on heads, legs, and hips; one badly skinned from his hip down. The 27 head of mules were unable to work, on account of their injuries received, for nearly three weeks, and I lost the use of them for that time, and had to buy feed and care for them for nearly three weeks."

Lee Hudlin, for plaintiff, testified: "I went on the same train but not in the car with the mules. At Bellville the train was switched around, bumped and jerked the mules, and beat them up. I went out to see about them one time. One mule was down. I got him up; another had his leg sticking out through a crack or door in the car."

Ben Deason, for plaintiff, testified: "I saw the gray mule with his leg broken. He was about 15½ or 15 hands high—a big mule. I don't know the market value of mules. I went to see the mules to take him out to my pasture, but he was too badly hurt to move."

The measure of damages for the injuries to these mules is the difference between their market value at Navasota at the time of delivery in the condition they were in and what would have been their market value at the same time and place in the condition in which they would have been if they had been transported without negligence on the part of appellant. This is the general rule, and it does not affect its application that the mules were to be kept for use and were not for sale. G. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Stanley, 89 Tex. 44, 33 S. W. 109; Ry. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 13 Sup. Ct. 444, 37 L. Ed. 292; Railway v. White, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 522, 80 S. W. 641; Railway v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 44 S. W. 9. The jury could not apply this rule without some evidence as to this market value. The evidence quoted above, which is all there is on the subject, was not sufficient to authorize the submission of this issue.

Upon the issue of damages for the loss of the two mules, the measure of damages was their market value at Navasota at the date of the delivery there. Appellees undertook to establish this by the testimony of appellee Gillespie and T. D. Williamson. After Gillespie had testified that the value of the mules was $200 each, and after the testimony had closed and plaintiff had concluded his opening argument to the jury, appellant moved the court to strike out Gillespie's testimony on the ground that he had not qualified himself to testify as to the market value of the mules in Navasota. This motion was refused, and appellant took a bill of exceptions, and complains of the ruling in the fifth assignment of error. The objection to the testimony came too late. It should have been made as soon as it developed that the witness was not qualified to speak. No excuse is shown for not making the objection more promptly. The assignment is overruled. Maverick v. Maury, 79 Tex. 441, 15 S. W. 686. This testimony authorized the submission of this issue to the jury, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial on the ground that there was no evidence of the market value of these two mules. This disposes of the second and third assignments of error.

The witness Williamson, for appellee, as to the value of the two mules, testified in chier that he knew the market value of the mules as described by plaintiff, in Navasota, and that their market value was $300 to $400. Upon cross-examination he then testified that he had not bought nor sold any mules in Navasota in 1905 or 1906; that he had not seen any mules sold there during that time, and was not advised as to the market quotations of mules at that time and place, and that the only knowledge of such value that he had was what one man had told him, who came out to where he lived to buy mules. Appellant promptly moved to strike out the testimony of the witness as to the market value of the mules, which the court refused to do, and allowed the testimony to go to the jury, to which appellant excepted. Clearly the witness showed that he had no knowledge of the matter about which he had testified, and the evidence ought to have been stricken out. The sixth assignment of error presenting the question must be sustained.

There being no other evidence as to the market value of the two mules, except that of appellee Gillespie, we cannot say that the testimony of Williamson was not prejudicial to appellant. It was no objection to Williamson's testimony that he had never seen these two mules. If he had been otherwise qualified to speak, he might have testified as to the market value of such mules as were described to him. It follows from what we have said that the measure of damages as to the injured mules was properly stated in the special charge requested by appellant and refused, the refusal of which is made the basis of the tenth assignment of error, and that the charge of the court on this point, as set out in the eighth assignment of error, was erroneous.

There was no error in the charge of the court in the particulars pointed out in the seventh assignment of error, which is overruled.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

Appeal from District Court, Matagorda County; Wells Thompson, Judge.

Action by J. H. Rainey against C. D. Kemp. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Holland & Krause, for appellant. Gaines & Corbett, for appellee.

REESE, J. J. H. Rainey sued C. D. Kemp in the district court to recover damages for the wrongful, unlawful, and malicious suing out by Kemp of a writ of attachment out of the justice court, under which his stock of merchandise was seized and detained by the officer and his place of business closed for about 35 days, and also for the wrongful and malicious suing out of an immediate execution out of the justice court upon a judgment in the same case, the writ of attachment having been quashed, and the seizure of his stock of merchandise thereunder. Damages, both actual and exemplary, were claimed in the aggregate sum of over $10,000. Upon trial with a jury there was a verdict for defendant, and from the judgment plaintiff appeals.

We are inclined to think that the constable, Showalter, should not have been allowed to testify, over the objection of appellant, that when he made the levy there was no more goods than sufficient to pay defendant's debt. The evidence was immaterial under the pleadings. The evidence, however, could not have influenced the verdict, and is not cause for reversal. We only pass upon it in view of another trial. The objection is presented in the first assignment of error. The same may be said with reference to the testimony of the same witness that he had no intention to injure appellant in making the levy, as set out in the second and third assignments. The constable's intentions or motives were matters of no concern. We call attention to what has been said by the Supreme Court in Ross v. Kornrumpf, 64 Tex. 395, 396, that in a case like the present, where each party had produced evidence sufficient to establish his side of the question upon this issue, "a feather's weight of illegal testimony must not be thrown into the scales to turn them in favor of either of the litigants."

There was no error in the admission in evidence of the report of R. G. Dun & Co. Mercantile Agency, to show appellant's commercial rating, under the facts of this case. Appellant had testified as to his rating in Dun's Agency, and the report was admissible to contradict him. The eighth and ninth assignments of error presenting the question are overruled.

The affidavit of attachment made by Browning as agent of appellee was admissible to show the grounds upon which the attachment was sued out. There was evidence which tended to show that it was upon this affidavit the attachment was predicated, and that, even if it was not made until after the writ of attachment issued and was levied, appellee pressed the attachment and secured a judgment foreclosing the same, which was afterwards set aside and the attachment quashed on the ground that it was issued and levied before the affidavit was made. Nevertheless, upon the issue of whether the attachment was sued out without probable cause, appellant had the right to show the falsity of the grounds stated in this affidavit, and that there was no probable cause to believe them true. In connection with this, he had a right to introduce the affidavit as showing the grounds upon which appellant was seeking the benefit of the attachment, and it was error to exclude the affidavit. The twelfth assignment of error presenting the question is sustained.

The giving of the special charge numbered 14, referred to in the twenty-second assignment, wherein the jury was instructed not to consider the declarations of Browning as to the extent of the authority given him by Kemp, was error. This was not a case of proof of agency by the declarations of the agent to a third person, but the testimony of the agent himself as to the extent of his agency, and was admissible, and entitled to consideration for that purpose. Browning testified positively that he was appellee's agent and authorized to make the affidavit in the protection of his interest, and this state-among the papers to which the name of appellee appears to have been signed by his wife, and that appellee ratified her acts by adopting the attachment and seeking to have the same foreclosed, it was error to give the special charge that Mrs. Kemp was not the agent of Kemp unless she was expressly authorized. We do not see how this could have prejudiced appellant. It would have rather tended to the conclusion that there was no valid bond given for the attachment.

As we view the case, the judgment of the justice court quashing the attachment on the ground that no affidavit nor bond was made before its issuance or levy was conclusive of that fact. Appellee accepted that judgment, and should not be heard now to question the facts upon which it was based. The court, however, submitted these issues to the jury, and no objection is made by appellant to the charge on this ground.

The court erred in that portion of its charge to the jury wherein they were instructed that the measure of damages was the difference between the reasonable cash market value of the goods at the time of the levy and the reasonable market cash value at the time the attachment was quashed, and 6 per cent. on said sum. The jury must have understood that in estimating the damages, if any, the 6 per cent. was to be computed upon the difference in value, and not upon the value, the true measure being legal interest upon the value of the goods during the time they were detained by the officer under the illegal process. Davidson v. Oberthier, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 337, 93 S. W. 478; Willis v. Whitsitt, 67 Tex. 673, 4 S. W. 253. Appellant requested an instruction upon this point which properly presented the law, but which was refused. It cannot be said that it must be concluded that the jury found against the appellant upon the issue of the wrongful or unlawful issuance of the attachment, and hence the error was harmless. The jury may have found that the attachment was wrongful, but that there was no deterioration in value of the goods, and hence no amount upon which interest was to be computed under the charge. If properly instructed on this point, they might have found for appellant, and allowed him interest at the legal rate on the value of the goods while detained, which, although an insignificant amount in itself, would have entitled appellant to recover also the costs. The thirteenth and fourteenth assignments of error on which this question is presented must be sustained. This also sufficiently disposes of the eighteenth assignment of error.

appellant on the issue of exemplary damages, that this error would not be ground for reversal.

It was error to give the charge requested by appellee wherein the jury was instructed that they might take into consideration, on the issue of appellant's right to recover exemplary damages, the statements made by Shelton, the act of appellant in attempting to sell his stock to O'Connell and others, and also his acts in delivering to the Houston Drug Company certain drugs in payment of his account, and in offering to turn over to his drug store creditors his stock of drugs in settlement of his accounts. In this requested charge appellee collated about all of his evidence interposed as a defense to the claim for exemplary damages, and endeavored to direct the attention of the jury thereto in a most emphatic manner. This could not but have had the effect of impressing the jury with the court's view of the importance and weight of this testimony, and was calculated to be very prejudicial to appellant. Dupree v. T. & P. Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 96 S. W. 647.

The jury should not have been instructed, as was done in special charge given at the request of appellee, as to the effect upon the liability of appellee for exemplary damages of his having acted upon the advice of counsel, without coupling with the same the condition that he had in good faith made a full and free disclosure of all the facts within his knowledge. If appellee had disclosed to his attorneys that his information came from Shelton alone, and also the reputation of his informant, as testified by himself, it can hardly be supposed that he would have been advised to act upon this alone.

We are inclined to think that the errors indicated entitled appellant to a new trial, and that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Travis County Court; John W. Hornsby, Judge.

Action by R. J. Brackenridge against H. W. Stroter and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to the mentioned defendant, and reversed and rendered as to the feme defendant.

See, also, 118 S. W. 634.

D. W. Doom and D. H. Doom, for appellants. N. A. Rector, for appellee.

KEY, J. R. J. Brackenridge brought this suit against H. W. Stroter and his wife, Minnie Stroter, seeking to recover upon a written obligation for $160, with interest and attorney's fees. The case originated in a justice of the peace court, but was appealed to and finally tried in the county court. H. W. Stroter seems to have made no defense, but Mrs. Stroter pleaded her coverture as a defense. The plaintiff sought to hold Mrs. Stroter liable upon the theory that the contract was for the benefit of her separate property. The county court sustained that contention and rendered judgment against both defendants, authorizing execution to be levied upon either community property of the defendants or separate property of Mrs. Stroter. The defendants have appealed and present the case in this court upon several assignments of error, all of which relate to the liability of Mrs. Stroter.

The undisputed testimony shows that a tract of land was conveyed to Mrs. Stroter for a recited consideration of $500 in cash and a vendor's lien note for $300, signed by Mrs. Stroter and her husband. The deed also recites that the property is conveyed to Mrs. Stroter as her separate estate, but it does not show that the cash consideration paid was her separate property. Thereafter the plaintiff, Brackenridge, loaned Stroter and his wife $100, and received from them a written contract, the pertinent terms of which are as follows:

"(1) That the said R. J. Brackenridge, party of the first part, agrees, at the request of the said parties of the second part, to furnish them, at their fair cash value, the labor and materials necessary to be used in constructing the following improvements, viz.: A three-strand wire fence on the south line of a 165-acre tract with posts at the intervals of a rod (16½ feet) apart, the corner posts to be well braced, on the homestead of said parties of the second part, consisting of 165 acres, situated in the county of Travis, in the state of Texas, and more particularly described as follows: Known as the Henkel's tract of land a part of the Wilkinson Sparks one quarter league situated on the west side of the Colorado river about three miles from the city of Austin. (2) That the said H. W. Stroter and his wife Minnie Stroter, parties of the second part, in consideration of said labor and materials being so furnished, agree to pay the reasonable cash value of the labor and materials so used in constructing said improvements on their said homestead, amount to ($160) one hundred and sixty dollars, to the said party of the first part, on or before the 21st day of June, A. D. 1903, at Austin, in Travis county, Texas, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from date until paid; and if an attorney is employed to collect the same, after maturity, an additional ten per cent. on the amount to be collected for attorney's fees; and the said party of the first part is hereby declared to have a mechanic's lien on the improvements so made and the said one hundred and sixty-five acres upon which the same are situated, to secure the payment of the money to become due for said labor and materials, as herein specified; and the said parties of the second part hereby agree to keep, at their own expense, the said improvements insured against fire, for the benefit of said party of the first part, as his interest may appear, and upon their failure so to do said party of the first part may so insure said improvements, the expense of such insurance to be and become a part of the indebtedness secured by the mechanic's lien aforesaid. Witness our hands, this the day and year first above written. [Signed] H. W. Stroter. Minnie Stroter.

"$160. Received, Austin, Texas, June 21, 1902, of R. J. Brackenridge for labor and materials used in constructing improvements in accordance with the foregoing contract, amounting to one hundred and sixty dollars, in consideration of which we, or either of us, promise to pay to R. J. Brackenridge or order, on or before the ——— day of June, A. D. 1903, at Austin, in Travis county, Texas, the sum of one hundred and sixty dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of ——— per cent. per annum from date until paid; and if an attorney is employed to collect the same after maturity, an additional ten per cent. on the amount to be collected for attorney's fees; and to secure the payment of which the said R. J. Brackenridge is hereby declared to have a mechanic's lien on our homestead, as prescribed and provided for in the foregoing contract, until paid. [Signed] H. W. Stroter. Minnie Stroter."

The land referred to in the contract is the same land that was conveyed to Mrs. Stroter by the deed above referred to. Thereafter the plaintiff, Brackenridge, bought the vendor's lien note referred to in that deed, pro-in the contract were not made. The plaintiff testified that when he let H. W. Stroter have the $160, which he loaned him, Stroter said that he intended to use it to make the improvements referred to in the contract, and that such improvements were necessary to protect the property. It was also shown that Mrs. Stroter was not present on the occasion referred to, and she objected to the plaintiff's testifying as to what her husband had said in reference to the matter. It was shown that Mrs. Stroter was a married woman at the time that the land was conveyed to her and at the time of the making of the contract upon which the suit was brought and continuously since then.

Without deciding other questions presented, we sustain appellants' fourth proposition under the second and third assignments of error, to the effect that the money loaned by the plaintiff to the defendants was not used for the improvement or benefit of the land referred to in the contract, or of any other separate property of Mrs. Stroter. The power of a married woman to bind herself by contract is regulated by article 2970 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, which reads: "The wife may contract debts for necessities furnished herself or children, and for all expenses which may have been incurred by the wife for the benefit of her separate property, and for such debts suit may be brought in the manner prescribed in article 1201." It is not pretended in this case that the contract was for necessities for Mrs. Stroter or her children; and it is clear, we think, that she is not liable under the remaining portion of the statute, because the proof fails to show that any expense was incurred for the improvement of the property alleged by the plaintiff to be the separate estate of Mrs. Stroter. In order to hold a married woman liable upon a contract under the latter clause of the statute, it must be shown that some improvement has been made upon or labor furnished for the purpose of utilizing her separate property. If it be conceded that the land referred to in the contract was Mrs. Stroter's separate property, the proof entirely fails to show that any improvement was made thereon by the plaintiff, or anything done by him which resulted in a benefit to that property. The most that can be said in behalf of the plaintiff is that he loaned the defendants $160, and that Mr. Stroter, in the absence of Mrs. Stroter, promised to use the money for the benefit of her separate estate and failed to keep that promise. Such state of facts falls short of bringing the case within the purview of article 2970.

Affirmed in part, and in part reversed and rendered.

STROTER et al. v. BRACKENRIDGE.

(Supreme Court of Texas. March 31, 1909.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 138*)—CONTRACTS FOR BENEFIT OF WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE.

To render a wife personally liable for money lent, under Rev. St. 1895, art. 2970, providing that a wife may contract debts for all expenses incurred by her for the benefit of her separate property, she must herself have contracted the debt for which suit is brought, and her husband as such cannot bind her personally for debts contracted by him, though for the benefit of her separate estate.

Certified Question from Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Action by R. J. Brackenridge against H. W. Stroter and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals (118 S. W. 632). On certified question.

D. W. Doom and D. H. Doom, for appellants. N. A. Rector, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This is a certified question from the Court of Civil Appeals of the Third Supreme Judicial District. The statement and question are as follows:

"As shown by copy of opinion hereto attached, this court has heretofore reversed and rendered this case, holding that the appellant Mrs. Stroter was not bound by the written contract signed by her, because of the fact that she was a married woman when she signed the same. Our opinion sets up all the material facts, except that it fails to show, as does the record, that the fence referred to in the contract was a reasonable and proper improvement upon the land. In the opinion referred to it was not our intention to say that Mrs. Stroter or Brackenridge had no notice of the purpose for which the money was borrowed. However, the record shows that the former had such notice only as was disclosed by the written contract. The case is now pending in this court on motion for rehearing. In considering that motion we have agreed to and do hold that the land referred to in the contract was, at the time the contract was made, the separate property of Mrs. Stroter. The other question, and the one upon which this court decided the case, is material and, as the case is not appealable to the Supreme Court, and the question referred to is one of practical importance, we have decided to certify it for decision.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"With the foregoing statement and explanation, the Court of Civil Appeals certifies to the Supreme Court for decision the specific question: Did this court rule correctly in holding that the facts set out in our opinion, with the additional facts herein stated, fall to bring the case within the purview of article 2970 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 of this state, and therefore that Mrs. Stroter could not be held liable upon the contract referred to?"

The warrant for Mrs. Stroter's personal liability must be found in the following article of the Revised Statutes of 1895: "Art. 2970. The wife may contract debts for necessities furnished herself or children, and for all expenses which may have been incurred by the wife for the benefit of her separate property, and for such debts suit may be brought in the manner prescribed in article 1201." To render Mrs. Stroter personally liable, she must have contracted the debt for which the suit is brought for the benefit of her separate property. The husband as such cannot bind her personally for debts contracted by him even for the benefit of her separate estate. If he be authorized by her to make such contract so as to become her agent, then she might be bound for the debt so contracted. Magee v. White, 23 Tex. 189; Sorrell v. Clayton, 42 Tex. 188. Mrs. Stroter joined in the contract, which was made in writing with Brackenridge, by which the latter was to furnish "at their fair cash value the labor and materials necessary to be used in constructing the following improvements:" Here follows a description of the fence which was to be built around the tract of land, the separate property of the wife. Mrs. Stroter and her husband also signed a paper in the form of a receipt and note by which the receipt of $160 was acknowledged which was to be applied to the making of a fence around the land. It contained a promise to repay the money and also gave a lien upon the homestead of Stroter and his wife. Brackenridge's testimony shows that he agreed to lend $160 to Stroter, who promised him that he would place the improvements upon the land and pay for them with the money furnished by Brackenridge. Mrs. Stroter was not present when this transaction occurred, and it is not shown by the evidence that she knew anything of such an agreement on the part of her husband, except what appears in the papers. In closing up the opinion in this case, the Court of Civil Appeals uses this language: "The most that can be said in behalf of the plaintiff (Brackenridge) is that he loaned the defendants $160, and that Stroter, in the absence of his wife, promised to use the money for the benefit of her separate estate and failed to keep that promise. Such state of facts falls short of bringing the case within the purview of article 2970."

We are of opinion that the Court of Civil Appeals reached the right conclusion in this case from the facts as presented, and that that court did not err in reversing and rendering the judgment herein.

GRIFFIN v. TUCKER, County Attorney.

(Supreme Court of Texas. April 28, 1909.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 36*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—DECLARATION OF RESULT.

It being the duty of the commissioners' court, under the statute, to simply count the votes cast at a local option election and declare the result of such count, the part of its order declaring the election void is ineffectual, and the part declaring that, if such court has no power to declare the election void then it declares its result to be against prohibition, is a sufficient performance of its duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 30*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—COMMISSIONERS' AND JUSTICES' PRECINCTS.

Even if, under Const. art. 16, § 20, requiring the Legislature to enact a law whereby the voters of a county, justice's precinct, town, city, or such subdivision of a county as may be designated by the commissioners' court, may determine whether sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited within the prescribed limits, the commissioners' court may not, for the mere purpose of a local option election, combine several subdivisions of a county having no connection for any other purpose, yet it may order an election in a commissioners' precinct, having lawful existence for other purposes, though such precinct contain several justices' precincts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 30*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION—"FROM TIME TO TIME."

The words "from time to time," in Const. art. 16, § 20, providing that the Legislature shall enact a law whereby the voters of a county, justice's precinct, town, city, or such subdivision of a county as may be designated by the commissioners' court may determine "from time to time" whether the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited "within the prescribed limits," do not prevent the Legislature from authorizing such an election in a subdivision of the county in part of which local option is in force, and in part of which it is not in force.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 31*)—LOCAL OPTION—SUCCESSIVE ELECTIONS—COMMISSIONERS' AND JUSTICES' PRECINCTS.

Under Rev. St. 1895, art. 3384, as amended by Laws 1897, c. 235, c. 162, authorizing the commissioners' courts to order local option elections in counties, commissioners' precincts, justices' precincts, towns, and cities "whenever" the courts may deem it expedient, and requiring them to order such elections "when" petitioned as prescribed, such an election may be held in a commissioners' precinct whenever ordered, though local option is in force in a justice's precinct forming part of it, and not in the rest of it; it not being inhibited by article 3393, as amended by Laws 1905, p. 378, c. 158, providing that, after an election has been held as directed, no other shall be held within two years

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 40*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTIONS—COMMISSIONERS' AND JUSTICES' PRECINCTS.

Where a local option election, resulting in the declaring of prohibition, has been had in a justice's precinct, a subsequent election in a commissioners' precinct, embracing the justice's precinct, resulting in a declaration against prohibition, will not affect the status as to prohibition in the justice's precinct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 34*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—BALLOTS.

In a local option election, ballots reading "For Local Option" and "Against Local Option" are not to be counted, but only those reading "For Prohibition" and "Against Prohibition."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

7. COURTS (§ 89*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

As far as statutes affect a contest of a local option election, the Supreme Court will put its own construction on them, and not follow that of the Court of Criminal Appeals.

Certified Questions from Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Proceeding by J. W. Griffin against H. B. Tucker, county attorney, to contest an election as to sale of intoxicating liquors. The decision was against Griffin, and he appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which certifies questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

Marshall & Marshall, for appellant. George J. Clough, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. Certified questions from the Court of Civil Appeals for the First District as follows:

"Because our conclusions of law in the above-styled cause pending in this court on motion for rehearing are apparently in conflict with the opinions of the Court of Criminal Appeals in the cases of Ex parte Heyman, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 532, 78 S. W. 349, Ex parte Mills, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 224, 79 S. W. 555, and Ex parte Randall, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 519, 98 S. W. 870, and because of the importance to the public of a correct determination of the questions presented, we think it proper to certify for your decision the questions hereinafter propounded. This proceeding was instituted by appellant to contest the declared result of an election held in commissioners' precinct No. 3 of Liberty county on July 27, 1907, to determine whether intoxicating liquor should be sold in said precinct. Said commissioner's precinct No. 3 is composed of justices' precincts Nos. 3 and 6. At the election to determine the question of whether intoxicating liquor should be sold therein had been held in either of said precincts within two years preceding the order for said election in commissioners' precinct No. 3. The ballots used at this election were ordered by the county judge of Liberty county, and sent by him to the election officers at the several voting boxes in said precinct, and were furnished the voters by said officers as provided in the general election law. These ballots had printed thereon the following: 'For Local Option' and 'Against Local Option.' No other ballots were used at said election, but a number of the voters erased the words 'For Local Option' and 'Against Local Option,' and wrote thereon 'For Prohibition' or 'Against Prohibition,' in accordance with their views upon the question submitted in the call for the election. Many of the voters, however, used the ballots as printed and voted 'For Local Option' or 'Against Local Option.' If all of the ballots are counted, those reading 'For Local Option' and 'For Prohibition' exceed in number those reading 'Against Local Option' and 'Against Prohibition.' The number of ballots 'Against Prohibition' exceeds the number 'For Prohibition.'

"The commissioners' court at a meeting held on August 7th for the purpose of opening the returns, counting the votes and declaring the result of said election, made the following order: 'Commissioners' court met in special session August 7, 1907, for the purpose of opening the polls and counting the votes of a local option election, or an election to determine whether the sale of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited in commissioners' precinct No. 3, Liberty county, Tex., said election being held on the 27th day of July, 1907. Commissioners present were: (naming them.) After opening the polls, counting the votes, and thoroughly canvassing the returns, it is ordered that inasmuch as this court is unable, by reason of irregularities in the ballots and returns, to determine the true expression of the voters in said election, that said election be and the same is hereby declared void and of no effect and that this court declare neither "For Prohibition" nor "Against Prohibition." To this order I. B. Simmons, county judge, very respectfully protests. It is further ordered in the alternative that in case the above order cannot be made effective because of lack of power or jurisdiction in this court to declare said election void that the result of said election be and the same is hereby declared "Against Prohibition."

"Upon a hearing of appellant's contest the court below held that the election was void

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

we respectfully certify for your decision the following questions:

"(1) Is the order of the commissioners' court above set out a sufficient declaration of the result of said election to authorize the district court to entertain a proceeding brought to contest same under the provisions of the statute relating to election contests?"

"If this question is answered in the affirmative, we ask:

"(2) Did the commissioners have authority to order a local option election for said commissioners' precinct?"

"If this question be answered in the affirmative, then we ask:

"(3) Was the use of the ballots above described such an irregularity as requires or authorizes the holding that the election was void and ordering a new election as provided by article 3397, Sayles' Statutes?"

"If the third question be answered in the negative, then we ask:

"(4) Should the ballots reading 'For Local Option' and those reading 'Against Local Option' be counted?"

From the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals accompanying the certificate it appears that all the questions have been decided by that court—the first three in the affirmative and the fourth in the negative. Nothing is said in the opinion upon the first question, but the affirmative decision of it was necessarily involved in the action taken by the court. We are of the opinion that all of the questions were rightly decided, and we deem it unnecessary to say more except upon the first and second. As to the first, it needs only to be said that the statute does not intrust to the commissioners' court the power to set aside an election. It is made the duty of that court simply to count the votes, and declare the result of such count, which the court in this instance did. The part of the order declaring the election to be void must be treated as ineffectual, and its declaration of the result of the count must be taken as the performance of its statutory duty.

The answer to the second question involves a review of the decisions of the Court of Criminal Appeals, respect for which, as well as the importance of the question itself, demands more extended discussion. It seems to be contended in this case upon the authority of two propositions affirmed in the decisions of the Court of Criminal Appeals that the holding of the election in the commissioners' precinct composed, as it was, of the two judges' precincts, was unauthorized and void. The first of these propositions is laid down in Ex parte Heyman, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 532, 78 S. W. 349, and Ex parte Mills, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 224, 79 S. W. 555, referred together two or more justices' precincts, and that the statute attempting to give to the commissioners' court authority so to compose local option districts is unconstitutional. But the reason given by the court for this holding is that the reference in the constitutional provision to such subdivisions of a county as might be "designated" by the commissioners' court under legislative authority is to political subdivisions existing for other purposes, and not to new ones to be created by the court for local option purposes alone. The reasoning does not apply to commissioners' precincts, although they may be composed of part or all of the territory also embraced within two or more justices' precincts. Commissioners' precincts have lawful existence apart from any designation that may be made of them as local option districts, and consistently with the decisions referred to may be "designated" for such elections. A provision of the statute expressly authorizes such designation, and its validity is unaffected by those decisions. Hence it cannot be admitted that a local option election in a commissioner's precinct is excluded by the mere fact that it contains two or more justices' precincts. No question as to the correctness of the doctrine above stated is presented by the facts of this case. But there is another doctrine laid down in the case of Ex parte Randall, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 519, 98 S. W. 870, and perhaps in the others just cited, which, if correct, condemns as unlawful the election now in question. That doctrine is that no valid election can be held in any subdivision of a county unless at the time it is ordered the status of all the territory which it contains is the same in respect of the operation of the prohibitory law; that, if that law is in force in part and not in force in other parts of the territory so contained, no election can be held in the containing subdivision until that law has been repealed by the voters in that part in which it has been put in force. The situation to which this doctrine applies existed in this case when the election was held and the question as to the validity of that election cannot be determined without affirming or denying the proposition stated. The opinions of the majority of the court in the cases referred to (from which Mr. Justice Brooks dissented) seem to rest both upon the constitutional provision (article 16, § 20) and upon the statute. It is necessary, therefore, that we consider both.

The constitutional provision is as follows: "The Legislature shall at its first session enact a law whereby the qualified voters of any county, justice's precinct, town, city (or such subdivision of a county as may be designated by the commissioners' court of

we deem it best to condense rather than copy them. Article 3384, Rev. St. 1895, as amended by Laws 1897, p. 235, c. 162, authorizes the commissioners' courts to order elections in counties, commissioners' precincts, justices' precincts, school districts, towns, and cities, whenever the courts may deem it expedient, and requires them to order such elections when petitioned as prescribed. It further provides (1) an election shall not be denied to a city, town, or school district composed of two or more of the named subdivisions; (2) that no town or city shall be divided in holding an election in another subdivision; and (3) that no school district which has adopted local option shall be divided in a subsequent election for another subdivision, covering a part of its territory. The last three provisions have no application to the present question. Article 3393 as amended in 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 378, c. 158) provides that, after an election has been held as directed, no other shall be held within two years "within the same prescribed limits," but that after that time the commissioners' court may, when deemed expedient, and shall when petitioned as provided, order another election for the county, justice's precinct, or such subdivision of a county as may be designated by the court for the same purpose; that the election shall be ordered to be held, notice given, votes returned and counted, result declared and published, in all respects as provided for the first election; and that the proceedings, if prohibition be carried, shall have the same force and effect and the same conclusiveness as are given to them in case of the first election. By article 3394 it is provided that, when "such second election" results against prohibition, an order shall be entered setting aside the previous one enforcing prohibition, and an official announcement and publication shall be made. Article 3395 prescribes these rules: (1) Failure to carry prohibition in a county shall not prevent an immediate election in a justice's precinct, designated subdivision of the county, town, or city. (2) Failure to carry in a town or city shall not prevent an election in the entire justice's precinct or county in which the town or city is situated. (3) The holding of an election in a justice's precinct shall not prevent an election in the county. (4) Where prohibition is carried for the entire county, no election can thereafter be held in any justice's precinct, town, or city of the county until after prohibition has been defeated in the county. (5) Where prohibition has carried in a justice's precinct, no election can be had in a town or city therein until after prohibition has been defeated in the precinct.

ed for that division "within the prescribed limits." No right is given to the voters of one subdivision to determine the question for another subdivision, or to limit the power of the voters in the other to determine the question "within its prescribed limits." The exercise of the right by one is not made dependent upon any decision which may have been made by another. But a county is cut up into precincts, districts, or other subdivisions for various purposes, and the same territory must, therefore, form all or a part of more than one of these. If the right be given to each to adopt or reject the prohibitory law as its voters may determine, how is the right of one to be made to consist with that of another? The Constitution contains no provision which answers the question, and it follows that the regulation of the subject is left to the Legislature. The Constitution, it is true, says that the law is so to provide that the voters may determine the question "from time to time," and this is what the Court of Criminal Appeals regarded as bearing upon the proposition under consideration; but we can see nothing in the provision which affects the plenary powers of the Legislature to regulate the holding of elections in different subdivisions. It implies that the determination of the question of prohibition in a county or a subdivision once made is not to be perpetually binding, and that provision shall be made whereby the voters therein shall have opportunity to vote upon it from time to time; but it prescribes no rule from which the effect of an election in one subdivision upon the right of the voters in another is to be determined. The framing of the law so that the right intended to be secured to the voters in the localities may be exercised is expressly committed to the Legislature, and we must look to the statutes in order to determine as to the validity of such elections as that in question.

Article 3384, before stated, provides for elections in counties, commissioners' precincts, justices' precincts, towns and cities. Provisions have been made by statute for other divisions, but these have been held to be unconstitutional by the Court of Criminal Appeals under the doctrine first above stated. We confine our attention to those divisions just mentioned to avoid complicating the discussion with other questions not involved in the case before us. The commissioners' court is empowered whenever it may deem it expedient, and is required when petitioned in the manner provided, to order an election in any one of these divisions. The power or the duty here defined to order an election in one is not limited by the fact that an election has already been held in another, whether the other be a constituent part of the one or not. The court may act whenever it deems it expedient, and must act when petition is made in accordance with the provision. The courts are not authorized to put any limitation upon this provision unless it is expressed or clearly implied in some other part of the statute. It follows that an election may be held in a commissioners' precinct whenever ordered, unless there is something further in the statute to forbid. Perhaps the opinions of the majority of the Court of Criminal Appeals are founded principally on the provision of article 3393, which forbids a second election "within the same prescribed limits" in less than two years after a first has been held. It is in the assumption that this means that no election can be held in any subdivision which embraces another or part of another in which one has been held within two years that we believe the fallacy to exist. We think it clear from the language of the statute that it has no such meaning. The inhibition is against a second election "within the same prescribed limits"—i. e., the limits of the subdivision in which the first was held—and not within the different limits of another subdivision. Articles 3393 and 3394, dealing with second elections, refer all the time to elections in the same subdivision, and are intended to prescribe the conditions under which the voters may exercise the right to determine from time to time what shall be the rule therein. They prescribe no rule as to the effect of such elections upon the right given by article 3384 to the voters of other subdivisions to have elections within their limits. Besides that, the inhibition is only against an election within the same limits. The concluding provision of article 3393 gives to the second election, if prohibition has carried, only the same effect that was given to the first—that is, to establish the prohibition only in the same limits; while article 3394 makes a negative vote have only the effect of setting aside the order enforcing prohibition entered as the result of the first election. And no other effect is given to any election by these provisions. All this makes it clear to our minds that the inhibition against another election has reference only to those subdivisions wherein a first election has been held, and not to other and different ones. And it follows that there is in these articles no limitation upon the broad authority given by article 3384 for elections in commissioners' precincts whenever the prescribed conditions concur, resulting merely from the fact that an election has been held within two years in a part of the territory composing such precincts. Article 3395 does prescribe rules as to the consequences of elections in some of the subdivisions upon the right to hold them in other ers, but contains nothing which militates against our views. The fact that it is not exhaustive and prescribes no rule such as is made with reference to the county as to the effect of an election in a subdivision partly composing a larger one (and this is the most that can be claimed for it) is probably due to the fact that it has not been amended as often as article 3384 and adjusted to the changes made in that article defining the different subdivisions which may be made local option districts. In the Randall Case it is said that the articles discussed do not authorize such elections as that in question, and it is true that article 3395 does not confer the authority. It is equally true that it does not deny or limit the authority as it is given without qualification in article 3384.

It is further argued, in effect, that the Constitution and the statute intends that the voters of each subdivision shall have the right to determine by their votes what the rule therein shall be; that, when once established, the rule cannot be repealed but by the votes in the same territory; and that, when an election has been held in a subdivision, it is set apart as a local option district, and cannot be used as part of the territory of any other such district less than the county. At least, this is our understanding of the theory. It is true that, when the prohibitory rule is put in force, it cannot be repealed or displaced except by the vote of the district which adopted it. It is quite as true that an election, however resulting, in a larger including subdivision has no such effect. If it result in the defeat of prohibition, the rule remains unaffected in the territory that had before adopted it. If it result in the adoption of prohibition, that rule is extended to the whole, where before it was in force only, in a part, of the territory. If the included territory has rejected prohibition, it is still the right, given by article 3384, of the voters of any lawful including subdivision to say whether or not the law shall be put in force therein, which means that the law shall be made to operate over every foot of the territory in which the election is held. So there is no conflict of rights. The theory that an election sets apart the district in which it has been held so that it can form no part of a larger district for election purposes or some other by which too frequent elections and some incidental confusion would have been avoided might have been a good one for the Legislature to have acted upon in devising a system; but we cannot see from the statutes that it has done so. The right of each subdivision is given by article 3384 in the same language, and this is inconsistent with the theory stated. In the right given to a subdivision is implied the power by adopting prohibition to put a rule in force whereby the sale of liquor shall be made unlawful in every foot of its territory, and from this it results that no part of that territory can make the sale lawful in such part, since that would be inconsistent with the power of the larger so to establish the law throughout its extent. And this is not allowed to affect the right of an included subdivision to adopt the law for itself when it has been rejected by the including one. Aaron v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 103, 29 S. W. 267. But we see nothing in the statute or the Constitution by force of which the right of a subdivision to have an election throughout its extent may be taken away by the action of part of its territory constituting a smaller one. If this may be done, it is apparent that it is in the power of smaller subdivisions included in larger ones to defeat the exercise of the right given to the latter, as may readily be shown by illustration. In some counties the commissioners' precincts are so laid off that their lines come to a common corner at the county seats, so that part of each is included in the county town and in the justice's precinct. These are made subdivisions for local option purposes, and are given the right to adopt or reject the law within their limits. Now, is it not apparent that, under this doctrine, the vote adopting the law in either of these included subdivisions destroys for the time at least the rights of the voters of each of the commissioners' precincts to hold any election to determine the question for itself? The illustration might be extended by supposing other modes of subdividing the county. And, further, the same logic might make the vote of the towns exclude elections in justices' precincts. We discover nothing in the Constitution or the statute either declaring or implying such a rule.

Much more might be said upon the question, but we have sufficiently indicated the reasons which induce us reluctantly to disagree with the views of the majority of the Court of Criminal Appeals. The subject has been ably discussed in the opinions of Judge Hurt in Aaron v. State, supra, Ex parte Brown, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 443, 34 S. W. 131, and Ex parte Fields, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 50, 46 S. W. 1127, in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brooks in the Heyman Case, and in the opinions of the Courts of Civil Appeals in the cases of Kimberley v. Morris, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 592, 31 S. W. 809, and Kidd v. Truett, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 618, 68 S. W. 310, and in the present case.

Ordinarily this court follows the construction given to penal statutes by the Court of Criminal Appeals, since the enforcement of such statutes must be in accordance with such construction; but the decision of questions coming within the scope of cases of contested elections is intrusted to the civil courts, and must be in accordance with their own construction of the controlling constitutional and statutory provisions.

BLAKE v. THIRD NAT. BANK OF ST. LOUIS.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. April 13, 1909.
Rehearing Denied May 1, 1909.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 181*)—PAYMENT OF INDIVIDUAL DEBT WITH PARTNERSHIP ASSETS.

A partner cannot apply assets of the firm to his individual debt, and the creditor acquires no title as against the firm, irrespective of whether he knows it is its property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 102*)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

The manager of a private bank conducted by a partnership is without authority to bind it by the payment of the individual debt of a partner out of firm assets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 181*)—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PERSONS—PAYMENT OF INDIVIDUAL DEBT OUT OF FIRM ASSETS.

A note was executed to a member of a firm of private bankers, individually, who so indorsed it, and was then sent to another bank, with a letter stating that the maker wanted more money than such banking firm could spare, and asking that the bank handle the note and pass the amount to the credit of the banking firm, which would guarantee the note. The bank to which the note was sent placed the amount to the credit of the banking firm, which gave a like credit to the maker of the note. Subsequently the manager of the private bank and the partner who had indorsed such note issued a new note in discharge thereof, without the knowledge of the other partner, in the name of such firm, and it was paid out of assets of the firm. Held, that the liability on the original note was that of the individual partner who indorsed it, and not of the banking firm, and that the payment of the note in discharge thereof out of the firm assets was a fraud upon the firm, rendering the other bank liable to return the amount received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 157*)—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PERSONS—RATIFICATION.

A partner who has given the firm's note to pay his individual debt cannot alone ratify it so as to make it binding on the firm.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 282; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 157*)—ACTS OF PARTNER—RATIFICATION—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

The manager of a private bank conducted by a partnership cannot ratify a note given by a partner in the firm name to pay his individual debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 282; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

6. BANKRUPTCY (§ 304*)—PARTNERSHIP—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PERSONS—PAYMENT OF INDIVIDUAL DEBT WITH FIRM ASSETS—TRUSTEES—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

A note was executed to a member of a firm of private bankers, individually, who so indorsed it, and was then sent to another bank, with a letter requesting the latter bank to favor the firm by cashing the note and passing the amount to the firm's credit, and that as collateral it might hold another note then in its possession. The bank to which the note was sent credited the firm with the amount thereof, and it gave a like credit to the makers of the note. Subsequently the manager of the bank and the partner who had indorsed the note issued a new note in discharge thereof, without the knowledge of the other partner, in the name of such firm, and it was paid out of assets of the firm. Held, that the fact that the partner alone was the indorser and not the banking firm, coupled with the issuance of the new note when the bank knew that the other partner was not present, was sufficient to take the right to recover the amount paid in satisfaction of the note to the jury or to the court sitting as a jury, as having been a payment of the individual debt of the partner out of firm assets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 463; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

Burgess and Lamm, JJ., dissenting.

In Banc. Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Matt G. Reynolds, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Daniel F. Blake, trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of George Y. Salmon and another, copartners, against the Third National Bank of St. Louis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

I. P. Ryland, Edward C. Crow, and Mann & Daniel, for appellant. Lyon & Swarts, for appellee.

GRAVES, J. For a long time prior to May 5, 1903, and on said date, there was in Clinton, Mo., a copartnership composed of G. Y. Salmon and H. W. Salmon, engaged in the banking business as private bankers, under the firm name of Salmon & Salmon. At all the dates of the transactions involved in this suit Thomas M. Casey was the man in charge and manager of the banking business of the said Salmon & Salmon. For a long time prior to May 5, 1903, and thereafter up to October 20, 1903, there existed a copartnership, composed of G. M. Casey and W. A. Towers, under the firm name of Casey & Towers, which said firm was engaged in the cattle business. June 28, 1905, the banking business of the said firm of Salmon & Salmon was placed in the hands of a receiver by the state court. On the same date proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted in the United States District Court at Kansas City, and later an adjudication of bankruptcy followed, and the plaintiff, Daniel F. Blake, was made trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Salmon & Salmon, and all property, books, and papers were turned over to him by the receiver of the state court. The plaintiff in this action, as trustee as aforesaid, instituted suit against defendant to recover more than $40,000 as for money had and received. The petition is in 34 counts, but as all are practically identical, save as to amount and dates, one count thereof will fairly state the petition. Count No. 30 reads: "And for still other and further cause of action against defendant, plaintiff states that defendant is indebted to plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of George Y. Salmon and Harvey W. Salmon, partners as Salmon & Salmon, in the sum of five thousand dollars, on account of money had and received from said banking firm of Salmon & Salmon by defendant, on the 23d day of September, 1904, to the use of said banking firm of Salmon & Salmon, which sum of money defendant agreed to repay to Salmon & Salmon. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendant in the sum of $5,000, together with interest and costs." Defendant, after having unsuccessfully demurred to the petition, and after having unsuccessfully moved to make said petition more definite and certain, answered by way of general denial, with an admission of its corporate existence. Trial was had before the court without the intervention of a jury, and the court, upon the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, gave a declaration of law, in the nature of a demurrer to the testimony, as to each count, except Nos. 1, 2, 14, 16, 17, 18, 25, 26, 27, and 28, which were dismissed by plaintiff. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and from this judgment, after an unsuccessful motion for new trial, the plaintiff appeals to this court.

The evidence in the record is short, and in substance shows the following: On May 5, 1903, Casey & Towers executed and delivered to G. Y. Salmon the following note:

"Clinton, Mo., May 5th, 1903.

"On demand after date we promise to pay to the order of G. Y. Salmon ten thousand & no-100 dollars for value received, and payable at the banking house of Salmon & Salmon, Clinton, Mo., with interest from date at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; and if interest be not paid annually to become as principal and bear the same rate of interest.

"$10,000.00. Casey & Towers.

"P. O. ——— G. M. Casey.

"Due. ——— W. A. Towers."

Indorsed as follows:

"Demand, protest and notice waived.

"G. Y. Salmon."

On the same day, the following letter was addressed to G. W. Galbreath, the cashier of defendant, at St. Louis, Mo.:

"Dear Sir: We enclose herewith note $10,000.00 Casey & Towers, et al, endorsed by our G. Y. Salmon, with the request that you please favor us by cashing same and passing to our credit the amount thereof. As collateral thereto you can hold the $20,000.00 real estate note now in your possession. Note is made on demand for the reason that parties expect to pay same soon.

"Yours very truly,

"Salmon & Salmon. C."

The evidence shows that the note was indorsed by G. Y. Salmon, the payee, and the proceeds were credited to Salmon & Salmon on the books of defendant, and that, upon receiving notice of this credit, Salmon & Salmon gave Casey & Towers credit on their books for a like amount.

On September 12, 1903, Casey & Towers made another note to G. Y. Salmon, as follows:

"No. ———.

"Clinton, Mo., Sept. 12th, 1903.

"On demand after due we promise to pay on the order of G. Y. Salmon twenty thousand & no-100 dollars, for value received, and payable at the banking house of Salmon & Salmon, Clinton, Mo., with interest from date at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; and if interest be not paid annually to become as principal and bear the same rate of interest.

"$20,000.00.

Casey & Towers.

"P. O. ———,

G. M. Casey.

"Due. ———,

W. A. Towers."

Indorsed on back as follows:

"Demand, protest and notice waived.

"G. Y. Salmon."

This note, so indorsed, was sent to Mr. Galbreath in St. Louis, Mo., with the following letter of date September 12, 1903:

"Dear Sir: Enclosed herewith we send you demand note of Casey & Towers, G. M. Casey and W. A. Towers for $20,000.00, endorsed by our G. Y. Salmon, which we ask you to please handle and pass the amount thereof to our credit. Casey & Towers are shipping into their farm in this county a large lot of steers to sell to feeders, and in so doing are drawing on us for more than we can carry them for. And hence we ask that you please handle this note as a special favor to us. It will only run for a short time, as they are going to sell the steers right away, and out of the proceeds thereof take up this note. If you will kindly handle some for us, we hereby guarantee that during the time you carry it our credit balance with you shall not fall below $25,000.00, and that it shall be kept up to at least that amount as security for the payment of said note, and if it should fall below, or even fall to $25,000.00, you are at liberty to charge our account with this note, and this letter shall be your authority for so doing.

"Yours very truly,

"Salmon & Salmon. C."

The proceeds of this note was likewise placed to the credit of Salmon & Salmon in the Third National Bank of St. Louis, and Salmon & Salmon, being so informed, placed a like credit to Casey & Towers in their bank.

These two notes were held by defendant until April 1, 1904. October 20, 1903, G. M. Casey died, thus dissolving the firm of Casey & Towers, which at that time was insolvent, and G. Y. Salmon was indorser on their paper and the paper of G. M. Casey to the extent of $150,000. On April 1, 1904, a representative of defendant visited Clinton, and procured from Casey and G. Y. Salmon the following notes:

St. Louis, Mo., ten thousand dollars, for value received, with interest at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum from date.

"Salmon & Salmon."

"$20,000.00. Clinton, Mo., April 1st, 1904.

"On demand after date we promise to pay to Third National Bank of St. Louis, or order, at the banking house of said bank, at St. Louis, Mo., twenty thousand dollars, for value received, with interest at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum from date.

"Salmon & Salmon."

At the date of the trial each of said notes had indorsed across the face thereof: "Paid Jan. 14, 1905. Third National Bank, St. Louis, Mo."

With each of these notes the representative of defendant took a collateral security agreement, signed by Salmon & Salmon, by which the two Casey & Towers notes were put up by Salmon & Salmon as a pledge or security for the two notes last above set out. These two agreements are marked "Paid" on the same date and in the same manner as the two notes aforesaid.

Under the evidence G. Y. Salmon signed the name "Salmon & Salmon" to these two notes and those two agreements, and under the evidence Casey & Towers, G. Y. Salmon, and Salmon & Salmon were in fact insolvent, although the insolvency of G. Y. Salmon and Salmon & Salmon was not disclosed to the defendant or its representatives. The only consideration for the last two notes signed by Salmon & Salmon were the two notes signed by Casey & Towers, which notes were first herein fully set out. The evidence further discloses the fact that G. Y. Salmon, being an indorser on the notes, had to take them up, or the bank of Salmon & Salmon would have to close.

The record further discloses that the first of each month the interest on the Casey & Towers notes would be charged to the account of Salmon & Salmon by the defendant bank, and up to the failure of Casey & Towers the bank of Salmon & Salmon would collect the interest from said firm.

On the back of these notes signed "Salmon & Salmon" were indorsement payments and credits of principal and interest at different and sundry dates, as paid by Salmon & Salmon, and the different counts of the petition are based upon these several payments. These payments were made by Salmon & Salmon, and the amounts thereof taken from the assets of Salmon & Salmon. The evidence discloses that Casey, as manager of Salmon & Salmon, had the full power to manage the business and sign the name of Salmon & Salmon. All the dealings as to these notes were between Salmon

Casey, and some $100,000 life insurance of G. M. Casey, but as to how it was held and what was done with it does not clearly appear. This testimony of Major Salmon was what he got from Mr. Casey, and he (Salmon) understood that out of the insurance he was to be reimbursed for an individual note for $70,000 held by him against G. M. Casey.

The record further discloses that Major H. W. Salmon had no knowledge about any of these note transactions; that he was never consulted as to them, nor informed about them; that he never consented to the taking of the firm's (Salmon & Salmon) money to discharge the obligation of G. Y. Salmon. Such are the facts disclosed by the record.

1. That one partner, without the knowledge and consent of the other partner, cannot use the partnership property or assets to discharge his own personal obligation, is well-settled law; and that, if he does so use the property and assets of the copartnership, then the party receiving such property, whether money or other property, in the payment of the individual obligation of one of the copartners, on receiving the same, is liable to the copartnership, is also well-settled law. Flanagan v. Alexander, 50 Mo. 50; Ackley v. Staehlin, 56 Mo. 558; Price v. Hunt, 59 Mo., loc. cit. 263; Phelps v. McNeeley, 66 Mo. 554, 27 Am. Rep. 378; Forney et al. v. Adams, 74 Mo. 138. As well said by the learned editor of the American State Reports, vol. 7, p. 378, in a note to the case of Davies v. Atkinson: "The general rule, then, as deduced from the above propositions—and this rule is settled beyond controversy—is that a partner may not use the firm assets or make a valid transfer of its property in payment of his private or individual debts, or pledge the same for that purpose." Nor may he settle a private debt with the firm's note. Howell v. Sewing Machine Co., 12 Neb. 179, 10 N. W. 700; Parsons on Partnership, § 121; Lanier v. McCabe, 2 Fla. 32, 48 Am. Rep. 173. And many of the cases go to the extent that knowledge upon the part of the creditor receiving partnership property from one of the copartners, that the property so received on the individual debt, was partnership, is not required; in other words, that the transfer passed no title, and the party receiving the firm's property from one partner on an individual debt was liable to the firm, whether he knew at the time he received it that it was the firm's property or not.

In the early case of Rogers v. Batchelor, 12 Pet. 221, 9 L. Ed. 1063, Mr. Justice Story said: "In the case of a partner paying his own separate debt out of the partnership illegal conversion of the funds; and the separate creditor can have no better title to the funds than the partner himself had. Does it make any difference that the separate creditor had no knowledge at the time that there was a misappropriation of the partnership funds? We think not. If he had such knowledge, undoubtedly he would be guilty of gross fraud, not only in morals, but in law. That was expressly decided in Sheriff v. Wilks, 1 East, R. 48, and, indeed, seems too plain upon principle to admit of any serious doubt. But we do not think that such knowledge is an essential ingredient in such a case. The true question is, whether the title to the property had passed from the partnership to the separate creditor. If it has not, then the partnership may reassert their claim to it in the hands of such creditor."

After a review of the early cases, he concludes thus: "But we think that the true principle to be extracted from the authorities is that one partner cannot apply the partnership fund or securities to the discharge of his own private debt without their consent; and that without their consent their title to the property is not divested in favor of such separate creditor, whether he knew it to be a partnership property or not. In short, his right depends, not upon his knowledge that it was partnership property, but upon the fact whether the other partners had assented to such disposition of it or not."

Much of the language above quoted was quoted and approved by this court in the case of Ackley v. Staehlin, 58 Mo. 558.

Again, in the case of Phelps v. McNeeley, 66 Mo., loc. cit. 558, 27 Am. Rep. 378, where it is said: "It was held in the case of Flanagan v. Alexander, 50 Mo. 50, that one partner has no power or authority whatever, without the consent of his copartners, to appropriate the assets of his partnership to the payment of his individual indebtedness. While a partner can dispose of the property by a bona fide sale, he cannot appropriate it without the consent of his copartners to the payment of his individual debts, either with or without knowledge of the creditor that such property was partnership property. Ackley v. Staehlin, 58 Mo. 561."

It is true this case is in terms overruled in the case of Goddard-Peck Grocery Co. v. McCune, 122 Mo., loc. cit. 431, 25 S. W. 904, 29 L. R. A. 681, but only on the question as to the right of copartners prior to the dissolution of the partnership to bona fide appropriate, by consent of all the partners, the firm property to the payment of individual debts. We think there was a misunderstanding of the real point decided in Phelps with the consent of all the partners, partnership property cannot be applied to individual debts of copartners; but if it does so hold it was rightly overruled. Nor did Judge Black understand the Phelps Case as it seems to have been understood in the McCune Case, supra, for in Sexton v. Anderson, 95 Mo., loc. cit. 381, 8 S. W. 568, he says: "With us each partner is liable for all the partnership debts. The partners may, so long as the firm exists, do with their property as they see fit. The firm creditors have no lien on the partnership property for the payment of their debts while the firm continues to exist. Partners have the right to have the partnership property applied to partnership purposes, but this is a right or lien which they may waive. Hence the great majority of adjudicated cases are to this effect, that all the partners may, by their joint act, dispose of partnership property in liquidation and payment of a debt owing by an individual member of the firm. The qualification is that the transaction must be in good faith and not for fraudulent purposes. Rogers v. Batchelor, 12 Pet. 221, 232, 9 L. Ed. 1063; City v. Willey, 35 Iowa, 323; Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 124, 25 L. Ed. 370; Schmidlapp v. Currie, 55 Miss. 597, 30 Am. Rep. 530. The cases of Flanagan v. Alexander, 50 Mo. 50, Ackley v. Staehlin, 58 Mo. 558, Price v. Hunt, 59 Mo. 258, and Forney v. Adams, 74 Mo. 138, are all in accord with what has been said. These cases recognize the right of one partner to apply partnership property, with the consent of the other partners, to the payment of his debt. Nor is the authority of these cases shaken by the subsequent case of Phelps v. McNeeley, 66 Mo. 555, 27 Am. Rep. 378, for they are in terms approved." But however this may be, the quotation we use from the Phelps Case is upon a point not questioned in the McCune Case, i. e., that, where there has been no consent given by the other partners, one partner cannot use firm assets in the discharge of individual debts, and it is immaterial whether the creditor knew or did not know that it was firm property he was receiving.

So, too, in Price v. Hunt, 59 Mo., loc. cit. 263, it was said: "It is settled that one member of a firm cannot appropriate the partnership effects, without the consent of his copartners, to the payment of his individual debts, either with or without the knowledge of the creditors that the property belonged to the firm."

To a like effect is the language of Smith, P. J., in Ewart v. Tootle & Co., 50 Mo. App., loc. cit. 327, wherein he said: "While one partner can dispose of the property by a bona fide sale, he cannot appropriate it, without the consent of his copartner, to the payment of his individual debts, either with or without the knowledge of the creditor that such property is partnership property."

So that this court has followed throughout the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Story: The reason of the rule is that in the disposition of property a copartner is the agent of the copartnership, and whilst having full power to dispose of the firm property and assets in the course of the business of the firm, yet, when a copartner undertakes to apply the assets of the firm to his individual debt, he is going beyond the scope of his authority as the agent of the firm, and his acts are void, and pass no title to the property, as against the firm or creditors of the firm, unless consent of the other copartners to such transaction is shown. So that in this case, if the obligation of the Third National Bank, on the Casey & Towers notes, were the obligations of G. Y. Salmon individually, then he, as copartner and agent of the firm of Salmon & Salmon, had no right to execute the notes in question, and had no right to take the assets and funds of the firm to pay said notes, without the assent of H. W. Salmon, and this the evidence shows he did not have.

Nor could Casey, as manager, go further than G. Y. Salmon. As manager he was but the agent of the firm, and had full power to transact all business of the firm, but when he went beyond the scope of his authority and took firm assets to pay individual debts of one of the partners, without the knowledge or consent of the other, then his acts are not any more binding than if done by G. Y. Salmon himself. Both were agents of the firm. Johnson v. Realty Co., 62 Mo. App., loc. cit. 160. The law seems to be well settled, but the real difficulty in this case is its application to the facts. This we undertake next.

2. We shall discuss the $20,000 note first. When Casey & Towers gave that note, it was to G. Y. Salmon, and not to the firm of Salmon & Salmon. When G. Y. Salmon placed his name on the back thereof as an indorser, it was the act of G. Y. Salmon, and not of Salmon & Salmon. Without further showing than the note itself, the liability was on the makers and the indorser G. Y. Salmon and not on Salmon & Salmon. When the note was sent to defendant it was with the letter of September 12, 1903, supra. This letter to our mind clearly indicates that the firm of Salmon & Salmon was not placing this note as their own. This letter clearly shows that Salmon & Salmon had not bought this note of G. Y. Salmon, for in effect it says that Casey & Towers wanted more money than they (Salmon & Salmon) could spare. If the firm had bought the note and it was their property, the regular course would have been an indorsement of the firm if they desired to rediscount. The letter says, "and hence we ask that you please handle this note as a special favor to us," not that they want to rediscount a note which they had purchased. This letter clearly indicates that Salmon & Salmon did not have the spare cash to invest in this note; that they wanted to help Casey & Towers get their money from some other source. The very fact that they undertake by the letter to guarantee the note instead of placing the firm name on the back thereof as an indorser indicates that the firm did not own the note.

When the defendant got this note and letter, it must have known (1) that Casey & Towers, and not Salmon & Salmon, wanted $20,000; (2) that Salmon & Salmon had not purchased the note, because the letter indicates that the firm did not have the spare cash; (3) that the firm wanted defendant to discount the note for Casey & Towers, so that they might have the money in their cattle business, and suggested that such action would be taken as a special favor to Salmon & Salmon. The only thing in the entire letter is the statement to pass the proceeds to the account of Salmon & Salmon with defendant bank. This, to our mind, is not against our theory of the case. This was but one of the several modern methods of transferring funds. The proceeds were so credited in St. Louis, and when Salmon & Salmon were notified they gave Casey & Towers credit for a like sum. This letter clearly indicated to defendant such would be done. Defendant could not read this letter without knowing that the money was ultimately to go to Casey & Towers, and, so knowing, they would, as a reasonably prudent business house, have known that depositing the proceeds to the credit of Salmon & Salmon was simply the means of transferring the fund, and not otherwise. They could not read this letter and for a moment think that Salmon & Salmon were to get this money for their own use, but the letter to the contrary told them who was to get the money, and how it was to be used, and by whom and how the note was to be paid, i. e., by Casey & Towers out of the proceeds of cattle to be sold. That funds are frequently transferred in the manner directed by this letter is well known. As said in Bank v. Express Company, 93 U. S. 185, 23 L. Ed. 872: "We cannot close our eyes to the well-known course of business in the country." Defendant knew, or ought to have known, from the tenor of this letter that Salmon & Salmon would credit Casey & Towers with the proceeds when advised that they had received such credit. It is and was an ordinary method of transferring funds.

So that up to this point, i. e., the discounting of this note by defendant, we have Casey & Towers, as a firm, and G. M. Casey and W. A. Towers, individually, liable to defendant for $20,000 and the accruing interest. In addition, G. Y. Salmon was individually liable either the liability of Casey & Towers, or the individual liability of G. Y. Salmon, one of the copartners.

So the matter stood until April 1, 1904, when the Salmon & Salmon notes were given. In the meantime G. M. Casey had died, and the firm of Casey & Towers was dissolved, and not only so, but was likewise insolvent, so the evidence runs. Then we have the unusual occurrence of a city bank sending out a representative to one of its country correspondents to get a settlement. The settlement, so far as this note of $20,000 was concerned, was that G. Y. Salmon, who was liable as indorser to defendant, issued a new note in the name of Salmon & Salmon to defendant to discharge his own liability. This he did without consultation with his copartner, and without his knowledge or consent. Salmon & Salmon was not bound by the act of Casey expressed in the latter part of the letter, nor was the firm bound by this new note, which was the sole act of one partner in an attempt to use the assets of the firm to liquidate a personal liability. Defendant cannot complain, because it must have known on April 1st that it had but two sources to look to for the payment of the $20,000 note, i. e., the property of Casey & Towers, insolvent, and so known to be at the time, and G. Y. Salmon, the indorser. With its agent present, defendant takes the note signed Salmon & Salmon, by G. Y. Salmon, without the consent of H. W. Salmon. After receiving the note, they received interest thereon and payment thereof out of the assets of Salmon & Salmon, a firm in fact insolvent, but not known to be insolvent, unless the singular action of defendant in sending a man out for an adjustment might indicate its knowledge of the firm's condition. That the defendant got the sum of $20,000 and certain monthly interest payments from Salmon & Salmon is thoroughly shown. The conduct of defendant with the knowledge it had from the letter is such as to work a fraud upon the firm of Salmon & Salmon and its creditors, represented in this case by the trustee, plaintiff herein. We conclude that defendant is liable for the amounts, both principal and interest, received upon this note, unless relieved therefrom by certain other contentions by it urged, which we next discuss.

3. Defendant urges several reasons why it should not be held liable:

(a) It first says that the notes, both the original and subsequent ones, were treated by Salmon & Salmon as representing their liabilities. What we have said about the letter sent with the $20,000 note, and the note taken in lieu thereof, in paragraph 2 disposes of this contention.

(b) Next defendant says: "Even though on, there was a valuable consideration for the giving of the new notes, which the partnership ultimately paid." This contention is not borne out by the facts. The firm never admitted liability thereon. Under the evidence all that was done can be thus summed up: G. Y. Salmon recognized his liability as indorser on the Casey & Towers note; that as a member of the firm of Salmon & Salmon he could not afford to be sued on his contract as an indorser; that without the knowledge or consent of his copartner he undertook to cancel his liability by giving a firm note; that, after so giving it, either he or Casey paid it out of the firm money. Cases cited by defendant are not in point, and do not bear them out in this connection.

(c) It then contends that there was ratification by the firm. The evidence does not so show. Maj. H. W. Salmon said he never heard of the notes until some three or four days before the trial. G. Y. Salmon alone could not ratify an unauthorized act, any more than he could divert the firm assets to pay his own debt. It would be a peculiar state of the law to say that G. Y. Salmon alone could not legally bind the firm by giving the firm's note to pay his individual obligation, which is the reading of the law, and yet say that, after he had done so, he alone could so ratify the unlawful act as to make it binding. Consent and knowledge upon the part of the other copartners must be shown just as much in the ratification as in the original note. Without the consent of H. W. Salmon, his copartner, G. Y. Salmon could not bind the firm by the notes given, nor without that consent can he bind the firm by attempted ratification. Thomas M. Casey's powers were no greater than those of G. Y. Salmon. They were both mere agents of the firm; one, by reason of being a partner, and the other, by reason of being a manager. One had no greater authority than the other.

(d) Next, it is urged: "The moneys were paid voluntarily by Salmon & Salmon with a full knowledge of the facts, and cannot be recovered by their trustee." This statement of the law is well enough if it accorded with the facts. The firm of Salmon & Salmon never voluntarily paid this money. It was paid by the agents of the firm in fraud of the firm's rights, and without knowledge of one member of the firm. Had G. Y. Salmon or T. M. Casey on April 1, 1904, taken $20,000 in cash out of the vaults of the bank without the consent of H. W. Salmon and paid G. Y. Salmon's personal obligation as an indorser on this note to defendant, would it be said for a moment that the firm of Salmon & Salmon could not have recovered from defendant? We think not. Yet such a payment stands in no better light than the partial payments, made out of the firm assets, on this unauthorized note, and without the knowledge or consent of H. W. Salmon. When defendant took the note from G. Y. Salmon, signed "Salmon & Salmon," to discharge the individual liability of G. Y. Salmon, it was a fraud upon the firm, to which defendant was a party, and all subsequent transactions were tainted with this fraud.

(e) Lastly, it is urged: "This is an action for money had and received, and the plaintiff has made no showing to entitle him to recover moneys which in equity and good conscience the defendant should return." If we have correctly analyzed the situation at the time the Salmon & Salmon note was given on April 1, 1904, and if the conduct of defendant in taking said note without the consent of Maj. Salmon thereto operated as a fraud upon the firm, then there is complete room for equity and good conscience. Defendant knew that it was getting the firm's obligation for an individual debt, and when it got the money it knew it came from the firm assets.

We are clearly of the opinion that as to this note and the payments thereon, both principal and interest, the court nisi was in error.

4. As to the first $10,000 note given by Casey & Towers, the letter sent with it is not so strong as the letter accompanying the $20,000 note just discussed. Whilst this is true, we are of the opinion that the fact therein indicated, to the effect that G. Y. Salmon alone was the indorser and not Salmon & Salmon, was sufficient to put defendant upon inquiry as to the character of this note. This, coupled with what was done on April 1, when defendant's agent saw and knew that H. W. Salmon was not present, was sufficient to take the counts involving the sums paid on this note to the jury or to the court sitting as a jury.

The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed. It is so ordered.

VALLIANT, C. J., and FOX and WOODSON, JJ., concur. BURGESS and LAMM, JJ., dissent. GANTT, J., being a creditor of the Salmon estate, does not sit.

STATE ex rel. POTTER et al. v. RILEY.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. April 13, 1909.
Rehearing Denied May 1, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 354*)—VACATING JUDGMENT—MOTIONS—IRREGULARITIES APPARENT OF RECORD.

A motion under Rev. St. 1899, § 795 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 758), authorizing the setting aside of judgments for irregularity on motion made within three years after the term at which the judgment was rendered, must be based on an irregularity patent on the record.

In Banc. Mandamus by the State, on the relation and to the use of Jane C. Potter and others, against Henry C. Riley, to compel respondent to set aside an order of dismissal of a cause and to reinstate the cause. Peremptory writ denied.

Fordyce, Holliday & White, for plaintiffs.
L. R. Thomason, for respondent.

GRAVES, J. This is an original proceeding in this court by which relators seek by mandamus to compel Hon. Henry C. Riley, judge of the circuit court of Mississippi county, to set aside an order of dismissal heretofore entered by him in said court in a cause then pending wherein James M. Potter was plaintiff and Thomas Bullivant et al. were defendants, and to reinstate the cause and to proceed with said cause, and to hear and determine the same. This court issued its alternative writ of mandamus, the allegations of which are, in substance, as follows: That relator and one Francis J. Bullivant, son of Thomas Bullivant, are the only heirs at law of James M. Potter, deceased, who died January 5, 1896; that relators are all nonresidents of Missouri, but said Francis J. Bullivant is a resident of Missouri; that two relators (naming them) are minors and appear by their next friend, Samuel W. Fordyce; that at the time of his death James M. Potter was the owner of certain real estate in Butler county, Mo.; that in September, 1890, said James M. Potter instituted in the circuit court of Butler county an equitable action against Thomas Bullivant, Stephen M. Chapman, and others to determine their respective rights and interests in and to said real estate; that a change of venue in said cause was granted to the circuit court of Mississippi county; that said cause was dismissed as to all defendants except Bullivant and Chapman; that on October 12, 1892, said cause was finally submitted upon the pleadings and evidence in the said circuit, over which respondent, Henry C. Riley, presided as the regular judge thereof; that the court made and entered of record a decree determining that the said James M. Potter was the owner of said real estate, and that certain deeds given by said James M. Potter to Thomas Bullivant were in fact mortgages, and by consent of all parties to the cause appointed J. Perry Johnson as a referee to determine the value of certain improvements in said land erected by Bullivant, and to take an accounting between the parties; that said decree was final, and no appeal was taken therefrom; that the referee made and filed his report, to which Bullivant and Chapman filed exceptions; that before said exceptions were passed upon by the court the said Potter died on the date aforesaid; that on April 7, 1896, the death of James M. Potter not having been suggested to the court in said cause, on the motion of L. D. Grove, who had been the attorney of record for said Potter, the respondent, as judge of said court, wrongfully and unlawfully entered an order or judgment of dismissal in said cause; that James M. Potter died intestate, and no administration had been had upon his estate, and all his real estate has descended to relators and Francis J. Bullivant; that on October 8, 1907, relators filed their written motion in said cause and in said court requesting said court to set aside said order of dismissal and reinstate said cause; that respondent wrongfully overruled said motion, and refused to reinstate said cause; that respondent at all said times was and is now the judge of said court; that in making said order of dismissal respondent violated section 639, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 658); that said cause had been finally submitted to respondent, and he had no legal right to dismiss the same; that said dismissal was after a final decree and judgment had been entered in the said cause, and after the term had expired at which said decree was entered, contrary to the laws of this state; that the respondent had no right to dismiss the cause upon the motion and suggestion of L. D. Grove, because his authority to act terminated with the death of Potter; that the respondent at the time individually knew of the death of Potter; that the death of Potter had been suggested in another case pending in respondent's court on the same day that the order of dismissal was made; that it is the legal and ministerial duty of respondent to set aside such order and judgment of dismissal and reinstate said cause; that said Stephen M. Chapman has recently instituted suit against relators in Butler county, in which he seeks to quiet title in him to the lands involved in the Potter suit aforesaid; that Francis J. Bullivant has refused to join relators herein, although requested so to do; that relators will be unable to present all the facts as to the title to this land, if called upon to defend the suit in Butler county, last above stated, owing to the fact that many of the witnesses have since died, and the notes of their testimony in the Potter case have been lost or destroyed; that relators have used due diligence in attempting to enforce their rights (here following is a statement of the distant residence of relators, alleging same to be in Nova Scotia, others in Canada, and that two are minors); that they, the relators, have no adequate remedy at law. This is followed by a prayer for our writ of mandamus. Such are the facts recited in the alternative writ.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

By way of return the respondent says: That he admits that he is judge of the circuit court of Mississippi county; admits making the order of dismissal; that he denies having any knowledge of the death of Potter, either individually or otherwise; that said order was made on the application of L. D. Grove, an attorney at law, who was attorney of record for Potter, who, at the time, represented he was attorney for Potter; that said order so made is not void, nor subject to collateral attack, nor to be set aside upon motion unless motion be made within three years. The return then proceeds in this language:

"Respondent further says that on heretofore the ——— day of April, 1906, and at the regular April term of the circuit court of Mississippi county, Missouri, one Francis J. Bullivant, as an heir at law of the said James M. Potter, presented to the court his motion to set aside the order of dismissal made and entered in the cause wherein said James M. Potter was plaintiff and Thomas Bullivant and others defendants; that upon the presentation of said motion it was stipulated and agreed by the parties thereto that the said James M. Potter was dead at the time said judgment and order of dismissal was entered; that upon the hearing of said motion it was further shown to the court, by the introduction in evidence of certified copies of the land records of Butler county, Missouri, the situs of the lands in controversy in said suit, that the said James M. Potter, the plaintiff in said cause, had by his general warranty deed dated January 3, 1896, and which said deed is duly recorded in Book No. 53, at page 141, the same being one of the land records of Butler county, Missouri, conveyed to Jane C. Potter, one of the relators herein, said lands; that it was further shown to the court that the said Jane C. Potter had by her quitclaim deed, dated the 19th day of April, 1901, and recorded in Book No. 49, at page 488, the same being one of the land records of Butler county, Missouri, conveyed all her right, title, and interest in and to said lands to parties other than the relators herein or either of them. Respondent further says, that upon the hearing of the motion of the relators to set aside the judgment and order of dismissal and reinstate the cause of James M. Potter versus Thomas Bullivant and others, it was ing of relators' said motion, the relators have an adequate remedy by appeal. All of which is respectfully submitted."

To this return, relators filed their plea, in substance as follows: They deny that L. D. Grove represented to respondent that he was attorney for James M. Potter when the order of dismissal was made. They aver that it is mandatory upon respondent to reinstate and redocket the cause. They aver that section 795, referred to, but not specifically named in respondent's return, is not applicable to this case. They deny that upon the hearing of the motion of Francis J. Bullivant any deeds or certified copies thereof were introduced showing that James M. Potter had conveyed to parties other than relators. They aver that the alleged deed from James M. Potter to Jane C. Potter, who is one of the relators herein, was notoriously fraudulent and void, and was never in fact executed, and that at the time it was claimed that it was executed the said James M. Potter was in extremis and was in an unconscious and comatose condition, and because the said alleged instrument does not describe the lands with such particularity as to convey the same. They further say that at the hearing of their motion on October 8, 1907, it was stipulated that James M. Potter died December 30, 1895, and that relators and Francis J. Bullivant were his heirs at law. Relators further say that at the hearing of said motion it would have been shown by evidence that Potter died intestate, and that the deeds above mentioned were void, and that relators and Francis J. Bullivant were the heirs at law of Potter; but the respondent informed the attorneys of the relators at the time that the matters involved were well known to him, as he was judge in the former proceedings, and he did not care to go into them, and thereupon overruled relators' motion as aforesaid. Relators further aver that at the time there was on file and of record a stipulation in said cause showing the death of Potter on December 30, 1895, and showing that relators and Francis J. Bullivant were his heirs at law, and that they have no adequate remedy by appeal. The pleading then concludes with a prayer for the remedies asked in the alternative writ.

To this pleading, respondent filed no replication.

This court appointed Hon. Arthur L. Oliver as a commissioner to take the testimony in the cause and report the same, together with his finding of facts, to this court. Such has been done, and the findings so found by the commissioner are as follows:

"First. I find that the relators, Jane C. Potter, Dexter D. E. Potter, Mary C. Na-and surviving heirs, as children and grandchildren of one James M. Potter. That the said James M. Potter died intestate on or about the 30th day of December, 1895. That the respondent, Henry C. Riley, is and was at all times mentioned in relators' petition the duly elected, qualified, and acting judge of the circuit court of Mississippi county, Mo.

"Second. I find that prior to the death of the said James M. Potter, during the month of September, 1890, he, the said James M. Potter, instituted a suit in equity against one Thomas Bullivant, Stephen M. Chapman, Charles F. Hendricks, Byrd Duncan, Patrick Harmon, and Wm. F. Neal, defendants, in the circuit court of Butler county, wherein it was sought by the plaintiff, Potter, to have certain alleged incumbrances set aside, which had theretofore been given by him on his lands located in Butler county, Mo., or to have the status of these incumbrances determined by the court. That this original suit was transferred by change of venue to the circuit court of Mississippi county, Mo., where the cause of action was there dismissed as to all defendants except Thomas J. Bullivant and Stephen M. Chapman. That in October, 1892, the issues of this original suit were finally submitted to the respondent, H. C. Riley, as judge of the circuit court of Mississippi county aforesaid, and a judgment (which was not offered in the hearing before me) was by him rendered in favor of the plaintiff, James M. Potter. That thereupon one J. Perry Johnson was appointed as referee to ascertain and determine the value of certain improvements on the lands then in litigation, and that said referee thereafter filed his report, to which the defendants Bullivant and Chapman filed their exceptions.

"Third. I further find that thereafter, while the exceptions to the referee's report of defendants Bullivant and Chapman were pending in said circuit court of Mississippi county, and before they were ruled upon by the respondent, H. C. Riley, one L. D. Grove, who, I find, was acting as the attorney of James M. Potter in his lifetime, appeared as Potter's attorney on the 7th day of April, 1896, and had the following order made on record:

"'James M. Potter, Plaintiff, vs. Thomas Bullivant et al., Defendants. From Butler County. Now comes the plaintiff, by attorney, and on motion this cause is dismissed. It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the defendants recover of and from the plaintiff the costs and charges herein expended, and that execution issue therefor.'

"I find that, at the time the above order was made, James M. Potter, the plaintiff, had then been dead about three months, but the evidence fails to show that any evidence of death was ever made to the court at or prior to that time, or that the court of its own knowledge knew of Potter's death. The evidence does show that on the same day, in another and different suit wherein James M. Potter was defendant, his death was suggested and not denied, and one Jane Potter was made party defendant.

"Fourth. Your commissioner further finds that thereafter, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1907, the relators herein, by their attorneys, filed a motion in the circuit court of Mississippi county, wherein they sought to have the court set aside the order of dismissal made in the case of James M. Potter v. Thomas J. Bullivant et al. on the 7th day of April, 1896, and that said motion was by the respondent, H. C. Riley, overruled. That at the time of the submission of this motion, on October 8th, 1907, it was stipulated and admitted by the parties in said motion, and offered before the respondent, H. C. Riley, in support of said motion, the following: 'First. That James M. Potter, the plaintiff in the above-entitled suit, died on or about the 30th day of December, 1895, and before the order of dismissal was made in said suit. Second. That Eliza Buchner, Mary G. Nasmith, Jane C. Potter, Dexter D. E. Potter, Edith Potter, and Robert Potter, together with Francis J. Bullivant, are interested as heirs at law of James M. Potter, deceased, who was formerly the plaintiff in the above-entitled suit.'

"I further find that at the time of the submission of relators' motion in October, 1907, there was no evidence introduced on the hearing of said motion in the circuit court of Mississippi county, Mo., and before the respondent, showing that James M. Potter had prior to his death conveyed the lands in controversy; but that on another and different motion filed by one Francis J. Bullivant (who is not a party to this suit) on April, 1905, and passed upon by the respondent on the 5th day of October, 1906, defendants in that motion offered at some time in vacation certain exhibits to the respondent in support of their contention that said James M. Potter had conveyed said lands in controversy."

Such are the facts pleaded and the facts proven in this record.

1. In respondent's brief we are cited to section 795, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 758), as being of force and vitality in this cause. This section permits the setting aside of judgments for irregularities upon motions filed within three years after the terms of their rendition. This motion was filed long after the expiration of the time prescribed by this statute, and, as we take it, was not intended to be a motion under this section of the statute. A motion contemplated by this statute must be one based upon an irregularity which is patent on the record, and not one depending upon proof de-hors the record. Phillips et al. v. Evans et al., 64 Mo., loc. cit. 22; Latschaw v. McNees, 50 Mo., loc. cit. 384; Powell v. Gott, 13 Mo., loc. cit. 461, 53 Am. Dec. 153.

The motion in question is more in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis, the very purpose of which is to make apparent to the court by evidence dehors the record some error of fact which did not appear of record and which was unknown to the court. In fact, if the death does not appear of record, but must be shown by evidence allunde, the writ of error coram nobis is the remedy. In this state a motion to vacate the judgment charging the fact or death and supported by proof takes the place of the common-law writ of error coram nobis. The general rule as to the remedy is thus stated in 11 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 847: "If, however, the fact of death must be shown dehors the record, the remedy is the writ of error coram nobis." Powell v. Gott, 13 Mo., loc. cit. 461, 53 Am. Dec. 153; Ency. of Plead. & Prac. vol. 5, pp. 26, 27; Dugan v. Scott, 37 Mo. App., loc. cit. 669; Craig v. Smith, 65 Mo. 536.

In the case of Craig v. Smith, supra, there was both a patent error of record, i. e., the sheriff's return, which showed a non est as to the moving defendant, and an error of fact, in this: that the attorneys representing two of the defendants (there being three, including the movant) had filed an answer for defendants without specifying for which defendants the answer was intended, when they had no authority to appear for but two, and not for the party filing the motion to vacate the judgment. The motion was filed within three years, and this court treated it both as a motion in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis and as a motion under the statute, now section 795, Rev. St. 1899.

In Ency. of Plead. & Prac. vol. 5, pp. 26, 27, supra, the office of the writ is thus described and defined: "The office of the writ of coram nobis is to bring the attention of the court to, and obtain relief from, errors of fact, such as the death of either party pending the suit and before judgment therein, or infancy, where the party was not properly represented by guardian, or coverture, where the common-law disability still exists, or insanity, it seems, at the time of the trial, or a valid defense existing in the facts of the case, but which, without negligence on the part of the defendant, was not made, either through duress or fraud or excusable mistake; these facts not appearing on the face of the record, and being such as, if known in season, would have prevented the rendition and entry of the judgment questioned."

In Powell v. Gott, supra, we said: "This was a motion to set aside a judgment obtained against an infant who appeared by attorney. The judgment was rendered in 1841, and the motion was made in 1847, about two years after the defendant attained others of his family, to establish the truth of the facts stated therein. The motion was overruled by the circuit court. This is in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis. The object of this motion is to correct an error in fact, upon which certain proceedings in law have been based."

And in this state it has been held that no statute of limitations applies to such proceeding. Powell v. Gott, 13 Mo. 458, 53 Am. Dec. 153; Latshaw v. McNees, 50 Mo., loc. cit. 384. In the latter case it is said: "As this error does not appear upon the face of the pleadings, it can only be brought to the attention of the court by a proceeding in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis. The usual way is by motion supported by affidavits or evidence. If the motion is sustained, the husband and wife are allowed to make any defense to the merits they may have, and the case is retried. This motion is allowed at any subsequent term after final judgment. I know of no statute of limitations against such a motion. The statute of limitations in regard to irregularities applies to such as appear on the face of the proceedings, and not to such as are brought before court by evidence allunde, as in this case. See Powell v. Gott, 13 Mo. 458, 53 Am. Dec. 153; Ex parte Toney, 11 Mo. 661; Groner v. Smith, 49 Mo. 318; Ex parte Page, 49 Mo. 291."

The relators herein are proper parties to file such a motion in the original case. They are the heirs at law of Potter, and are injured by the judgment. They are privies to the record as such heirs of Potter. In 5 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 31, this rule is announced: "A writ of error coram nobis can only be procured by one who is a party or privy to the record, or injured thereby." See, also, Holford v. Alexander, Assignee, 12 Ala., loc. cit. 289, 46 Am. Dec. 253, wherein, on a discussion of who can sue out such a writ, it was said: "It is laid down in the elementary books that a writ of error can be brought by him only who was a party or privy to the record, or injured by the judgment, and who consequently will derive advantage from its reversal. Heirs, executors, administrators, reversioners, remaindermen, terre-tenants, or a husband who marries after a judgment against his wife, and perhaps others, who are not parties to the proceeding sought to be revised, may join in the prosecution of a writ of error." Numerous cases are cited by the court in support of this point.

2. Respondent contends, among other things, that the judgment of dismissal was voidable only and not void, and being only voidable it cannot be attacked in this, a collateral proceeding, as he terms the case in hand. That the death of Potter terminated the relationship of Grove and Potter as attorney and client cannot be questioned.

motion of Grove is a fact found and undisputed.

But the immediate question before us is, Does the death of a party to a suit, after being duly under the jurisdiction of the court, both as to person and subject-matter, make an adverse ruling to him void, or does it render such judgment only voidable? The cases are not uniform upon the question, but the weight of authority is to the effect that such a judgment is voidable only. In Black on Judgments, § 200, it is said: "The great preponderance of authority is to the effect that, where the court has acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the persons during the lifetime of a party, a judgment rendered against him after his death is, although erroneous and liable to be set aside, not void nor open to collateral attack."

The author has collated a number of authorities, and among them the old case of Coleman v. McAnulty, 16 Mo. 173, 57 Am. Dec. 229. In this case our court, speaking through Scott, J., said: "In the case of Warder v. Tainter, 4 Watts (Pa.) 278, the court says the authorities are abundant to show that in no case is a judgment rendered by a court of general jurisdiction considered void on account of the death of the defendant having taken place before the rendition of it; that, at most, it is only voidable. If the death of the defendant will not render a judgment void, no reason is perceived why the death of the plaintiff should have that effect. There being, then, a valid sale under a writ, supported by a judgment not void, the title of Coleman passed by it."

Van Fleet, in his work on Collateral Attack in Judicial Proceedings, § 602, undertakes to give the reason for the rule thus: "Jurisdiction over the parties being shown by the record, any movement for or against them is an implied finding that they are in life and legally competent to protect their rights. The recital usually is that the parties, either in person or by attorney, are present, or neglect, after due notice, to be present. Those are matters to be determined from the evidence; and the determination is not void because the evidence was false or insufficient."

The case of Coleman v. McAnulty, supra, has been cited and approved upon this question in the following cases: Fithian v. Monks, 43 Mo., loc. cit. 521; Bank v. McWharters, 52 Mo., loc. cit. 35; Lewis v. Coombs, 60 Mo., loc. cit. 48; Postlewaite v. Ghiselin, 97 Mo., loc. cit. 425, 10 S. W. 482.

Our cases are not wholly uniform on the subject. In Sargeant v. Rowsey, 89 Mo. 617, 1 S. W. 823, Sherwood, J., holds that where a defendant in an action to foreclose a mortgage dies during the pendency of the suit, and decree entered without suggestion of death and the bringing in of the heirs, a sale under such decree carried no title and is a nullity.

The Missouri cases seem to agree that if at the institution of the suit the defendant was in fact dead, then the judgment was a nullity. But, on the other hand, the Sargeant Case, supra, seems to stand alone in the list of cases wherein the court had acquired jurisdiction of the person and the subject-matter prior to the death. It is true that in the case of Hinkle v. Kerr, 148 Mo. 43, 49 S. W. 864, Brace, P. J., touches the questions, and the distinction between the two classes of cases, i. e., those cases wherein the party was dead at the institution of the suit, and those cases wherein the party was alive and duly served with process at the institution of the suit, but dies pending the action and before final judgment, somewhat tenderly and suspiciously and in a degree doubtfully, yet the case finally passed off on the question that the party was a woman under coverture. However, Gantt, P. J., in the case of Shea v. Shea, 154 Mo., loc. cit. 606, 55 S. W. 869, 77 Am. St. Rep. 779, gets back to the old moorings of the McAnulty Case, supra, and summarizes the Missouri doctrine thus: "It is well settled in this state, whatever may be the judicial opinion in other jurisdictions, that an action begun and prosecuted against a defendant who was dead when it was begun is absolutely void, and can be attacked collaterally as well as directly. Bollinger v. Chouteau, 20 Mo. 89; Williams v. Hudson, 93 Mo. 524, 6 S. W. 261; Crosby v. Hutton, 98 Mo. 196, 11 S. W. 613; Graves v. Ewart, 99 Mo. 13, 11 S. W. 971; Jaacks v. Sullivan, 128 Mo. 177, 30 S. W. 890. But the great weight of authority in this country is that, where a court has acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, the death of the defendant before the judgment is rendered will not render the judgment void for that reason. Yaple v. Titus, 41 Pa. 195, 30 Am. Dec. 604; Warder v. Tainter, 4 Watts (Pa.) 279; Collins v. Mitchell, 5 Fla. 364; Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 140."

So, too, says Black, J., in Williams v. Hudson, 93 Mo., loc. cit. 528, 6 S. W. 262: "As the representatives of Bougher and Crapster were not made defendants in the tax suit, and as Bougher and Crapster were dead when that suit was commenced, the judgment, as to them and their representatives, is void. Had they died after suit commenced and service of process upon them, another question would be presented; but a suit commenced and prosecuted against a dead man gives the court no authority to enter judgment against him; the judgment is void as to him."

The learned annotator of L. R. A., in volume 49, loc. cit. 160, in commenting on the case of Kager v. Vickery, 61 Kan. 342, 59 Pac. 628, 78 Am. St. Rep. 318, which holds the judgment void, says: "The majority of cases hold that a judgment taken against a party who dies after suit, but before judgment, is not void. These cases generally hold that such judgments cannot be attacked collaterally; that they are erroneous and voidable, and that they are open to an attack in the proper manner, by motion or by writ of error coram nobis," etc.

To like effect is 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 153.

From all we conclude the right rule to be that if the party dies during the pendency of a suit wherein the court by legal process has acquired jurisdiction over both the person and the subject-matter but before judgment, and a judgment is rendered against such party so dying, without there being anything of record showing such death, then such judgment is voidable only and not void. But, on the other hand, if the party was dead at the institution of the suit, and the court for that reason acquired no jurisdiction over the person or subject-matter, then such a judgment is void. And in the case at bar we hold that, if the vitality of this judgment of dismissal is dependent solely upon the one question of the death of Potter pending the suit, such judgment cannot be attacked or impugned in this, a collateral proceeding.

3. Relators say that they do not depend entirely upon the question that the judgment is void because Potter was dead at the rendition thereof. They, in addition, urge that the cause was under submission, and say that the dismissal was without authority of law, and therefore void upon the face of the record itself. In other words, that under the record disclosures and the law such act was nugatory and void. In this contention relators plant themselves behind Rev. St. 1899, § 639 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 658), which reads: "The plaintiff shall be allowed to dismiss his suit or take a nonsuit at any time before the same is finally submitted to the jury, or to the court sitting as a jury, or to the court, and not afterwards."

A reference to the facts found by our commissioner shows that in the original suit of Potter v. Bullivant et al. the cause was submitted to the court, who found in favor of Potter; that is to say, that the deeds in question were mortgages, and not in fact deeds. Our commissioner further finds that a referee was appointed "to ascertain and determine the value of certain improvements on the lands then in litigation, and that said referee thereafter filed his report, to which the defendants Bullivant and Chapman filed their exceptions." Our commissioner then continued: "I further find that thereafter, while the exceptions to the referee's report of defendants Bullivant and Chapman were pending in said circuit court of Mississippi county, and before they were ruled upon by the respondent, H. C. Riley, one L. D. Grove, who, I find, was acting as the attorney of James M. Potter in his lifetime, appeared as Potter's attorney on the 7th day of April, or not these exceptions had been heard and submitted to the respondent for his decision. The only thing appearing is that such exceptions were filed, and they might have been withdrawn before being heard and determined by the court. The parties were entitled to be heard upon their exceptions, and when heard they would be submitted to the court for a decision therein. The record fails to show such hearing, and as a consequence the exceptions within themselves were not under submission, within the terms of the statute, supra.

But going back to the further findings of our commissioner, we see that there is a finding to the effect that in 1890 James M. Potter instituted a suit in equity against Bullivant and Chapman and others in the circuit court of Butler county, wherein it was sought by plaintiff to have certain alleged incumbrances set aside, or to have the status of the same determined by the court; that by change of venue said cause went to Mississippi county, where a dismissal was taken as to all defendants except Bullivant and Chapman. Then our commissioner in words finds and says: "That in October, 1892, the issues of this original suit were finally submitted to the respondent, H. C. Riley * * * and a judgment was by him rendered in favor of the plaintiff, James M. Potter. That thereupon one J. Perry Johnson was appointed as a referee to ascertain and determine the value of certain improvements on the lands in litigation, and that the said referee thereafter filed his report, to which the defendants Bullivant and Chapman filed their exceptions."

If from this record of found facts there was either a final judgment in this case, or the whole case was before the court under submission, then either of said conditions would be fatal to the contention of respondent: First, if there was a final judgment, then the order of dismissal should not have been entered, and, being entered at a later term, was coram non iudice. Mohler v. Wiltberger, 74 Ill. 163; Long v. Thwing, 9 Ind. 179; Danforth v. Love, 53 Mo. 217. And, secondly, if the whole case was under submission and no final judgment, then the order of dismissal was in the face of an express statute (Rev. St. 1899, § 639, supra), and void on the face of the record.

(a) Was the judgment entered a final judgment? In determining this question, in addition to the facts found, we must take into consideration the undenied allegations of the alternative writ. Such undenied allegations stand as admitted. 13 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 784. The above authority says: "All matters well pleaded by the relator which are not denied by the respondent in express terms cause was finally submitted to the court upon the pleadings and evidence, for its determination of the issues thereby joined, and the court thereupon made and entered of record a decree determining that the said James M. Potter was the owner of the said real estate, that certain deeds given by said James M. Potter to said Thomas Bullivant were in fact mortgages, and by consent of all parties to the cause appointed a referee, one J. Perry Johnson, to determine the value of certain improvements on said lands erected by said Thomas Bullivant, and to take an accounting to ascertain the state of accounts between the parties in reference to the subject-matters of said suit."

This allegation stands undenied by the return, and is therefore admitted. This, coupled with the facts found, fully shows the character of the judgment. Was it a final judgment? We are of opinion that the decree or judgment in the Potter case was not a final judgment. Whilst it settled the principal equities, it left other matters to be passed under review by the court before the full equities could be adjudicated. The decree pleaded determined that the deeds were mortgages; but the petition or bill in equity not only prayed for that relief, but, as averred in the alternative writ, it further asked the chancellor "to determine their respective interests in and to the said real estate." A part of this controversy was determined by the chancellor, but another part was referred to a referee. Before final decree the report of the referee must necessarily pass under the judicial review of the chancellor. The amount of the mortgagee's interest in the lands could not be decreed until this report was made to and passed upon by the court.

In Black on Judgments, § 41, it is said: "The difficulty appears to arise in relation to those decrees which, while settling the general equities of the cause, leave something for future action or determination. And the true rule seems to be that, if that which remains to be done or decided will require the action or consideration of the court before the rights involved in the cause can be fully and finally disposed of, the decree is interlocutory; but it is none the less final if, after settling the equities, it leaves a necessity for some further action or direction of the court in execution of the decree as it stands."

And in section 44 the same author says: "The most difficult cases in which to draw the line between final and interlocutory decrees are those in which the decree, after finding the general equities, orders reference to a master for some specific purpose. Yet there are not wanting principles upon which to base a reasonable and accurate distinction in these cases. As the condensed result of the numerous authorities on the subject, we may formulate the following specific rules: First, where a decree is made disposing of the general equities of the case, but ordering a reference to a master to ascertain damages, or to find certain facts, or to do anything else necessary to be done before a final adjustment of the rights of the parties can be had, if the functions of the master are to be judicial, and not merely ministerial, and the provisions depending on his report are not already incorporated in the decree, then the decree is interlocutory and not final. Second, where a decree ascertains and fixes all the rights of the parties, but a reference is ordered to a master to do or ascertain something that is necessary to carry the decree into effect, if the functions of the master are to be merely ministerial and not judicial, or if all the consequential directions depending on the result of the proceedings before him are given in the decree itself, then the decree is final and not interlocutory. To take a single illustration, the reference of a case to a master, to take an account upon evidence, and for the examination of the parties, and to make or refuse allowances affecting the rights of the parties, and to report his results to the court, is not a final decree. For his report is subject to exceptions from either side, which must be brought to the notice of the court before it can be available. It can only be made so by the court's overruling the exceptions, or by an order confirming the report, with a final decree for its appropriation and payment."

Evidently the decree for our review, whilst not before us in hæc verba, evidently provided for the referee to take evidence upon two questions, i. e., (1) the value of improvements placed on the lands by defendants, and (2) the amount of the mortgage debt; and, further, that such referee report to the court. In such case there could be no final decree until the report of the referee and the exceptions thereto were passed upon by the court.

Again, discussing final and interlocutory decrees, 23 Cyc. 786, says: "Although there cannot be two final judgments in the same case, it is sometimes proper to enter an interlocutory judgment for the final disposition of the case. Generally speaking, the judgment is final if it at once disposes of the entire controversy settling the rights of the parties, and leaving nothing for further consideration; but interlocutory if it merely settles some preliminary point or matter, or reserves for future determination some detail essential to the complete adjustment of the subject of litigation. The judgment is ordinarily final when rendered in pursuance of a general verdict, or on submission of the entire case to the court, or on a submission for decision on the pleadings. But an interlocutory judgment may be entered where it is necessary to frame an issue on which the parties may properly go to trial, or on overruling a demurrer, where leave is given to amend the pleading or to plead over, or where the court has not before it all the papers necessary to settle the form of the final judgment, or reserves the decision of some point affecting the amount recoverable or the right to modify the judgment, or finds it necessary to appoint a master or referee to find issues in the case, unless where the action to be taken on the coming in of his report is definitely prescribed. So, also, a judgment is generally interlocutory if it embodies a condition, the performance of which is necessary to make it effective, or a condition on the performance of which it may be released. And, in the action of account, it is usual and proper to render a preliminary judgment that 'the parties do account.'"

In the case at bar it was necessary to appoint a master or referee to find issues in the case, and the action to be taken on the coming in of his report was not definitely prescribed by the decree under which he was appointed. We take it that there was left a very material portion of this case to be passed upon by the court upon the coming in of the report of the referee. The judgment mentioned in the alternative writ is not a final judgment, as we read and understand the cases, so that the contention of relators that no order of dismissal could be made because of a final judgment is untenable.

(b) If the judgment was not final, as we have found, then was the case under submission, so as to make Rev. St. 1899, § 639, applicable? We think not, under the record before us. There is nothing to show that there had been any hearing upon the report and exceptions taken thereto. Had the record disclosed that there had been a hearing upon these exceptions and this report, and the chancellor nisi had taken the same as submitted to him for judgment thereon, a different case would be presented. By section 714, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 711), the parties were entitled to argue their exceptions to the report of the referee. The law says, "and shall be argued without delay," thus showing that a hearing is contemplated before a submission. Under the facts before us this cause had not been finally submitted to the court so as to bring it within the purview of Rev. St. 1899, § 639, supra.

4. By our first paragraph we reach the conclusion that the motion filed by relators in the original suit of Potter v. Bullivant et al. was in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis, and that the relators were such privies to the record that they had a right to come in and file the same. By our second paragraph we reach the conclusion that the judgment of dismissal is not a void judgment, but voidable only, and, inasmuch as the motion to vacate was overruled, it stands there as bar to further action, and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding. By our third paragraph we hold that the first judgment

From this it follows that the peremptory writ should be refused for two reasons: (1) Because the relators had the right to file the motion to vacate, and after receiving an adverse judgment thereon had the right to appeal; and (2) because the judgment of dismissal is only voidable, and cannot be attacked in this proceeding. We cannot compel the court to proceed with the cause so long as this voidable judgment remains in force. Nor can we say that if relators had the right to file the motion to vacate the judgment, as we conclude they did have, they then did not have ample redress by way of appeal from the order or judgment overruling their motion. In this state a motion to vacate a judgment for error of fact, and not for patent error of record, supported by evidence dehors the record, takes the place of the common-law writ of error coram nobis, and is in the nature of an independent and direct attack upon the judgment in the court committing the error. A judgment upon such a motion is within itself a final judgment, from which an appeal will lie. But even if there was a question as to this, of which we think there is none, yet the judgment of dismissal and for costs in the original proceeding was a final judgment, and the order overruling the motion to vacate such judgment was at least a "special order after final judgment in the cause," so as to permit an appeal under Rev. St. 1890, § 806 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 769).

The peremptory writ should be denied; and it is so ordered. All concur.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 231*)—RENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for rent, the admission by defendant that he was the lessee of plaintiff, and had not paid the matured rent demanded, cast on him the burden of excusing his apparent default by proof of a breach of the contract by plaintiff pleaded in his answer.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 173*)—RENT—EVICTION.

In an action for rent, the defense that defendant had been evicted by being deprived of the use of part of the premises was not sustained merely by a showing that, on attempting to show the premises to a prospective subtenant, he found the door of a stairway which was held in common with an adjoining owner locked; it appearing that the door had been locked by defendant's former subtenant, and the refusal of the adjoining owner to unlock the door being due to the incivility of the demand.

Metcalf, Brady & Sherman, for appellant.

JOHNSON, J. Action by a lessor against her lessee to recover rent due and unpaid. Plaintiff alleges that the rent of the demised premises for the months of July, August, and September, 1907, of $200 per month, was not paid by defendant, and is due and payable under the terms of the lease. In effect defendant admits in his answer that he is the lessee of the premises as charged in the petition, and that he did not pay the rent in controversy; but he seeks to justify his action on the ground that he was evicted from a part of the demised premises, and, being thus deprived of the beneficial enjoyment thereof, is himself the injured party, and is excused in law from paying the rent by plaintiff's breach of her covenant to give him continuous and peaceful possession of the entire premises. The reply, in addition to a general denial, contains pleas of waiver and estoppel. A motion to strike out the new matter in the reply was filed by defendant and overruled by the court. Defendant excepted and argues that the ruling on the motion was erroneous. The trial to a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for the full amount demanded in the petition. Defendant appealed.

The premises are known as 549 and 551 Main street, in Kansas City, and are used for business purposes. A three-story business building fronting on Main street covers the lot to its full width. Adjoining this building on the north is another business house owned by a stranger to this suit. A common stairway affords access from Main street to the second and third floors of both buildings. Half of this stairway is on the premises of plaintiff; the other half on those of the adjoining proprietor. Double doors are at the street entrance to the stairway. A life insurance company owned the premises a number of years and rented them from month to month to a merchant named Quinn. January 23, 1906, the insurance company sold and conveyed the property to defendant by warranty deed. February 15, 1906, defendant conveyed to plaintiff by warranty deed. On the same day plaintiff leased in writing the property to defendant for a term of three years, beginning on the first day of the following month, at a monthly rental of $200. As a part of the transaction, a separate written contract was signed by the parties, in which it was agreed that defendant "accepts the lease so made as aforesaid to himself, subject to the rights of the said Quinn, and agrees and consents to be bound by all the provisions of the said lease to him as fully as though he were in actual possession of said premises at this date. The said Sallie McCloud Pearce agrees, however, that, whenever so requested in writing by the said Hoyt, she will terminate said tenancy of said Quinn as soon as it may be lawfully done after receipt of such notice." It appears from the evidence that the sale of the property to plaintiff and the letting thereof to defendant were parts of one transaction, and that defendant's agreement to become plaintiff's lessee was an inducing cause of the sale. Quinn was paying $175 per month rent for the whole property, and on March 5, 1906, defendant notified him in writing that beginning May 1st the rent would be raised to $250 per month. Quinn accepted defendant as his landlord and paid the rent to him, but vacated the premises a month or two after the rent was raised. Defendant paid plaintiff $200 per month until July 1, 1907, when he quit paying. After Quinn moved out, defendant in repairing the building closed up the inside entrance from the first floor to the stairway, leaving the stairway without any entrance except that from the street. In March, 1907, defendant entered into negotiations to lease the property to a man he thought would be a desirable tenant. This man went to inspect the premises, and found he could not obtain entrance to the stairway on account of the street doors being locked. He reported this fact to defendant, who sent a young man from his office to make demand of the adjoining proprietor to remove the lock from the doors. The demand was made in a manner so uncivil and peremptory that it angered the adjoining proprietor into refusing to comply with it. Defendant lost his customer he claims on account of access to the upper floors being denied him. On April 20th following plaintiff and the adjoining proprietor entered into a written agreement to keep the street doors open for the common use and benefit of the occupants of both buildings. Defendant was wrong in thinking, as he did, that the adjoining proprietor had obstructed the entrance to the stairway. His own tenant, Quinn, had locked the doors some years before, and kept them locked, because he did not wish that entrance to be used. The doors were locked when defendant sold the property to plaintiff, and remained in that condition until plaintiff and the adjoining proprietor agreed to open them. All defendant had to do to open the doors himself was to have Quinn give him the key, but it did not occur to him to do this. There is no serious dispute over any of the facts we have stated, and they may be taken as the established facts of the case. Other facts appear in evidence, but those stated control the disposition of the case.

The admission by defendant in his answer and evidence that he was the lessee of plaintiff under the lease pleaded in the petition, and had not paid the matured rent demanded, cast on him the burden of excusing his apparent default by proof of the existence of the breach of the contract by plaintiff pleaded in his answer. He has failed completely to sustain this burden, and the learned trial judge would have committed no error had he peremptorily instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff. The rule invoked by defendant, "that the tenant, whose occupancy is prevented by a wrongdoer is not compelled to proceed against him but may take his action against his lessor on his covenant to deliver possession" (Rieger v. Welles, 110 Mo. App. 166, 84 S. W. 1136), has no application here, for the reason that no facts or circumstances have been adduced by defendant to support the conclusion that he was deprived of the stairway either by plaintiff or by the adjoining proprietor. He has proved nothing but the fact that a year after he leased the premises he found the street doors locked. This fact alone does not warrant the inference that he was excluded from the use of the stairway by plaintiff, the adjoining proprietor, or even by a wrongdoer. On the contrary, the facts stand undisputed in the record that his own subtenant, Quinn, locked the door for purposes of his own, and that defendant could have opened it either by procuring the key or forcing the lock. The conclusion cannot be avoided that defendant seized on the mere fact of finding the door closed as a foundation on which to lay a defense to the enforcement of what was proving to be a burdensome lease. His defense is wholly without merit.

In this view of the case, the question of whether or not the court erred in overruling defendant's motion to strike out parts of the reply is immaterial. The same may be said of other questions argued by counsel.

The judgment is for the right party, and is affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Macon County; Nat. M. Shelton, Judge.

Action by Sarah C. Erhart against the Wash-Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Minnis and Robertson & Robertson, for appellant. C. A. Barnes and Fyke & Snider, for respondent.

BROADDUS, P. J. This action is to recover damages for the burning of plaintiff's houses, furniture, and trees on her premises. The trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,600, from which defendant appealed.

The appellant's first contention is that under the pleadings and testimony the plaintiff did not make out a case for recovery. The fire occurred on the 16th day of September, 1907, in Centraalia, at about the hour of noon. The fire was communicated to plaintiff's house from sparks from a burning building near the tracks of the defendant's railroad, which plaintiff claims was set afire by sparks emitted by defendant's engines. The burning building which set fire to plaintiff's house was what was known as the Priebe-Simeter poultry house, and was situated about 100 feet north of defendant's main track and about 75 feet north of defendant's switch tracks. The poultry house was a frame structure with a shingle roof, was 60 feet long by 20 feet wide, with an ell 20 feet by 32 feet joined onto the north side. At the time it was occupied by Swift & Co., who were engaged in the egg and poultry business. The main part of the building was two stories high without any ceiling between the upper floor and the roof. This upper story was occupied as a place of storage for lumber for egg cases and empty barrels. It was shown that a short time before the fire, which burned the building and which occurred at about 10:30 o'clock a. m. of the day, two of the defendant's engines were engaged in switching nearby. There was evidence that the engines of the defendant while in operation threw out sparks, but no one seemed to have noticed that they did so on the occasion in question. There was a brisk and somewhat variable wind blowing from the south and southwest at the time. Plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that the fire was first discovered in the roof and much unadmitted, with holes in it sufficient to admit the light. The defendant's evidence tends to prove that the fire started inside under the roof, which must have been communicated by some one of the employees of Swift & Co., who were shown to have been habitual smokers while at their work. It was also shown that the engines that had been switching moved slowly—not over the rate of two miles an hour—and defendant's engineers testified that under such conditions they did not throw out sparks.

We believe there was ample evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that the fire caught in the roof of the building. It then remains to be seen if there was any evidence tending to show that the fire was communicated by sparks from defendant's engines. There being no direct proof of that fact, the matter must rest upon inference to be drawn from the circumstances and surroundings. It may be inferred that, going at the rate of two miles an hour, an engine would not ordinarily throw out sparks so as to set fire to a building 75 or 100 feet away. But we must take into consideration that the engines, while switching, at times were still, and that in starting up they do sometimes throw out sparks, as it requires more power to start them than it does to continue a slow movement afterwards. This, we believe, to be common observation and experience. With a brisk wind blowing from the south from defendant's tracks, sparks from an engine could be carried north to the roof of the building, which in its condition was very susceptible of being ignited; and, if the fire started in the roof, there is no other reasonable manner in which to account for its origin except by sparks from one of defendant's engines. Gibbs v. Railroad, 104 Mo. App. 276, 78 S. W. 835. The evidence left it as a question for the jury.

It is contended that it was not shown by competent evidence that plaintiff was the owner of the building—that title to land cannot be shown by oral evidence. The only evidence introduced was that of plaintiff that she owned and occupied it as her place of residence, and that she had about 10 years previously caused its construction at a cost of $1,600. The defendant objected to the manner of proving ownership. In Bank of Aurora v. Linzee, 166 Mo. 496, 65 S. W. 735, which was a suit in ejectment, it is held that oral evidence is not the best evidence of title. And in Turner v. Williams, 76 Mo. 617, where title was involved, it is held that title to land cannot be established by mere oral statements of witnesses. It cannot be doubted but such is the universal rule in such cases. But "possession of land under claim of title is, as against a stranger, prima facie evidence of title." Kansas City Suburban Belt Railway Co. v. Norcross, 137 Mo. 415, 38 S. W. 299.

The plaintiff admitted that her property had been insured, and that the insurance company had paid her $1,011 for her loss, $11 of which was for goods destroyed. The defendant contends that the estimated value of the building at $1,600, less depreciation of 5 per cent. a year, would fix its value at the time of the fire at $960, an amount less than the insurance received by plaintiff. But defendant has misconstrued the evidence. The witness who estimated the value of the building placed it at $1,600 after allowing for the depreciation. However, as to that matter, it could make no difference how much or how little the plaintiff received by way of indemnity from the insurance company for her loss. Her damages cannot be reduced thereby; the defendant not being a party to the insurance contract and having no interest therein. Matthews v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 142 Mo. 645, 44 S. W. 802.

We believe every point raised by the defendant on the appeal has been determined. The case was well tried, and, finding no error, it is affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Atchison County; Wm. C. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Isadora Jackson against Tully Smith, executrix of the estate of Abner Smith, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. J. Miles and W. R. Littell, for appellant. L. D. Ramsay, for respondent.

BROADBUSH, P. J. The plaintiff, a married woman, is the daughter of Abner Smith, deceased. She asserts a claim against her father's estate for services which she alleges she rendered in behalf of her sister, Ellen Jackson, who was at the time a married woman, in taking care of and providing for her under a contract she had with the deceased. The contract was made for her by her agent, her husband. The defendant objected to the competency of the husband as a witness, on the ground that the other contracting party was dead, and that therefore he was incompetent to prove the contract. The objection was overruled, and the witness was allowed to testify to the contract. The verdict was for plaintiff, and the administrator appealed.

The statute removes the disabilities of a party to a suit as a witness by reason of his interest as a party or otherwise, "provided, that in an action where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead * * * the other party to such contract or cause of action shall not be admitted to testify." Section 4652, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2520). The Supreme Court, after a review of the cases on the question, holds: "Hence an examination of the cases will show that a party to the contract has been construed to mean the person who negotiated the contract, rather than the person in whose name and interest it was made. Thus, though one party in interest be dead, the other party will be a competent witness, if the contract in issue was negotiated by an agent of deceased who is living at the time of the trial." Banking House v. Rood, 132 Mo. 256, 33 S. W. 816; Miller v. Wilson, 126 Mo. 48, 28 S. W. 640. And it is held: "If both parties to a contract be living, one of them will not be permitted to testify, if the agent who acted for the other be dead. Williams v. Edwards, 94 Mo. 447, 7 S. W. 429. And so it is held in First Nat. Bank v. Payne, 111 Mo. 291, 20 S. W. 41, 33 Am. St. Rep. 520, Waltermar v. Schnick's Estate, 102 Mo. App. 133, 76 S. W. 1053, and Edwards v. Warner, 84 Mo. App. 200. Although there has been much confusion in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the state in construing the statute on this phase of the question, they seem to be uniform; and we do not see how it could be otherwise.

As the evidence of the husband to prove the contract was all the evidence that was offered as to that matter, the cause is reversed without remanding. All concur.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Matt G. Reynolds, Judge.

Action by John A. Campbell and others against Zach W. Tinker. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs are partners under the style of the Campbell Horse Company, and are engaged in the business of buying and selling horses in East St. Louis, Ill. On December 10, 1904, defendant purchased a pair of horses from them for $700, and the present action is to recover said sum, less a credit of $118, allowed for reasons which will appear in the course of the statement. The answer says defendant bought two horses from plaintiffs in 1902 on condition he should have a reasonable time in which to try them, and, if they were found not sound, docile, or satisfactory, might return them, in which event plaintiffs were to furnish other horses on the same condition, and so on, until they satisfied defendant, when the purchase price of $450 paid for the first pair should be credited on the price of the horses that were accepted as satisfactory; that the pair of horses first delivered proved unsatisfactory to defendant, were returned to plaintiffs, and thereafter, from time to time, plaintiffs furnished, and defendant tried, other horses in accordance with the agreement, and finally received and accepted a pair at the price of $700; that thereupon defendant tendered and offered to pay plaintiffs the difference between said sum and $450 theretofore paid for the horses furnished in 1902, and afterwards returned, which difference of $250 defendant had been at all times ready and willing to pay, but plaintiffs had refused to accept. For reply plaintiffs said it was true they had sold defendant a pair of horses in 1902, and defendant had paid for them, but that said sale was absolute, and without any agreement or guaranty from plaintiffs to defendant. That defendant took possession of said horses. Afterwards one of them was hurt or injured, whereupon defendant sent them to plaintiffs' stable, requesting the latter to sell them for the account of defendant and give him credit for the net proceeds of the sale. That plaintiffs sold them as requested, and gave him credit for $118 as the net proceeds. That with this credit he was left indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $582 on the price of the horses bought in December, 1904.

The testimony was conflicting regarding the terms of the first sale, which occurred in March, 1902; that for defendant tending to prove the horses were returned to plaintiffs on May 4th because they turned out to be skittish and unsatisfactory, and were accepted by plaintiffs pursuant to an agreement to supply another pair, and on the understanding this would be done. Testimony for plaintiffs was to this effect: They never sold horses on trial. Defendant and his coachman tried the pair in controversy twice before taking them from plaintiffs' stable, and a day or two afterward telephoned plaintiffs to come over and get their money, as defendant could not want a better team. One of the plaintiffs went over, and was paid in full, by check dated March 22d. Thereafter defendant sent word one of the horses had fallen lame, and to accommodate him plaintiffs furnished first one horse and then another to use in lieu of the lame horse. Later defendant said he was going to Europe, and would send the team back to be sold, and the money put to his credit, to be applied on a pair of horses he would purchase on his return. A man of plaintiffs went to defendant's stable to get the horses pursuant to this request, and found one of them so lame he could hardly walk; in fact was unable to travel the distance to plaintiffs' stable. Defendant's coachman said plaintiffs understood about this, and the team was to be taken back and sold for defendant's account. Meanwhile the tails of the horses had been docked, which would diminish their value, and it turned out one of them had broken a bone in its ankle. This fracture was five or six months in healing. In September, 1902, the team was sold for $250, and defendant credited with the sum of $118, which was left after paying for feed and veterinary services. Defendant explained why he paid for the team while he had it on trial, by saying he expostulated when asked to pay, but one of the plaintiffs said they needed the money, and assured him if the horses were not satisfactory, others would be sent. The case was tried without a jury, and judgment given for plaintiffs for their demand, wherefore the appeal calls into question the declarations of law, two of which were given of the court's own motion, and the others were requested by defendant, and given with changes made by the court. We transcribe most of the declarations, omitting two or three which express the same theories of the case, and are either uncriticised, or criticised for the same reasons as those copied. The court's modifications in declarations asked by defendant are in italics. The following were given of the court's own motion:

"(1) If the court sitting as a jury finds and believes from the evidence that the team first delivered to the defendant was delivered on trial, and that thereafter plaintiffs were notified by defendant, or any one of the employes of defendant having charge of said horses, that the team was satisfactory, and that thereafter plaintiffs through their authorized agent called upon defendant and received payment for said horses, and gave a bill of sale thereof, or a warranty as to said horses, then plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action.

"(2) In determining whether said sale was conditional, as contended for by defendant, the court will take into consideration all the facts and circumstances in evidence; and, although the court may find and believe said sale was conditional, yet it was the duty of the defendant to accept or reject said horses in a reasonable time, and, if not accepted, to return them to plaintiffs, and if the court sitting as a jury further finds and believes from the evidence that defendant did not notify plaintiff of his acceptance of said team of horses, and did not return the same to plaintiff, within a reasonable time, but continued to use said horses, and that during said use the horses became crippled, lamed, and otherwise injured in value and usefulness, then plaintiffs are entitled to treat said sale as absolute, and entitled to recover in this action."

The following, asked by defendant, were given as modified:

"(1) The court instructs (declares) that if from the evidence it believes that defendant purchased the first team of horses upon approval, that defendant was to have a reasonable time to try said horses, and that if upon trial said horses did not prove sound, docile, and satisfactory to defendant, defendant might return said horses to plaintiffs, then there was no absolute sale of said first team, unless defendant notified plaintiffs, after said trial, that said horses were approved by him, and were docile, sound, and satisfactory to him, or unless defendant, within a reasonable time after said purchase, failed to notify the plaintiffs that said horses were not approved by him, and were not docile, sound, and satisfactory to him, and failed to return said horses in a reasonable time.

"(2) The court declares that, if from the evidence it believes that defendant purchased said first team of horses subject to his approval, and subject to said team being satisfactory to him, and that defendant returned said first team to plaintiffs because he did not approve of the same, or because said team was not satisfactory to him, then there was no absolute sale of said team, and defendant is entitled to a credit from plaintiffs of $450 upon the purchase price of the second team of horses, even though the court may believe that said first team was sound and docile, and that defendant ought to have approved of said first team, and even though the court may believe that defendant ought to have been satisfied with said first team, the grounds of approval or disapproval, and of satisfaction or dissatisfaction, being for defendant alone to determine, and provided that option was exercised in a reasonable time, and plaintiffs notified thereof.

"(3) The court declares that, even if one or both of the horses in said first team were injured while said horses were in defendant's possession, still defendant did not, because of said injuries, lose the right to return said first team to plaintiffs, and to receive from plaintiffs credit for the sum of $450, provided that by the terms of the purchase of said first team of horses defendant reserved the right to return said horses if they were not sound and docile, and were not satisfactory to defendant, and provided, further, that said injuries befell said horse, or horses, in the course of the exercise by defendant of the right of trying said horses which the contract gave to defendant, and provided further that the injuries were received only during their trial, and within a reasonable time after their receipt by defendant. If the court sitting as a jury believes from the evidence that the defendant did not accept or return said horses within a reasonable time, and after such reasonable time said horses were injured, crippled, and rendered less valuable and useless (sic), then defendant had no right to return them under his alleged conditional purchase."

John T. Fitzsimmons, for appellant. E. W. Banister, for respondents.

GOODE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The first declaration in the present case merely said, if the court found the team first purchased was delivered to defendant for trial, thereafter plaintiffs were notified by him it was satisfactory, were paid, and gave defendant a bill of sale, or a warranty, plaintiffs were entitled to recover. That declaration was sound; for certainly if the horses were accepted and paid for by defendant as satisfactory, he had exercised his option to keep or return them, and thereafter he could have no redress, except for fraud, or on a warranty, if one was given. Execution of a bill of sale by plaintiffs, and acceptance of it by defendant, was not essential to an election by him to keep the horses, but might be regarded as a circumstance which favored the conclusion that he had elected to keep them. It was not more necessary to refer to said circumstance in the declaration than to refer to any other fact conducing to prove the ultimate fact of a decision by defendant to accept the team, but reference to it was not prejudicial to defendant; for the declaration required the court to find for plaintiffs on the essential fact of whether defendant notified them he would accept the team, and the inclusion of certain circumstances which helped to induce the finding was immaterial.

Counsel for defendant excepted to changes made by the court in other declarations, and insists these changes drew into the case for decision issues not joined in the pleadings, to wit, whether defendant ought to be regarded as having accepted the horses first purchased if he did not return them to plaintiffs in a reasonable time, or if one of them was injured or crippled while in his possession. The argument runs thus: In replying to defendant's averment of a purchase of the first pair of horses with the privilege to return them if they proved unsatisfactory, plaintiffs alleged the sale was absolute and unconditional. Further, according to all the testimony, the horses were returned to, and received by, plaintiffs. Under such pleadings and evidence, whether or not they were returned in a reasonable time was an irrelevant inquiry; the real question being whether this was done pursuant to an option accorded to defendant in the contract of sale, as he alleged, or merely in compliance with his request to sell them for him, as plaintiffs alleged. Defendant's view of the pleadings is substantially correct. The replication mentions the occurrence of injury to one of the horses while defendant had it, but does not put the fact forward in a definite manner as a reason why defendant could not exercise his option to reject them if such an option had been given. Hence it may be allowed the declarations of law widened the issues; but scrutiny of the declarations requested by defendant shows this course was invited, and hence is not available for reversal. Christian v. Ins. Co., 143 Mo. 460, 45 S. W. 268; Sowden v. Kessler, 76 Mo. App. 581; Plummer v. Milan, 79 Mo. App. 439. Take the first modified declaration, and compare the italicised part inserted by the court with the remainder, and it will be seen the theory of law propounded in the declaration as requested was not changed. The theory was that, if the first team was sold on approval, and defendant was to have a reasonable time to try it and return it if unsatisfactory, there was no absolute sale, unless, after trial, he approved the horses, or failed within a reasonable time to notify plaintiffs they were not approved. The insertion made by the court required defendant to return the horses within a reasonable time, as well as give notice of rejection. But defendant's supposed right to return them if they were unsatisfactory was mentioned in the requested part of the declaration, in a connection that implied return in a reasonable time, which, of course, would be a necessary incident of refusal to accept them. The amendment of the second requested declaration merely required defendant to exercise his option to reject, and follow up his decision with reasonable notice to plaintiffs. In the third declaration the amendment was more elaborate, but of the same legal effect. It said if the court did not believe defendant accepted or returned the horses within a reasonable time and after such time they were injured, crippled or rendered less valuable, defendant had no right to return them. According to defendant's own theory he was bound to keep them unless he gave timely notice to the contrary. In default of such notice the sale would become absolute (1 Mechem, Sales, §§ 681, 682), and a subsequent injury would not affect the matter one way or the other, and hence need not have been referred to in the declaration; but the reference was not unfavorable to defendant, inasmuch as the court was required to find the main fact: Retention of the horses an unreasonable time without notice of disapproval.

We have been cited to Head v. Tattersall, L. R. Exchr. 7, and agree with the doctrine of the case, namely, that if a horse is sold on trial, and is injured while in the purchaser's possession, but without his fault, he will not be deprived thereby of the right of rejection. The decision was based on the concession that the injury occurred in the period allowed for trial. If no definite period is arranged, a reasonable one is implied, and so defendant concedes in the present case. Now it will be observed the reference to the injury in the declarations was in terms which showed the court meant an injury after lapse of reasonable time for trial. As said, we do not see how an injury then occurring could have any effect on the rights of the parties, which would have been fixed by the expiration of the time in which defendant might decline the horses; but neither do we see how requiring the court to find, not only that the time had expired, but also that one of the horses had been hurt after its expiration, could be prejudicial to defendant. Such an accident would not enlarge his right of rejection, but rather would lend emphasis to plaintiffs' right to treat the sale as absolute. Strauss v. Kingman, 42 Mo. App. 208; Carter v. Wallace, 82 Hun (N. Y.) 384. What we have said in this connection applies to the second declaration, given by the court of its own motion. The injury to the horses by use, referred to in said declaration, clearly means an injury after the end of the period of trial and in which defendant might have returned them as unsatisfactory. The declarations are verbally inexact, but they show the court tried this case on correct legal theories, considering the fact that defendant himself introduced by his requests the question of whether his alleged election to disapprove was timely.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

WASSON v. BOLAND et al.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 3, 1909.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 127*)—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Though an action be brought before the period of limitation has expired, if an amended petition be filed after the period, changing the cause of action, it will be barred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-547; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 127*)—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—WAIVER BY FAILURE TO OBJECT.

Failure to object to amendment of a petition is a waiver of the question of plaintiff's right to amend and does not affect the running of the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-547; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 127*)—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

An original claim filed by plaintiff in the probate court against the estate of B., deceased, was for "Balance on certificate of deposit of Bank of L., Iowa, a copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of the Bank of L.," and the certificate was attached as an exhibit. An amendment pleaded various statutes of Iowa, limiting the life of banking corporations to 20 years and for enforcement of claims against partnerships and proceeded on the theory that the corporate life of the Bank of L. had expired before the bank received plaintiff's money, that it was then acting as a partnership, and that the claim survived to plaintiff as against decedent's estate on his liability as a partner. Held, that the amendment was the statement of a new cause of action and was within the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-547; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 127*)—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

A test as to whether an amendment states a new cause of action within the statute of limitations is whether evidence to prove the one will support the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-547; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 127*)—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

That the cause of action set up in an amendment might have been joined in the same petition in a separate count, or that the subject-matter of each is the same, does not determine that the cause of action in the amendment is not new within the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-547; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 41*)—CORPORATIONS—EXPIRATION—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS AS PARTNERS.

By the laws of Iowa the stockholders of a corporation which continues to do business after its charter has expired cannot be held as partners in the absence of a statute imposing such liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 56-59; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County; Geo. W. Wanamaker, Judge.

Proceeding by Mary A. Wasson against John S. Boland and another, administrators of the estate of John Boland, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

N. A. Franklin and Thos. B. Davis, for appellants. B. L. Robison, Ira B. Hyde, and Arthur M. Hyde, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiff filed a demand against the estate of John Boland, deceased, in the probate court of Putnam county, based on a bank certificate of deposit. The case was appealed to the circuit court, where the plaintiff had judgment for the amount, less credits.

It appears: That the Bank of Lineville did business as a corporation in Iowa until, at the expiration of 20 years, its franchise expired under the terms of the statute of that state. That after the expiration of the life of the charter the bank continued business, as before, for several years, when it became insolvent and was placed in charge of a receiver, who paid a portion of the sum due on the certificate. It was during the period after the expiration of the charter and before the insolvency, while doing business as it had always done, the deposit was made and the certificate issued which is the basis of this controversy. The certificate was issued to Francis Walker and by him assigned to this plaintiff. It appeared in evidence that certain of the officers and stockholders of the bank stated themselves to be partners, and that a suit was instituted in this state on a claim of the bank, in which it was alleged that it was a partnership. It also appeared that the application for a receiver stated the bank to be a partnership. But it further appears that to meet the demands of creditors the receiver made assessments against the stockholders under the banking law of Iowa. It does not appear that Boland knew of any claim or admission of partnership.

The demand, when presented or filed by plaintiff in the probate court, only lacked four days of being barred by the statute of limitations for the presentation of claims against estates of deceased persons. After the limitation period expired, plaintiff filed an amended petition. The law in this state is that, though an action be brought before the period of limitation has expired, if an amended petition be filed after the period, changing the cause of action, it will be regarded as "a fresh suit upon a new cause of action," and will be barred. Buel v. Transfer Co., 45 Mo. 562; Fields v. Maloney, 78 Mo. 172; Scovill v. Glasner, 79 Mo. 449; Sims v. Field, 24 Mo. App. 557. It is held that a failure to object to the amendment will be a waiver. There was no objection in this case. But that relates merely to the question of waiver of right to make the amendment. It does not affect the matter of the running of the statute of limitations, as will be seen from the opinion of Judge Hall in Sims v. Field, supra. So the question is whether the amendment changed the cause of action. The object of both the original and amended petition was to hold the estate on the ground of partnership. The original claim was as follows: "The estate of John Boland, deceased, to Mary A. Wasson, Dr. Balance on certificate of deposit of Bank of Lineville, Iowa, No. 18,248, a copy of which is hereto attached marked 'Exhibit A' and made a part thereof, $2,800.00. The said John Boland was the owner of 20 shares of stock in said Bank of Lineville, a copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of the Bank of Lineville. The said certificate marked 'Exhibit A' was issued to Frances M. Walker and by her assigned to claimant Mary A. Wasson.

"Exhibit A.

"\$5,277.62. No. 18,248. Not subject to check. Bank of Lineville. Lineville, Iowa, April 14, 1904. Francis M. Walker has deposited in this bank fifty-two hundred seventy-seven and $\frac{2}{100}$ dollars payable to the order of self six months after date at 6 per cent. in current funds, on return of this certificate properly indorsed. If duplicate unpaid. Certificate of deposit. A. L. Rockhold, Cashier."

The amendment is a lengthy pleading, but the substance of it is: That the contract evidenced by the certificate of deposit was made in Iowa and was governed by the laws of that state. The various statutes of that state are then pleaded, among others, section 1069, Code 1873, providing that corporations for banking could not be organized for a longer period than 20 years, and that by section 1629, Code 1897, if one continued after that period, it could only be for the purpose of winding up its affairs and not to take new business. That by section 1863, Code 1897, a banking corporation could only be organized in the manner therein stated, which is set out in the petition. That by section 1842 of such Code it was provided that certain notice, etc., of the organization of the corporation should be given. That by section 1864 the officers of the corporation should not commence business until they had made certain sworn statements to the state auditor of Iowa. That by section 3468 an action on a claim or demand against a partnership may be brought against any one of the members thereof as an individual liability. And, finally, it was pleaded that, according to the provisions of section 3443 of such statutes, all actions survive, "under which provision plaintiff alleges that his said claim survives and may be brought against the representatives of said John Boland, deceased." It was also appropriately pleaded that the corporate life of 20 years allowed by the statute aforesaid for the Bank of Lineville had expired, and that its officers and stockholders did not reorganize, nor did they attempt to wind up the affairs of the bank, but continued to do a banking business as before and under the same name, and that, during this time after the expiration of its charter, it received the deposit in controversy. The purpose of the petition was to set forth that the corporate life of the Bank of Lineville had ceased when it received the deposit, and that it received such deposit while conducting the bank as a going concern, as had been done for several years, without any intention to wind up its affairs, and that by reason thereof the stockholders became merely partners doing a banking business as a partnership, and that deceased was liable as one of such partners.

In our opinion the amendment was the substitution of a new action. One test constantly made is whether evidence to prove one will support the other. Ross v. Mineral Land Co., 162 Mo. 317, 82 S. W. 984; Heman v. Glann, 129 Mo. 325, 81 S. W. 589; Lumpkin v. Collier, 69 Mo. 170; Scovill v. Glasner, 79 Mo. 449. The rule is clearly illustrated by the decision in McHugh v. Transit Co., 190 Mo. 85, 88 S. W. 853, where it is held that a complaint for damages for common-law negligence and one for statutory negligence are two different causes of action and cannot be joined in the same count, though they relate to the same injury. It can be said of this amendment, as was said by Hall, J., in Sims v. Field, supra, that: "The proof required by one petition was entirely different from the proof required by the other, and this difference was as to the character of the proof, and not as to the quantity of proof only. The entire proof required by the original petition would not have been sufficient under the amended petition." The mere fact that the action stated in the amendment might have been joined in the same petition, in a separate count, with that stated in the original, or that the subject-matter of each may be the same, does not determine whether the cause of action has been changed, from which it follows that, though the original and the amendment are actions on the same certificate, that fact does not prevent application of the rule. It needs but the suggestion to show that the cause shown in the original and that set up in the amendment, though relating to the same subject, are altogether different, and that proof of the original would fall far short of supporting the amendment. We are of the opinion that the statute of limitations bars the claim.

There is another reason urged by counsel in behalf of defendant why plaintiff cannot recover, which we think to be sound; that is, that by the law, as administered in Iowa, the stockholders of a corporation which continues to do business after its charter has expired cannot be held as partners in the absence of a statute imposing such liability. Seaton v. Grimm, 110 Iowa, 145, 81 N. W. 225. It is said in that case that: "The great weight of authority, in the absence of a statute, is that, where a supposed corporation is doing business as a de facto corporation, the stockholders cannot be held liable as partners, although there may have been irregularities, omissions, or mistakes in incorporating or organizing the corporation." And the same is held in Clausen v. Head, 110 Wis. 405, 85 N. W. 1028, 84 Am. St. Rep. 933, a case much like the case at bar, where it was undertaken to hold stockholders of an insolvent bank as partners. See, also, 1 Cook on Corp. § 234. We do not consider that Elson v. Wright, 184 Iowa, 634, 112 N. W. 105, cited by plaintiff, in any way qualifies those cases. But, as will be noticed in the statement of the case, it was attempted to be shown that the stockholders considered themselves to be partners and so conducted the business. We do not think there was sufficient in the evidence to justify a finding that deceased was knowingly a party to any change in the mode of operating the bank, or any change in the relationship of the stockholders. To him the bank was continued as a de facto corporation.

The judgment will therefore be reversed. All concur.

CHAPLINE REALTY & CONSTRUCTION CO. v. PHILIP GRUNER & BROS. LUMBER CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. April 20, 1909.)

SALES (§ 36*)—CONTRACT—VALIDITY—MISTAKE.

Plaintiff, who contemplated bidding on a building contract, invited defendant, a lumber dealer, to bid on the necessary lumber. Defendant's bid was on a printed form, which bore at the top a request that persons receiving the estimate would examine the same, as defendant agreed to furnish only the articles named in the estimate; "errors in extensions and footing subject to correction." The bid showed the number of pieces of each description of lumber, and in an extended column the number of feet in each description. Plaintiff accepted the bid on the total price given, paying no attention to the number of feet. Defendant, in calculating the number of feet in one description, made a mistake, whereby his bid was less than it otherwise would have been. Defendant refused to perform, and plaintiff, who had contracted to build in reliance on the bid, was compelled to buy elsewhere. Held, that defendant was liable in an action for damages.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Geo. H. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Chapline Realty & Construction Company against Philip Gruner & Bros. Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff company was engaged in the year 1907 in taking and executing contracts to build houses, and defendant company was a dealer in lumber in the city of St. Louis. Plaintiff contemplated submitting a competitive bid to the Brown Shoe Company for a contract to build a house for the latter, and, in advance of and as a basis for the bid to do the work and furnish the materials for the house, plaintiff was taking underbids from several lumber dealers in the city to furnish plaintiff the lumber which would be needed. The method of procuring these bids from dealers in lumber was to submit to them a list of the number of pieces of lumber of different kinds and dimensions plaintiff would require, and request competitive proposals to furnish said pieces at prices to be stated by the dealers. Plaintiff knew lumber was sold on the St. Louis market by the foot, but in passing on bids was accustomed to pay no attention to the number of feet in the pieces of each kind of lumber mentioned in the offers of the dealers, and to attend only to the amounts of money for which the latter proposed to furnish the lumber. Three bids were submitted by as many dealers to supply plaintiff with the lumber called for in the list plaintiff had submitted, defendant's bid being as follows:

per foot or thousand feet of each kind of lumber was set down, and in the second column the extensions in dollars and cents of the total price of the lumber of each kind proposed to be furnished. The extensions on this detached slip were not turned over or shown to plaintiff. It will be perceived defendant's bid contained three totals of $2,200; $96, and $76 respectively. A mistake occurred in the tenth item of the bid, which

That proposal was on a printed blank, with a perforated line running down the side of it. The part of the paper to the right of the perforated line was detached and retained by defendant, and will be seen to have contained, opposite the number of feet shown in the right-hand column, supra, two other columns, in the first of which the price we have italicized, in computing the whole number of feet in that item as 1,732 instead of 20,790. This mistake was made by the employé of defendant who calculated the estimate, and in consequence of it defendant offered to furnish the lumber in the first division of its bid for $2,200; whereas, but for the mistake, it would have asked $500 more, or $2,700 for the lumber in that division. Bids were received by plaintiff from two other lumber companies; one of which offered to furnish the lumber called for in the first division of the list for $2,816 and the other for $2,720. Defendant refused to deliver the lumber for the amounts mentioned in its offer as written. Plaintiff was compelled to buy elsewhere, and brought this action for damages, alleging a breach of contract. Plaintiff's employé who passed on the proposals testified he would have known there were more than 1,732 feet of lumber in the tenth item if he had noticed the extensions, but it was not his practice to pay any attention to extensions in feet, and he accepted defendant's bid without detecting the error. The evidence is somewhat contradictory as to whether plaintiff's attention was called to the mistake before it had accepted and acted on the bid, and an issue upon the point was submitted to the jury. Substantial testimony was adduced in plaintiff's behalf to prove it had notified defendant of its acceptance, had sent in its own bid to the Brown Shoe Company for the contract to erect the building, this bid had been accepted by the shoe company, and plaintiff had signed a contract for the erection of the house before defendant gave notice of the mistake in the bid to furnish the lumber; that plaintiff's proposal to supply the material and labor for the building was based, among other things, on defendant's offer to supply the required lumber at the prices shown in defendant's proposal. The court found a verdict and entered judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $500, and this appeal was taken.

Walther & Muench, for appellant. Carl Otto, for respondent.

GOODE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The rulings on requests for declarations of law indicate the court below thought the case ought to be decided according to legal propositions which may be stated as follows: First, if a mistake occurred in making up defendant's bid, but, before the latter had withdrawn or offered to correct it, plaintiff accepted and acted on it, and under such circumstances as would have induced a business man of ordinary prudence to do so, then defendant was bound to comply with its offer; second, if before the bid was accepted plaintiff either knew, or had information to cause an ordinarily prudent man to believe, a mistake had been made in the tenth item, the judgment must be for defendant; third, defendant had the right to withdraw its bid any time before acceptance, and the burden was on plaintiff to prove it had accepted defendant's offer and communicated with the latter to that effect before the offer was withdrawn, and, if the court found the bid had not been accepted before plaintiff was notified there was an error in it, the judgment must be for defendant; fourth, if there was a mutual mistake on the part of plaintiff and defendant about the quantity of lumber intended to be embraced in the bid, the judgment must be for defendant; fifth, the clause in the proposal which said errors in footings and extensions were subject to correction constituted a condition in the contract and entitled defendant to correct the alleged mistake, if it occurred, provided defendant offered to do so before plaintiff had given notice of acceptance and acted on the bid. There was evidence favorable to plaintiff on the several issues of fact, and the above findings exclude from the appeal certain contentions—that defendant withdrew its bid, or notified plaintiff of error in it before the latter accepted and acted on it; also that, if the miscalculation was due to carelessness on the part of defendant in not verifying the extensions, plaintiff's own negligence contributed to the loss. The testimony was inconsistent on the first of those issues, and on the second the opinion that plaintiff's negligence contributed to its loss is not irresistible. There was room for the court, as trier of the facts, to find defendant exercised less than ordinary business care in framing its proposal, but that, the circumstances considered, plaintiff's acceptance without recalculating the extensions did not fall below said standard. Defendant's employé made the mistake, and the proposal passed through the hands of an officer of defendant before it was submitted to plaintiff. The man who attended to the affair for plaintiff knew lumber was estimated and sold by feet, but, in passing on proposals in the form of the one in question, paid attention only to the total amounts and not to the extensions in feet opposite the items, as plaintiff based its own proposals for construction work on the lowest prices offered in the subbids submitted to it. What plaintiff wanted to learn from lumber dealers, and what it asked for, was the total price for which they would furnish a certain number of pieces of lumber; and naturally it would attend to the amounts and not to the number of feet in the items. Moreover, defendant had the benefit of the slip on which were set down the prices per foot and the total prices of the different items of lumber, and those data were not before plaintiff. Hence it is obvious more means of detecting the mistake were available to defendant than to plaintiff, wherefore it does not follow that plaintiff was remiss if defendant was.

It is insisted the proviso that errors in extensions and footings were subject to correction was as much a term of the contract as any other clause, made the sale one of lumber by the foot, and bound plaintiff at its peril to ascertain whether the true number of feet in each item was given. At this point, and generally, the case is identical with Boeckeler Lumber Co. v. Cherokee Realty Co. (recently decided by us) 116 S. W. 452.

Out of deference to the earnest brief for defendant, we have gone over the question involved again, but without seeing reason to change our opinion. In the present case, as in that one, plaintiff had asked for a round bid for various pieces of lumber of different kinds, and not for a bid by feet, and, on the strength of defendant's offer, had changed its position by entering into a binding contract with the Brown Shoe Company at a figure which was lower than it otherwise would have accepted. Upon requesting and receiving a lump offer like the one in hand, the offeree would have before him neither separate nor total prices whereby to correct the bid if an error was detected in the extensions, and could do nothing but notify defendant of the mistake. It is not a reasonable interpretation, or one compelled by the language of the proposal considered in its entirety, to say defendant meant to impose this gratuitous task on a customer who was interested only in total prices, or the latter meant to assume it. That the proviso is not intended to apply to such a bid is indicated further by the word "footings"; for bids in the form of the one in hand contain no footings, but those in which the prices of lumber per foot and total prices are stated would contain them, and we think the words in question were intended to be part of a bid of the latter kind. This view is reinforced by the sentence immediately preceding, wherein parties receiving the estimates were warned to examine it with care, as defendant agreed "to furnish only the articles named therein." This remark tended to draw attention to the articles, and not to the feet, and shows defendant was proposing to furnish the listed articles, not a certain quantity of feet of each. The argument that the clause in question accorded defendant the right to have the mistake corrected at plaintiff's expense, after it had changed its attitude by binding itself in a contract with the shoe company, implies that, however negligent defendant may have been as compared with plaintiff, the latter must bear the consequent loss. Possibly defendant might have been released from its offer, even if plaintiff had become apprised of the mistake after acceptance, but before so far changing its position that it would have to stand a loss unless defendant was held bound. As to that we do not say, for the case is presented in a different phase. Counsel for defendant have directed us to some opinions which we will cite, with the remark that they were given on facts unlike those at bar, either in that the party seeking to take advantage of the mistake had not acted in good faith, the mistake was called to his attention before he had altered his position, or to correct it would not put him in a less favorable situation than otherwise he would have occupied. *Hartford, etc., R. COMMERCIAL CLUB OF JOPLIN v. DAVIS et al.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 136*)—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO PRINCIPAL.

An agent employed to purchase real estate, who received a commission from the vendor, pursuant to a secret agreement, whereby he was to receive a commission on the completion of the purchase, must pay the commission to the purchaser, though the latter formed, after the purchase and before the payment of the commission by the vendor, an unlawful purpose to dispose of the property through a lottery; the agent's obligation to pay arising at the time he increased the price to the purchaser by the amount of his secret commission.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 136*)—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO PRINCIPAL.

One employing an agent to purchase real estate may recover from the agent the commission received by him from the vendor pursuant to a secret agreement whereby the vendor should pay a commission on the consummation of the purchase, though the purchaser, vendor, and agent each knew that the property was purchased for a lottery; the illegality not attaching to the purchaser's cause of action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Hugh Dabbs, Judge.

Action by the Commercial Club of Joplin against Fred M. Davis and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. McAntire, for appellant. A. E. Spencer, for respondents.

ELLISON, J. This action may be said to be founded on the misconduct of an agent amounting to a breach of trust. The judgment was for the defendant in the trial court. It appears that plaintiff is a duly organized corporation under article 11, c. 12, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 1103-1119), and that it is managed by a board of 10 trustees. Defendant was a member of the corporation, and one of the trustees. The board appointed him, with others, as a committee to purchase for the organization a certain tract of land in Jasper county. The purchase price was finally agreed upon at $45,000; but defendant, without plaintiff's knowledge, in breach of good faith with it, as its agent, had a secret understanding with the seller of the land that he was to be paid or allowed by such seller a commission of $1,125, which sum was paid to him on the consummation of the purchase by deed. On discovering this secret relation between these parties, plaintiff demanded the money so received, and, upon defendant's refusal to pay, this action was brought.

The evidence showed that there was a written contract for the land set forth in a receipt dated April 27, 1907, for the first part of purchase money, which was \$1,000, and that two days before that, when defendant was negotiating with the seller, he made the arrangement that he was to receive a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The deed was made in June thereafter, and that was the date when the seller actually paid such commission to defendant, amounting to \$1,125. It further appears that a few days after the purchase, viz., on the evening of May 1st, plaintiff's trustees adopted a plan whereby the lots into which a part of the land was to be divided should be disposed of by a lottery. The defense is that the land was purchased for an unlawful purpose. It can be better understood by being set out in full. After a formal general denial it proceeds: "Further answering, defendants state that the plaintiff unlawfully undertook to raise a fund of money by means of a lottery, and that said transaction, as hereafter stated, was unlawful and against public policy; that, in pursuance of said unlawful scheme, the plaintiff secured an option on the land mentioned in the petition and caused a portion thereof to be subdivided in lots, streets, and alleys; that said lots were of various values, ranging from one hundred and fifty dollars (\$150) to five hundred dollars (\$500) each, and that in carrying out said lottery the plaintiff sold said lots for the fixed price of three hundred dollars (\$300) each, with the agreement then and there designed, and proposed by the plaintiff and against the objection of these defendants that the said lots should be allotted to the several purchasers, who had no right or opportunity to select the lots they or any one of them would purchase, but same were in fact allotted to them by means of a lottery—that is to say, the numbers of the lots were written on separate sheets of paper inclosed in envelopes and placed in a hat, while a similar process was followed with the names of the several purchasers for lots, which were placed in another hat, and then, as an envelope was drawn from one hat, there was also one drawn from the other hat, and the number of the lot so drawn was taken as the number of the lot to be awarded to the person whose name was drawn from the envelope from the other hat at that time—that the said transaction constituted an unlawful lottery, and is the same transaction mentioned in the petition, and that same and every part thereof, was and is wholly void and against public policy, and gives the plaintiff no rights in the premises. Wherefore, having fully answered, defendants ask for judgment in their favor with costs." We may concede that the lottery plan of disposing of the land adopted by plaintiff was unlawful, yet in the light of the evidence we do not understand how that can protect defendant from the demand plaintiff makes on him. The evidence shows that when plaintiff purchased the land through the agency of defendant, and when defendant entered into the agreement with the seller for a commission, the lottery plan was not in contemplation. In other words, when defendant committed the injury upon plaintiff by his breach of trust, he was not engaged in buying for plaintiff land which was to be used for an unlawful purpose. The evidence shows that such purpose was not formed by plaintiff until after the purchase, and after other methods of getting the money needed had failed. It is true the money was not paid to defendant by the seller until after the unlawful plan of disposing of the property had been formed, but that should not affect a decision of the question, for defendant's obligation to pay plaintiff the amount he was secretly getting from the seller arose at the time that he increased the price of the land to plaintiff by the amount of his secret commission, for that was the effect of his conduct. If he had not exacted the commission, the seller, of course, would have sold the land to plaintiff for that much less, and plaintiff would not have contracted to pay as much, by that amount, as it did. Furthermore, it may be said in this connection that this action against defendant may be sustained by evidence in no way relating to the unlawful purpose in the plan of disposing of it. It is disconnected from that plan. When that is the case, the taint of illegality does not attach to plaintiff's action. Michael v. Bacon, 49 Mo. 474, 8 Am. Rep. 138; McDermott v. Sedgwick, 140 Mo. 172, 39 S. W. 776; St. Louis Ass'n v. Delano, 108 Mo. 217, 18 S. W. 1101; Hall v. Corcoran, 107 Mass., loc. cit. 256, 9 Am. Rep. 30.

So it may also be said that, though plaintiff and the seller and the defendant had each known the land was being purchased for a lottery, yet that matter is at an end, and it has no direct connection with the present action. It is not an action to enforce an unlawful contract or for damages for a breach of such a contract. Defendant has plaintiff's money in his possession, and no reason can exist why he should not be compelled to return it. Hall v. Corcoran, 107 Mass. 251, 9 Am. Rep. 30; Portsmouth Brewing Co. v. Mudge, 68 N. H. 462, 44 Atl. 600; 1 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 403. If it be suggested that we are going too far in saying that the money of one of the parties is found in defendant's possession, we answer that in legal and actual effect defendant's conduct amounted to this: That he received of plaintiff money which he represented the seller asked for the property, and which he was to pay to the seller. He went to the seller with the money, but paid him $1.125 less than he got of plaintiff, and kept that sum himself. While the transaction did not occur in that way, yet that was the effect of it, and it justifies us in saying that defendant had plaintiff's money. He should not be permitted to keep it.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff. All concur.

STATE v. BUSH.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
April 19, 1906. Opinion modified May 3, 1909.)

1. COURTS (§ 114*)—ADJOURNMENT OF SESSIONS—ENTRY OF ORDERS NUNC PRO TUNC.

Where the record of the county court contained a recital at the beginning of each session that the court met pursuant to adjournment, and the final order of adjournment showed a continued session from the first regular meeting until the final adjournment, it was proper for the court to enter nunc pro tunc orders of adjournment on each day the court was in session during the term, thus correcting the record of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 368; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. COURTS (§ 35*)—REGULARITY OF SESSIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

The presumption is that a court of record, while sitting as such and performing its functions, is lawfully assembled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 140; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

3. COURTS (§ 35*)—REGULARITY OF SESSIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

The fact that the several judges of the county court met at adjourned sessions is conclusive evidence that the regular term of court had not expired, and the presumption is that they would not have assembled as a court unless there had been an adjourned session, or on statutory notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 140; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 36*)—LOCAL OPTION—PUBLISHING RESULT OF ELECTION.

Rev. St. 1899, § 3031 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1737), provides that, if a majority of the votes cast at a local option election be against the sale of intoxicating liquors, the county court shall publish the result once a week for four successive weeks in the newspaper in which the notice of election was published. Held, that the record of the county court relating to the adoption of the local option law need not show a return of the publication of the result, where it shows the publication was ordered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 564*)—PROOF OF VENUE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for violation of the local option law, evidence of a sale of liquor at a certain unincorporated town, without showing in what county such town is located, is insufficient to fix the venue, and therefore fails to show any offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1277-1284; Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 804*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—BOUNDARIES OF COUNTIES AND TOWNS.

Though the court takes judicial notice of the boundaries of a county in the state, it does not take judicial notice of the county in which an unincorporated town is situated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 705; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Gentry County; William C. Ellison, Judge.

Preston W. Bush was convicted of violating the local option law, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. Peery, for appellant. C. H. S. Goodman and Kelso & Kelso, for the State.

BROADDUS, P. J. The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted in the Gentry county circuit court for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of the local option law. From the judgment of conviction, he appealed.

The indictment averred that the local option law was adopted within all that portion of Gentry county outside of the limits of the city of Stanberry, a city of more than 2,500 inhabitants, and that the defendant unlawfully sold certain intoxicating liquors outside of said city limits in said county.

The state introduced in evidence a certified copy of the record of the county court of date of August 20, 1906, showing the declaration of the result of an election held on the 17th day of August, 1906, in the county, to determine whether or not intoxicating liquors should be sold in the county outside of the city of Stanberry; and proved a sale of liquor by defendant in November following, and rested its case. Whereupon defendant asked a peremptory instruction to the jury to find defendant not guilty, which the court refused.

For the purpose of attacking the validity of the proceedings, certain records of the county court were introduced by the defendant. The record shows that the county court met on Monday, May 7, 1906, in regular session, and was in session on May 9th, June 4th, June 6th, July 2d, and July 18th. At all these different meetings, except the first and last, the record recites that the "court met pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present." There was no order of adjournment entered upon the court's minutes at the close of the day of 7th of May, the first day of its regular session. And no such entries were made when the court adjourned on May 9th, June 4th, and July 2d, but a final entry of adjournment was made on the 18th of July. It was on the last-named date that the order for the election was made.

At the regular January term of the court for 1907, the court made the following entry of record: "Whereas, it appearing to the court by an inspection of its records and the judges' notes that this court has inadvertently failed to enter upon its records its order of adjournment made by this court on the 7th day of May, 1906, whereby this court ordered its adjournment to meet on the 9th day of May, 1906: Now, therefore, it is ordered by this court that said order of adjournment be entered upon the records of this court, now for then, in the following words and figures, to wit: It is ordered that this court do now adjourn to meet on the 9th day of May, 1906." A similar entry was made as to the sessions of the court of June 4 and July 2, 1906.

The evidence showed that these nunc pro tunc orders were made without there being any contemporaneous entry or memorandum, or writing upon the minute book, or any docket, or any other record of the court. The validity of the election turns upon the question whether the court that made the order for such election was properly convened on July 18th, when the order was made for holding it.

It may be conceded that: "A court may, in the exercise of its common-law power, when the state of the records kept by the court or the clerk show that a suitor was entitled to a particular judgment, but that the judgment was not entered at the term when it should or might have been entered, at a subsequent term cause the proper judgment to be entered to relate back to the term when it should have been entered." Dawson v. Waldheim, 89 Mo. App. 245.

It is held that: "It is not necessary that the records of the court show, in order to enable it to direct a judgment nunc pro tunc, in express terms that such judgment had been rendered; it is sufficient if the facts shown by the records are such as to reasonably carry conviction that the judgment was in fact rendered." Witten v. Robison, 31 Mo. App. 525. "A nunc pro tunc entry must be treated as erroneous and void unless it contains the identical judgment of the court at a former term and conforms to the record memorandum of the judges and the clerk's minutes or other papers in the case existing or made at the time at which the case was decided." State ex rel. Davis v. Baldwin, 109 Mo. App. 573, 83 S. W. 266; Page v. Chapin, 80 Mo. App. 159; Wilcox v. Ry. Co. (Mo. App.) 115 S. W. 1061. The law in this respect is well settled in this state.

But we believe, under the facts in this case, the rule is not applicable because the subject-matter is different. It is evident, taking into consideration the whole record, that all the different sessions of the court alluded to were adjourned terms of the regular May term for 1906. The recitation in the record at the beginning of each session that the court met pursuant to adjournment of the one last preceding and the final order of adjournment made on the 18th of July seem to us ought to be construed as showing a continued session of the court from its first regular meeting until the order was made for its final adjournment. Such being the case, it was competent for the court to enter the said nunc pro tunc orders. And, as the court had not finally adjourned when the entries referred to in the first instance were made, that the court met pursuant to adjournment, it had ample evidence of record for the nunc pro tunc orders.

And this view of the question is fortified when it is considered that the presumption of law is that a court of record, while sitting as such and performing its functions, is lawfully assembled. And the evidence offered here does not tend to rebut the presumption that the court, consisting of the regular judges constituting that body in connection with the acknowledged county clerk, was lawfully assembled, but, on the contrary, supports it. The fact that the several judges met at these adjourned sessions is conclusive evidence that the regular term had not expired, and the presumption is that they would not have assembled as a court unless there had been an adjourned session or upon statutory notice. Every presumption is indulged in favor of the legality of the sittings of the court. To look at the matter as we would any other, can there be any doubt of the fact itself that the sessions in question were adjourned sessions?

It is claimed that there was no publication of the result of the election as the law requires; therefore, the local option statute was not in force in the county of Gentry Section 3031, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1737), provides that "If a majority of the votes cast at such election be against the sale of intoxicating liquors, the county court or municipal body ordering such election shall publish the result of such election once a week for four consecutive weeks in some newspaper in which the notice of election was published; and the provisions of this article shall take effect and be in force from and after the date of the last insertion of the publication last above referred to." The county court, after ascertaining and declaring the result of the election, ordered the same to be spread upon the records, and then caused the following entry to be made: "And it is further ordered that the result of said election be published for four consecutive weeks in the Albany Capitol, the same newspaper in which notice of said election was published." There was no proof that the publication had or had not been made.

The defendant, in support of the view that proof of such publication should be made, relies upon the case, among others, of State v. Searcy, 39 Mo. App. 393. The court did not hold that it was necessary for the state to make out a prima facie case to show that the result of election had been published. The syllabus is misleading in that respect. On the contrary, the proper inference to be drawn from the language of the court is that an order for such publication was sufficient. In State v. Hutton, 39 Mo. App. 410, the publication had been made, and it was a question in the case whether it was necessary for the county court to have found that it had been and entered its finding in the records. It was held that it was not necessary. In State v. Dugan, 110 Mo. 138, 19 S. W. 195, the court merely held that notice given of the result of the election was sufficient, not that it must be proved to have been given.

This court has recently passed on a similar question, where it is held that: "In a prosecution for the sale of liquor in violation of the local option law, the state does not have to show as a part of its case that a notice of the election was given, though without such notice the election would be void." State v. Foreman, 121 Mo. App. 502, 97 S. W. 269. And in a more recent case, where the precise question was raised, we hold that: "The record of the county court relating to the adoption of the local option law need not show a return of the publication of the result, where it shows the publication was ordered, and the burden to show a failure of such publication is upon the defendant." State v. Oliphant, 128 Mo. App. 252, 107 S. W. 32.

Lastly, it is contended that the state failed to prove that the offense was committed in Gentry county outside of the limits of the city of Stanberry. A witness for the state testified that the defendant sold him intoxicating liquor, but did not state in what place or in what county the sale was made. Another witness testified that defendant's place of business was in Whitton, and that Whitton was about 12 miles from Stanberry. This was all the evidence upon the question as to where defendant made the sale. There was a failure to prove the venue of the offense. It nowhere appears that the sale alleged to have been made was in the county of Gentry. Proof that defendant's place of business was in Whitton, 12 miles distant from Stanberry, was sufficient, of course, to show that it was not made within the corporate limits of that city. The court takes judicial notice of the boundaries of Gentry county, but we cannot take judicial notice that Whitton is in that county, and for aught we may know, except by inquiry, it may be in Nodaway county, as the boundary line between that county and Gentry county is not distant from Stanberry 12 miles. It is not claimed that Whitton is an incorporated municipality; we cannot, therefore, take judicial notice of its existence or location.

It follows, therefore, that the state did not make sufficient proof of venue, for failure of which the cause is reversed and remanded. All concur.

AVERY v. TUCKER.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 489*)—ACTION ON NOTE—ISSUES AND PROOF.

In an action on a note, issue was joined as to whether plaintiff was an innocent indorsee for value before maturity; but aside from this defendant claimed that the nominal payee and indorser of the note, a milling company, and plaintiff, were identical, and the amount due should be reduced by payments, not indorsed on the note, made by third persons on a bill against him for flour which they agreed to pay, and which he claimed the note was intended to cover, whereas plaintiff claimed the note embraced only the amounts of other purchases by defendant which the latter claimed to have paid, and issue was also joined as to whether such payments were made on the note. Held, that the answer to this last question depended on whether the note was given to cover the cost of the flour bought by defendant and for which such third persons agreed to pay, and hence it was proper on this last issue to receive evidence of account books of the milling company and other testimony to show on what transactions the note indebtedness accrued, though it was objected to by defendant on the ground that plaintiffs' cause of action was as an innocent holder, and that his right to recover, according to the face of the instrument, could not be impaired by payments made to the payee not entered as credits.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Knox County; Chas. D. Stewart, Judge.

Action by George L. Avery against Henry D. Tucker. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O. D. Jones, for appellant. L. F. Cottey, for respondent.

GOODE, J. Action on a negotiable promissory note dated May 19, 1906, at Edina, Mo., executed by defendant, and whereby he promised to pay to the order of the Knox Milling Company $320.06 for value received, with interest at 6 per cent. from date, and indorsed on the back under date of July 18, 1906: "Pay to the order of George L. Avery." In the petition it is alleged the note was assigned by the payee, the Knox Milling Company, to plaintiff in accordance with the indorsement. The answer admitted execution by defendant, denied the other allegations of the petition, and said that defendant caused the original payee, the Knox Milling Company, to be paid by Mary E. and C. A. Uhl the sum of $220 on the note on January 31, 1906, alleged the note was executed on September 16, 1905, instead of the day it was dated, and that said payment was made by the Uhls after execution and delivery, but prior to said date. The answer further alleged plaintiff was not a holder or purchaser in good faith, for the reason the note was assigned to him without recourse, after due and after said payment had been made, but without a credit being entered on the back of the note. The genuineness of the indorsement to plaintiff was denied, and it was alleged there was no such company or corporation as the Knox Milling Company. Defendant admitted owing $100, principal and interest, and offered to permit plaintiff to take judgment for said amount. The reply denied allegations of new matter in the answer, averred the note was assigned to plaintiff before maturity, and he was a holder for value without any notice regarding its consideration. Previous to December 16, 1905, defendant had been engaged in the grocery business in Edina, Mo., but about said date sold his stock of merchandise to Mary E. and C. A. Uhl. Just before the sale he had ordered a bill of flour to cost $220 from the Knox Milling Company, a concern of Galesburg, Ill. Part of the consideration of the deal between defendant and the Uhls was an agreement by the latter to pay for the flour, which had not yet arrived, but when it did would go into the stock of merchandise; and so they remitted for it when due. Defendant says the note in suit, though dated May 19, 1906, was executed on or about the 1st of January of said year, covered the price of the flour, and the payments by the Uhls ought to have been credited on it. The Knox Milling & Exchange Company was a corporation in which plaintiff Avery was interested and whose assets he purchased May 11, 1906, thereafter carrying on the business in the name of the Knox Milling Company, named as the payee of the note. The Knox Milling Company, therefore, was not a corporation, but simply plaintiff's business name or style, and the note was really made payable to him. The action was brought under said style because the attorney to whom the note was sent for collection did not know the facts, but supposed the Knox Milling Company was a corporation and owned the instrument. Plaintiff's contention, which is supported by testimony, was that the amount of the note did not include the price of the flour; that, though given after defendant had sold out to the Uhls, it was meant to settle an indebtedness which had accrued from various other purchases made by defendant of the Knox Milling & Exchange Company prior to said sale, and running from some time in 1904 to near the close of 1905. It would be useless to recite the testimony pro and con on this question, and we will only say defendant's was quite positive that part of the consideration for the note was the $220 to be paid for the flour, and that he had fully settled with the Knox Milling Company for all indebtedness growing out of earlier transactions between him and the milling company; whereas the evidence for plaintiff was very cogent to the contrary, and tended to prove defendant owed the full amount of the note without reference to the bill of flour.

One item of evidence should be adverted to because error is assigned regarding it. This is a bill or statement of transactions between defendant and the Knox Milling & Exchange Company which purported to have been receipted as paid by a memorandum written across its face, signed by F. A. Green. Defendant testified that he paid one Green the amount of the bill ($268) in cash, thereby clearing up what he owed for previous purchases of merchandise, and leaving no debts which would be full consideration for the note in suit if the cost of the flour was excluded. Defendant testified the man he paid was a traveling salesman of the Milling & Exchange Company, but it turned out the only man by the name of Green who traveled for the company was Horton B. Green, not F. A. Green. Horton B. Green testified the signature to the receipt was not his, and that signature and several genuine signatures of said Green were put in evidence and submitted to this court for comparison. They look to be in different handwritings. But defendant testified Horton B. Green was the very man to whom he paid the money, and who signed the name "F. A. Green" to the receipt. Various entries in the books of account of the milling company were introduced to show purchases and payments made by defendant through 1904 and 1905, and prove he owed the amount of the note regardless of the flour purchased. Defendant objected to this evidence on the score that Avery, who testified the entries were original ones in the books of the company, could not refresh or revive his recollection, because he did not make them or see them made; but the entries were admitted in evidence as having been made in the course of business, and were competent. Anchor Milling Co. v. Walsh, 108 Mo. 277, 18 S. W. 904, 32 Am. St. Rep. 600. The rule of law regarding what memorandum a witness may use to refresh or revive his memory is not in point.

Another assignment of error is that the case was tried outside the issues joined in the pleadings, wherefore irrelevant evidence was admitted, and the allegations of the petition remained unproved. The supposed irrelevant evidence consisted of account books of the milling company and some other testimony, all of which was received to show from what transactions the indebtedness covered by the note accrued. This evidence was objected to because the cause of action stated in the petition was that plaintiff was an innocent holder of a negotiable instrument obtained by him for value before maturity, and his right to recover, according to the face of the instrument, could not be impaired by payments made to the payee named in it which had not been entered on it as credits. It is true issues are joined in the pleadings, particularly in the answer and reply, as to those matters; but issue was joined, too, and necessarily, regarding whether the $220 paid by the Uhls was paid on the note—whether it should be treated as a payment on that obligation; and the answer to this question depended on whether the note was given to cover the cost of the flour bought by defendant of the milling company, and for which the Uhls had agreed to pay, or embraced only the amounts of other purchases. The evidence supposed to be incompetent was relevant to this issue alike if plaintiff was an indorsee or if he was the original payee; for, unless the note included the price of the flour, defendant was not entitled to have it credited in either contingency with the Uhls' remittances. The only difference in the result would be that, if plaintiff was an innocent indorsee, no credit could be allowed as against him, even though the price of the flour was embraced in the note. This assignment of error will be overruled.

It is further contended the evidence for plaintiff failed to prove the allegations of the petition in their entire scope and meaning. The point for decision as regards plaintiff's right to recover in the capacity of payee, on pleadings demanding a recovery as an innocent indorsee, calls into the discussion section 798, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 760), which reads: "Where the allegation of the cause of action or defense to which the proof is directed is unproved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in its entire scope and meaning, it shall not be deemed a case of variance, but a failure of proof." No point was raised about the supposed failure of proof or variance at the trial or in the motion for new trial, and, if it was but a variance, defendant was bound to proceed in the statutory mode by filing an affidavit of surprise. Instead of doing this, his efforts, from the first, were directed solely toward proving the payments were made on the note. The questions of whether or not plaintiff was the owner and holder of the note, and whether the credits claimed by defendant had been paid on it, were as much within the scope of the pleadings as the question whether plaintiff was an innocent indorsee for value, and the evidence for both parties was directed almost exclusively to the former issues, and in the requested instructions of both they only were submitted to the jury. Indeed, in objecting to evidence offered by plaintiff to show defendant owed the milling company the amount of the note with the price of the flour left out, defendant's counsel said: "The only question under the pleadings in this case is whether the credit of $220 was paid and should be indorsed on this note; that is the point in issue." We examined the decisions in this state regarding what is a variance between the pleadings and the evidence and what a total failure of proof, in Litton v. Railroad, 111 Mo. App. 140, 85 S. W. 978, and found them inconsistent and even capricious. As the issues to which the evidence was directed were joined in the pleadings, we incline to the opinion there was at most but a variance in the present case, and cite as authorities Pomeroy, Code Rem. (4th Ed.) 449, 558, and cases cited in notes, particularly Mercier v. Ins. Co., 24 Wash. 147, 64 Pac. 158, and N. Y. News Pub. Co. v. Steamship Co., 143 N. Y. 89, 42 N. E. 514. Without going over the instructions seriatim, we will say those issues were presented to the jury in a manner fair to both parties, and, as the evidence amply justified the judgment entered on the verdict in plaintiff's favor, it must be affirmed. All concur.

JONES v. SPRINGFIELD TRACTION CO.
(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. April 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 11, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 116*) — CHALLENGE TO PANEL — GROUNDS — BIAS OF OFFICER.

A challenge to the entire panel will lie for bias or partiality on the part of the officer who summoned the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 543; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 945*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—PREJUDICE.

An appellate court will not review the rulings of the trial court in matters of discretion, unless prejudice appears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3811; Dec. Dig. § 945.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 420*)—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS—PLEADING AND PROCEEDING WITH TRIAL.

Where a motion to strike out an amended petition on the ground that it changes the cause of action declared upon in the original petition is overruled, and defendant excepts thereto, but files its answer and proceeds with the trial, the objection to the petition is waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1411; Dec. Dig. § 420.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 433*)—OBJECTION TO PETITION—SUFFICIENCY AFTER VERDICT.

Where defendant files an answer and participates in the trial, the objection that the petition fails to state a cause of action relates to the sufficiency of the petition after verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1451; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 433*)—OBJECTIONS TO PETITION—SUFFICIENCY AFTER VERDICT.

In an action for injuries received while alighting from defendant's car, plaintiff alleged that she notified the conductor to stop at her destination, that the train stopped in obedience to her request, and while she was alighting the employés of defendant negligently started the train with a sudden jerk, thereby causing her to fall. Held, as against an objection made after verdict, that the petition was not defective in omitting to formally allege that defendant's servants knew that plaintiff was in the act of alighting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1473; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 303*)—PASSENGERS—PERSONAL INJURIES—SETTING DOWN PASSENGERS.

A carrier's liability for injuries to a passenger caused by starting the car while she is alighting with care does not depend on the knowledge of its servants that she is in the act of alighting, where the car has been stopped in response to her request at a usual stopping place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1228; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 303*)—PERSONAL INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—TIME ALLOWED FOR PASSENGERS TO ALIGHT.

Where a car is stopped for the purpose of allowing passengers to alight, it is the duty of the carrier to allow the passengers a reasonable time to alight in safety by exercising ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1228; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 549*) — EXPERT TESTIMONY — ANSWERS BASED ON FACTS TESTIFIED TO BY EXPERT.

An answer of a physician, called as an expert, to a hypothetical question, is not rendered inadmissible because of his testimony in the case as a physician as to the condition of the person injured, where nothing appears to show that his expert opinion is based on his knowledge of such injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2376; Dec. Dig. § 549.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a carrier for injuries to a passenger, the court instructed that the jury should weigh the evidence by the same rules it would weigh it if the contest were between individuals, and should not give greater weight to the testimony of the witnesses for plaintiff "merely" because she is a girl and the defendant is a corporation. Held, that if it was error for the court to use the word "merely," because it would imply that otherwise it was proper to give greater weight to the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses than to those of defendant, the error was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4219; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

10. CARRIERS (§ 321*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action against a carrier for injuries received while alighting from a car, that, if defendant's servants stopped the car to let plaintiff alight, it was defendant's duty to hold the car a reasonable length of time to permit her to alight, and that if, on the car stopping, plaintiff immediately started to alight and acted with reasonable care and diligence, and defendant suddenly caused the car to start, thereby inflicting the injury, plaintiff should recover, is not erroneous for failure to submit the question whether the car was stopped a reasonable time and as ignoring the question of knowledge on the part of defendant that plaintiff was alighting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Webster County; Argus Cox, Judge.

Action by Ollie Jones against the Springfield Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dickey, Delaney & Delaney, for appellant. O. T. Hamlin, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. The plaintiff is a minor. She sues by her next friend, duly appointed and qualified. The action is for damages alleged to have accrued to the plaintiff through personal injuries received while in the act of alighting from defendant's street car. Plaintiff recovered, and the defendant appeals. The case originated in the circuit court of Greene county. It was afterwards transferred by change of venue to the circuit court of Webster county, where the trial was had.

The first complaint on appeal relates to the action of the court in discharging the jury after it was impeached to try the cause. The case coming on for trial, a jury was assembled and duly examined upon the voir dire, the respective parties made their challenges, and it was sworn to try the cause. The hour for the noon recess having arrived, the court thereupon took a recess until 2 o'clock. Immediately upon the reconvening of court in the afternoon, the plaintiff filed a motion to discharge the jury theretofore impaneled for the reason the deputy sheriff who selected the entire panel was biased and prejudiced against the plaintiff and was, moreover, under the influence of the defendant. This motion the court sustained and discharged the jury. There is no doubt that a challenge to the entire panel will lie for bias or partiality on the part of the officer who summoned the jury. 17 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1112. The grounds, therefore, upon which the court proceeded in discharging the panel, were entirely proper, and, unless it appears the court abused its discretion in the matter, its action should be sustained. It is the rule that appellate courts will not review the rulings of the trial court in matters of discretion unless prejudice appears. Vojta v. Pelikan, 15 Mo. App. 471, 478. There is naught in the record indicating prejudice to the defendant. On questions of this nature, there are matters and things which frequently appeal to and properly influence the judgment of the trial court in the exercise of a sound discretion that may not appear in the record on appeal. On a charge so serious as that involved in the present instance, an appellate court should hesitate indeed before entering upon a review of a discretionary matter. From aught that appears, it may have been obvious to the court that the jury was unduly friendly to the defendant. The assignment will be overruled.

There are several amended petitions filed in the cause. The defendant moved to strike out the last-amended petition for the reason it changed the cause of action declared upon in the original petition. This motion was overruled, and defendant excepted thereto. It is now urged that the court erred in not striking out the last-amended petition. It will be unnecessary to examine minutely the question whether or not the last-amended petition stated a cause of action other than and different from that declared upon in the original. It appears in the original, and all of the amended petitions thereafter, that plaintiff alleged she was injured while alighting as a passenger from defendant's street car. The negligent act relied upon is that the car was started forward by a sudden jerk while she was in the act of alighting, thus precipitating her to the street and causing her injury. After defendant's motion to strike out the last-amended petition was overruled, it filed its answer thereto and proceeded with the trial. This action on its part operated to waive its right to have the ruling of the court on the motion to strike out reviewed, and this is true notwithstanding the fact that it had properly saved its exceptions to the ruling of the court on the motion. Were the defendant sincere in its motion to strike out the last-amended petition, it should have stood thereon, and not participated in the trial on the amended pleading. Having chosen to join issues thereon, it ought now to be precluded from making the trial court a place of chance and seek to have the trial on the merits, to which it had voluntarily joined issue, set aside for error committed, if at all, in the ruling on the motion. Scovill v. Glasner, 79 Mo. 449; Liese v. Meyer, 143 Mo. 547, 45 S. W. 282.

It is next argued that the judgment should be reversed for the reason the petition fails to state a cause of action. Having answered to the petition and participated in the trial, the question for decision relates to the sufficiency of the petition after verdict. The petition alleges, substantially: That the plaintiff became a passenger upon defendant's street car at Doling Park, destined to a point on Commercial street, near the intersection of Grant and Commercial streets, and paid her fare to the conductor for the transportation; that, when the car was within a reasonable distance of the point mentioned, plaintiff notified the conductor of her desire to alight at the intersection of said streets. It is averred that before the car reached there, and while it was still west of the point mentioned about 100 feet, in obedience to her request, it stopped for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to alight therefrom, and while she was, with due care, in the act of alighting, after the car had come to a full stop at the point aforesaid, the employes of the defendant negligently caused the same to start with a sudden jerk, thereby causing her to fall violently to the ground, in consequence of which she was seriously injured, etc. It is urged that the petition is fatally defective, in that it omits to formally aver that the defendant's servants knew the plaintiff was in the act of alighting at the time she was injured. Now it appears from the allegations that the plaintiff, when within a reasonable distance therefrom, requested the conductor to stop at the point mentioned, and that the car stopped thereat for the purpose of allowing her to alight therefrom. These averments, besides expressly stating that the car was stopped for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to alight, essentially imply that it was stopped in obedience to her request. When dealing, then, with the reasonable inferences and implications arising from the facts averred, it is obvious the defendant's servants on the car either knew, or by the exercise of care might have known, that plaintiff was in the act of alighting at the time the car was started forward. This is clear for the reason the car was stopped at her request for the purpose of allowing her to alight therefrom. After answer and verdict, the petition is to be construed by allowing all reasonable intendments and inferences of fact in aid of the verdict. When these are allowed, the petition is certainly sufficient, for though it fails to allege that the car did not stop a reasonable time to allow the plaintiff to alight, or that the servants of the defendant knew, or should have known, that she was in the act of alighting, these facts are clearly implied from those averred.

If the car was stopped by the employés for plaintiff to alight, and she proceeded immediately to do so, as alleged, it is a reasonable inference that those operating the car knew the fact. McKinstry v. St. Louis Transit Co., 108 Mo. App. 12, 82 S. W. 1108. However, we do not understand that it is relevant to the defendant's liability that its servants should either have known, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the plaintiff was in the act of alighting from the car under the circumstances of this case; that is, if the car, after having been stopped for the purpose, was not held a reasonable length of time for plaintiff to alight. Of course, if a car is stopped at a place other than the usual stopping place, or if it remains stationary for more than a reasonable length of time for a person to alight, then it might be essential for the plaintiff to show that those in charge of the car knew that he or she was in the act of alighting before liability could attach, for those in charge of the car are not presumed to be on the lookout for passengers alighting without their knowledge at a point other than the usual stopping places, nor are they presumed to be in the exercise of a high degree of care for the safety of a passenger after a reasonable length of time for alighting has transpired at a regular stopping place, unless they know that the passenger is preparing to alight. Be this as it may, when the car is stopped at a usual place for passengers to alight, this operates as an invitation to those on board to alight therefrom if they desire to do so, and the law imposes the duty upon the carrier to hold the car a reasonable length of time for passengers to alight. The same duty obtains with respect to holding a car a reasonable length of time for passengers to alight at any place along the line if the defendant's agents in charge stop the car in response to a request for the purpose of permitting a passenger to alight therefrom. Having stopped the car for that purpose, the law devolves the duty that it shall so remain a reasonable time to the end that the passengers may alight in safety, by exercising ordinary care on their part. Oullar v. M., K. & T. Ry. Co., 84 Mo. App. 340; Cramer v. Springfield Traction Co., 112 Mo. App. 350, 87 S. W. 24.

It appears in the fall which plaintiff received, the side of her head, or rather her temple, came in contact with the pavement. From this she was rendered unconscious and so remained for a considerable time. Among other things, the evidence tends to prove her sight was afterwards impaired as a result of this injury. She was treated by Dr. Coffelt, an eye specialist. His testimony tended to prove that several months after her injury she was suffering from hyperopia, or farsightedness. The doctor testified this defect of vision would be permanent. There was also testimony in the case tending to prove that the plaintiff suffered slightly since her injury from a paralytic condition. Dr. Coffelt, in his evidence, related some facts pertaining to the history of the case which he received from the plaintiff during the period he treated her. He also gave his opinion as an expert which tended to prove disabilities from the plaintiff's standpoint. It is now urged that this opinion was based largely upon the history of the case which he had received from the plaintiff, and was therefore incompetent within the ruling of Holloway v. Kansas City, 184 Mo. 19, 82 S. W. 89. Upon a careful consideration of this testimony, we are persuaded that the examination did not infringe upon the doctrine of that case. There is no word to be found in the hypothetical questions propounded to the doctor touching the history of the case. In other words, they seem to be based entirely upon facts theretofore developed in the proof. A fair example of the hypothesis submitted is the following question: "Q. Now I will ask you, in your opinion as a physician, if a person were thrown from a street car to the hard pavement and should strike on the side of the head, near the temple, with sufficient force to render them unconscious for a time, would that affect the nervous system and bring about these troubles mentioned?" To which, over the objection of the defendant, witness answered: "It is possible." While it is true in other portions of his testimony the doctor related some of the history of the case as revealed to him by his patient during treatment, nothing appears to the effect that his expert opinion, communicated to the jury, was based thereon. The evidence as given was entirely competent. Holloway v. Kansas City, 184 Mo. 19, 82 S. W. 89.

The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that in this case the jury should weigh the evidence by the same rules it would weigh it if the contest were between two individuals, and should not give greater weight to the testimony of the witnesses for plaintiff because she is a girl and the defendant is a corporation. The court modified this request by inserting the word "merely" between the words "plaintiff" and "because." As thus modified, the jury were told that they should weigh the evidence by the same rules it should be weighed if the case were a contest between individuals, and that greater weight should not be given to the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff "merely because she is a girl and the defendant is a corporation." It is said the court erred by inserting the word "merely" in this instruction, for the reason it implies that otherwise it was proper to give greater weight to the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses than to those of the defendant. This criticism is indeed minute, and the reasoning thereon is much attenuated.

In view of our statute commanding that a judgment should be affirmed in all cases unless it appears error was committed materially affecting the merits of the controversy, the court is certainly precluded from overturning the judgment on this score.

The testimony of several witnesses on the part of plaintiff tended to prove that she was a girl about 14 years of age. At the time plaintiff was employed as a nurse girl and had in keeping an infant child of her employer. The street car on which she was a passenger was what is known as a summer car, open at the sides, with seats lengthwise across the same. A footboard extends along the full length on either side of the car, and passengers pass out by stepping upon this footboard through the side of the car to the street. Several witnesses testified on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that she notified the conductor when nearing the intersection of Grant and Commercial streets of her desire to alight therefrom. In response to her request, the conductor notified the motorman. It was after dark. As the car slowed down for the stop, the plaintiff took up the baby and slid across the seat to the side of the car. When the car came to a stop, plaintiff, with the baby in her arms, stepped upon the footboard in the act of alighting, when it was suddenly started forward by the act of the motorman in turning on the electric current. This sudden start precipitated her to the pavement, which resulted in her injuries. The same witnesses testified that the point in question was a regular place for the car to stop to receive and deposit passengers. On these facts the court instructed, on the theory of the plaintiff, that if the jury believed from the evidence that plaintiff was a passenger on the car, and that defendant's agents or servants knew that fact, then the defendant owed to plaintiff the highest degree of care, and if the jury found that, in response to plaintiff's request, the defendant's servants stopped the car for the purpose of letting her alight therefrom, then it was defendant's duty to hold the car a reasonable length of time to permit her to alight, and if they found that, immediately upon stopping the car, plaintiff started to alight, and while in the act of so doing she acted with reasonable care and diligence, and the agents or servants of the defendant suddenly caused the car to jerk or start, thereby throwing her violently to the ground, inflicting injury, the verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff. This instruction is criticised for the reason it fails to submit to the jury the question as to whether or not the car was stopped a reasonable time for the plaintiff to alight, and it is said it entirely ignores the question of knowledge on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff was alighting therefrom.

Now, as to the question of knowledge on the part of the defendant's servants, we believe this criticism is unfounded, for although the instruction does not submit that question in precise terms—that is, that the defendant's servants knew the plaintiff was then and there in the act of alighting, or by reasonable care might have known such fact, etc.—it does require the jury to find that those in charge of the car knew she was a passenger thereon, that they knew she had requested a stop for her to alight, and that, in response to that request, they stopped the car for that purpose. Now there can be no question as to the law, whether it was a regular stopping place or otherwise. If defendant's servants knew the plaintiff was a passenger, and that she desired to alight at the point mentioned, and they stopped the car for the purpose of permitting her to alight, the law enjoins upon the defendant the obligation to hold the car for a reasonable length of time that she might alight in safety. That under these circumstances it was the defendant's duty to hold the car a reasonable length of time for the plaintiff to alight, the instruction told the jury in plain terms. As to whether plaintiff did proceed to alight within a reasonable time, the instruction required the jury to find that, immediately upon stopping the car, plaintiff started to alight, and that she proceeded with diligence and care in that behalf. Certainly she was not required to move forward to that end until the car had stopped, and if she immediately started to alight upon the stopping of the car, and proceeded with diligence and care to that end, then she proceeded to alight within a reasonable time, and if the car was started, causing her injury, while thus alighting, the obligation of defendant to hold it for a reasonable time was thereby breached. The instruction is not open to the criticism leveled against it. See Cobb v. Lindell Ry. Co., 149 Mo. 135, 50 S. W. 310.

The testimony on the part of defendant tended to prove that the plaintiff slid across the seat, took her position upon the footboard of the car, with the baby in her arms, and stepped off the car while it was still in motion. In several instructions the court submitted these facts to the jury with the direction that, if it found plaintiff so conducted herself, she was guilty of such contributory negligence as precluded her right to recover, and the verdict should be for the defendant. The jury found the issues for the plaintiff, however. That is, the jury found the car did stop for her to alight, as was detailed by herself and several witnesses; that she immediately undertook to alight therefrom, and, while exercising due diligence and care in that behalf, the car was started forward by the motorman turning on the electric current, which precipitated her to the street and inflicted the injuries complained of. There is substantial evidence to support this finding, and with it we are therefore not concerned.

We have examined all of the questions presented by appellant in the brief and find them to be without merit. All of the issues in the case were submitted to the jury by the instructions given. The trial seems to have been fair and impartial. It is unnecessary to prolong the opinion with a discussion of questions which we regard unimportant.

The judgment will be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

GOODHART, HARTMAN CO. v. KINNEY, Constable.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. April 20, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 938*) — PRESUMPTIONS — MAKING OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where the abstract of the record recites that on a certain date before the expiration of the time originally given plaintiff to file a bill of exceptions, the time was, by the judge in vacation, extended until a specified date, and that the bill of exceptions was filed thereafter within the time said to be extended by the judge in vacation, but there is no recital in the abstract that leave was granted beyond the term at which the appeal was perfected for the filing of the bill, the court will not review matters of exception, as it must appear in the abstract that the court entered an order during the term extending the time for filing the bill, before further extensions of time will be valid, and, unless it affirmatively appears in the abstract that the court extended the time during the term, the presumption obtains that the time was not extended, and therefore the judge in vacation cannot grant leave for filing the bill after the term has adjourned.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jesse A. McDonald, Judge.

Action by Michael Kinney, Constable, against Goodhart, Hartman Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Felix O. Poston, for appellant. Clarence Ward and H. H. Willoughby, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. It is said in appellant's brief that this is an action of replevin for three barrels of whisky which the defendant constable held under a writ of attachment. We are not otherwise advised touching the nature of the action, as the pleadings are not before us. It appears plaintiff recovered, and the defendant prosecutes the appeal on the short form provided for in section 813, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 783).

All of the arguments advanced for a reversal of the judgment go to matters of exception on the trial. From what appears in the transcript and abstract, we ascertain the judgment was given at the February term of court. Motion for new trial was filed in due time and continued to the April term, at which it was overruled. On June 2d, during the April term, an appeal was allowed to this court and duly perfected. It affirmatively appears that the bill of exceptions in the case was not filed during the term at which the appeal was allowed, and there is no entry found in the transcript nor a recital in the abstract that time for filing the bill of exceptions was extended thereafter. It is recited in the abstract, however, that on August 30, 1906, and before the expiration of the 90 days originally given plaintiff to file his bill of exceptions, said time was by the judge in vacation extended until October 1, 1906, and that the bill of exceptions was filed thereafter, within the time said to be extended by the judge in vacation. However this may be, there is no recital whatever in the abstract that leave was granted beyond the term at which the appeal was perfected for the filing of the bill. In such circumstances we are not permitted to review matters of exception. It has been frequently decided that it must appear in the abstract the court entered an order during the term extending the time for filing the bill before further extensions of time therefor will be valid; that is to say, unless it affirmatively appears in the abstract that the court extended the time during the term, the presumption obtains that the time was not extended, and therefore the court or judge in vacation is without authority to grant leave for filing the bill after the term has adjourned. State v. Ryan, 120 Mo. 88, 22 S. W. 486, 25 S. W. 351; Webster County v. Cunningham, 101 Mo. 642, 14 S. W. 625; Greenwood v. Parlin & Orgendorff Co., 98 Mo. App. 407, 72 S. W. 138. There being no bill of exceptions in the case by authority of the court, the record proper only is open to review here. Graham v. Deguire, 154 Mo. 88, 55 S. W. 151. There is no part of the record proper before us other than a certified copy of the judgment, which appears to be regular on its face. Appellant has wholly failed to set forth either the pleadings or a statement of their substance in the abstract, and we are therefore precluded from examining as to their sufficiency to support the judgment. In these circumstances the presumption obtains to the effect that the record proper is sufficient.

The judgment will be affirmed.

MOSSOP v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. April 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 11, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 539*)—ACCIDENT INSURANCE—AFFIRMATIVE PROOF OF LOSS—TIME.

Provision in an accident policy that, in case of loss of time, affirmative proof be furnished within 30 days from termination of the period for which the insurer is liable, does not necessarily mean that the proof cannot be furnished before recovery of insured, as would appear proper if the indemnity be payable weekly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 460*)—ACCIDENT INSURANCE—PROVISIONS AGAINST LIABILITY—INTOXICATION.

Provision of an accident policy that, if injury is sustained while insured is intoxicated, his recovery shall be one-eighth what it otherwise would be, applies without regard to whether the intoxication causes the injury, though another clause provides for the same result where the injury is caused by intoxication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1179; Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Matt G. Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Joseph E. Mossop against the Continental Casualty Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Action on an accident insurance policy for 21 weeks' indemnity at $15 a week, or $315; plaintiff alleging he was totally disabled during that period by an accidental injury. This fact is not contested—the defenses being, first, failure to furnish proof of loss as required by the policy; second, intentional infliction of the injury by another person; third, that it was received while plaintiff was quarreling, fighting, and violating the law; fourth, while he was intoxicated; fifth, was the result of intoxication. It is alleged any or all of those facts would excuse defendant from liability. The injury was received in the afternoon of December 17, 1906, and about the premises of a saloon kept by George Mills. According to plaintiff's version of the occurrence, he went into the saloon and asked for a drink of liquor. Mills refused him because of a dispute in the saloon two or three weeks before, ordered him out, and just as he passed through the door slapped him on the back, but in a friendly way, and without force enough to hurt or cause a fall. The saloon stood at the intersection of two streets, and the walls did not join at right angles, but at the corner was a narrow wall set diagonally to the street, and in it was the entrance to the saloon. A porch projected from the second story, and was supported by a post located where the front and side walls of the building would have joined if they had met. The entrance of the saloon was set back some feet from this post, and was elevated about a foot above the sidewalk; the triangular space between the entrance and the post being a raised platform. Plaintiff said in stepping off this platform he slipped, and in falling struck his knee against the iron post, thereby causing the injury, which was a fracture of the kneecap or patella. He testified he was perfectly sober, but there was evidence to prove he was intoxicated, had been in a quarrel with the saloon keeper, and was ejected by the latter with a shove which might have caused him to fall. The policy provided for the payment of an indemnity to the plaintiff or his wife, and the material parts said the indemnity would be paid on the conditions following:

"In the event the insured, while his policy is in force, shall receive personal, bodily injury, which is effected directly and independently of all other causes through external, violent and purely accidental means (suicide, sane or insane, not included) and which causes at once total and continuous inability to engage in any labor or occupation, and provided that neither such injury nor inability is in consequence of nor contributed to by any bodily or mental defect, disease, or infirmity of the insured.

"Part I. * * *

"Part II. Weekly Indemnity. If such injury shall not result in any of the losses scheduled in part I, the company will pay said weekly indemnity for total loss of time necessarily resulting from injury as before described, for such period, not exceeding one hundred and four consecutive weeks, as the insured shall be under the treatment of a legally qualified physician or surgeon by reason of such injury.

"Part III. Special Indemnities. (A) In any of the losses covered by this policy and specified in parts I or II (1) where the accidental injury results from the intentional act of the insured or of any other person while the insured is not engaged in his occupation (assaults committed upon the insured for the sole purpose of burglary or robbery excepted); or (2) where the accidental injury results from or is received while quarreling,

fighting or violating the law; or (3) where either the accidental injury or the loss results from any poison, asphyxiation or gas, or from fits, vertigo, somnambulism or intoxication, or from sunstroke or freezing sustained by the insured while not engaged in his occupation; or (4) where the accidental injury is sustained while the insured is insane, delirious or under the influence of any intoxicant or narcotic or while the insured is undergoing any surgical operation or treatment (except such as is made necessary solely by injury covered by this policy and performed within ninety days thereof) then and in all cases referred to in this paragraph A of part III, the amount payable shall be one-eighth of the amount which otherwise would be payable under this policy, anything in this policy to the contrary notwithstanding, and subject otherwise to all the conditions in this policy contained. (B) * * *

Another paragraph required notice of a claim to be given by the insured or beneficiary to the company within 15 days of an accident causing the loss for which claim was made, and "affirmative proof" to be furnished in case of loss of time within 30 days from the termination of the period for which the company was liable, and declared no proceedings in law or equity should be brought to recover the indemnity until after the expiration of the time for filing proofs, or, in case the claim was for weekly indemnity, within one year from the termination of the period for which the company was liable. The policy as a whole is not preserved in the record. The answer denied either first notice or "affirmative proof" was given, but it was proved defendant received a card from plaintiff on December 28th, which appears to have been furnished by defendant, and contained blanks to be filled to state the date and hour of the accident, when plaintiff quit work, what he was doing when injured, what injuries he received, about how long he would be disabled, his occupation, address, doctor's name, number of the policy, and some other matters. It was proved, too, defendant received January 2, 1907, what is entitled "Claimant's Preliminary Notice of Injury," a document containing questions with blanks for answers, as did the card, but calling for more particulars than the latter; in truth, for all the details of the accident, and the kind, gravity, and consequences of the injury. On the back were questions and blanks for the report of a surgeon, which were expected to be and were filled in by the surgeon then in attendance, in the hospital of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company where plaintiff lay, on 35 or 40 patients who were suffering from injuries for which defendant might be liable. The surgeon's report stated the nature of plaintiff's injury and that it alone totally disabled him from attending to every part of his work, how the accident occurred according to plaintiff's statement, that his disability would continue for six or eight months, that the injury was not aggravated by any prior disease, and he had no other chronic ailment, defect, or deformity. This document was stamped by defendant: "Received April 10, 1907." The court left it to the jury to say whether defendant had been given notice of the injury within 15 days after it happened, and thereafter and before filing suit had furnished "affirmative proof" on one of defendant's forms; or, if this had not been done, whether defendant had waived notice. There was a verdict for plaintiff for full indemnity, and defendant appealed.

E. S. Puller and Manton Maverick, for appellant. Grimm & Haas and F. A. & L. A. Wind, for respondent.

GOODE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is insisted the verdict cannot stand because no affirmative proof in the meaning of the policy was furnished, and there was no evidence the company waived this proof. Defendant argues the whole indemnity for lost time was payable at the end of treatment, instead of weekly, and that the policy required proof of loss to be prepared and transmitted to the company after treatment had terminated, or after the expiration of 104 weeks or 2 years, which was the maximum period of liability for loss of time. We will not decide when indemnity for such loss was payable, because part of the policy was omitted from the record, and the part presented suggests the omitted portion would bear on the question. That sufficient notice of the loss was given in 15 days is conceded; but it is contended "affirmative proof" of loss was not made. The document received by the company April 10th stated every particular of plaintiff's accident and consequent disability, and was an adequate "affirmative proof," if not prematurely delivered. The policy is rather vague about what would be timely delivery, being precise only in requiring the proof to be furnished within 30 days after the end of the liability period. This condition means it cannot be furnished after said 30 days, but not necessarily that it cannot be furnished before. If no indemnity was payable until the patient recovered, proof made 30 days after recovery would be in time; but proof made sooner in a complete form and forecasting accurately what future time the insured would lose might satisfy a condition expressed as this one is. The natural construction of the contract is that indemnity was payable weekly, and, if so, proof of loss of time ought to precede the demand for payment. So far as we can determine from the portion of the policy in the record, it is our opinion the company received good and timely proof of loss.

The effect of the instructions on the issue of intoxication was to hold the company liable for indemnity at $15 a week, even though plaintiff was hurt while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, unless the injury was the result of his condition. This construction of the contract expunges an express proviso against liability for an injury received by the insured while under the influence of an intoxicant or narcotic. By virtue of said proviso, the company was as much exempt from liability for plaintiff's loss of time, if the loss was due to an injury received while he was intoxicated, but not in consequence of intoxication, as if the latter brought about the injury. Counsel argue that, if the intention was to exclude liability for an injury received while plaintiff was intoxicated, regardless of a causal connection between his state and the injury, it was useless to insert the exemption for an injury resulting from intoxication, as the first proviso would embrace the latter. So it would; but we take the purpose to have been to word the contract so no doubt could arise about the nonliability of defendant in either event. Again, it is said to be unreasonable to excuse defendant merely because plaintiff was intoxicated, if the accident would have happened anyhow. An illustration is brought forward of this kind: Suppose he had been hurt while intoxicated and on a street car in a collision of the car with another, would defendant be exempt? We answer that any insurance company has the right to refuse to insure men against accidental injury while they are intoxicated, and there are good reasons why they should refuse to do so, to wit, when a man is drunk, he is less able to take care of himself, is more quarrelsome, and hence more likely to get hurt than when he is sober, and, if hurt, he may believe and testify his conduct had nothing to do with the accident, and obtain a verdict on that theory, when, in truth, intoxication led to the injury. Instances will occur where it is extremely difficult to determine what influence a state of intoxication had in bringing about an accident. We need not speculate on the reasons for the terms of this contract. Suffice to say they are not against public policy, must be supported according to their reasonable meaning, and there is no doubt cast on their meaning by the language used or pertinent authorities. The courts uniformly hold in construing a policy like the one in suit that if the insured is injured while in an excepted state, or doing an excepted act, the company is not liable. Shader v. Railroad, etc., Co., 66 N. Y. 441, 23 Am. Rep. 65; Standard, etc., Co. v. Jones, 94 Ala. 434, 10 South. 530; Cilley v. Acc. Ins. Co., 109 App. Div. 394, 96 N. Y. Supp. 282; Campbell v. Ins. Co., 109 Ky. 661, 60 S. W. 492; 3 Joyce, Insurance, § 2612; 2 May, Insurance, § 531.

McKINNEY v. DUNCAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. April 29, 1909.)

1. EASEMENTS (§ 5*)—PRESCRIPTION.

To acquire an easement by prescription, there must be an uninterrupted user in the land of another for at least 20 years under an adverse claim of right, while all persons concerned in the estate in or out of which it is derived are free from disability to resist it and are seised of the estate in fee and in possession during the requisite period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. EASEMENTS (§ 10*)—PRESCRIPTION—RIGHT OF WAY.

Where complainant's only claim to a right of way over land was based on the fact that he had used the way continually for 30 years without objection from any one, and that he had obtained leave from the husband of a life tenant, who was in possession of the land, to repair the road in 1874, but he did not claim an express grant of the road, and there was no proof that he had ever asserted an adverse claim to it until shortly before it was closed, and it appeared that the land was in the possession of a life tenant from 1870 to 1900, after which others were in possession for only 8 years before suit was brought, he had no easement by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 27-32; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. DEDICATION (§ 1*)—NATURE.

Dedication is the appropriation or gift by the owner of land or an easement therein for the use of the public, and it may be express, where the appropriation is formally declared, or by implication arising by operation of law from the owner's conduct and the facts and circumstances of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1908-1917; vol. 8, pp. 7629-7630.]

4. DEDICATION (§ 15*)—IMPLIED DEDICATION—INTENT OF OWNER.

To establish dedication by implication there must be proof of facts from which it positively and unequivocally appears that the owner intended to permanently part with his property and vest it in the public, and that there is no other reasonable explanation of his conduct; the question being one of the owner's intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

5. DEDICATION (§ 15*)—IMPLIED DEDICATION.

The mere fact that persons living in the neighborhood of a tract of uninclosed and unimproved woodland had been allowed to use a pass-way across it, repairing it from time to time, without interruption for 30 years, does not show an intention of the owners to dedicate the way to the public use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

6. DEDICATION (§ 13*)—IMPLIED DEDICATION—ACTS OF LIFE TENANT—EFFECT ON REMAINDERMEN.

Any acts of a life tenant of land respecting a dedication thereof would not affect the remaindermen, as the life tenant could not dedicate any interest in the fee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

7. EASEMENTS (§ 18*)—RIGHT OF WAY—WAY OF NECESSITY.

The fact that the only means of exit from a person's land to a public highway is over the land of another would give him no right to use the other's land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Bill by Samuel C. McKinney against Cannon Duncan and others. From a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, affirming a decree of the chancery court of Knox county for complainant, defendants bring certiorari. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

J. C. Ford, for plaintiff. John W. Green and Pickle, Turner & Kennerly, for defendant Duncan.

SHIELDS, J. This bill was brought by complainant, McKinney, asserting the right to use and enjoy a right of way and road over a tract of land belonging to the defendants Duncan and Shipe, and to enjoin them from obstructing it. The chancellor sustained the bill and granted the relief prayed, and on appeal the decree pronounced by him was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals. The defendants have brought the cause to this court by certiorari and assigned errors.

Complainant claims the right to use the road in question upon two distinct grounds: Prescription, arising from continuous user for more than 20 years; and dedication by the owners of the property to the public—claims somewhat inconsistent in their nature. The facts disclosed by the record are substantially as follows:

Complainant owns a tract of land in Knox county upon which he has resided for some 30 years. The defendants' land, upon which the road is claimed, is situated between that of complainant and the public road known as the "Nance's Ferry road." It is open woodland, which has never been improved or inclosed, and was formerly a part of a larger tract in which Mrs. Crawford, wife of C. Y. Crawford, had an estate for her life; the fee belonging to her children. Mrs. Crawford was married previous to 1870, and continued under coverture to her death, about 8 years since. Partition of the land was then had among the remaindermen, and the part now owned by the defendants was decreed to the heirs at law of Mrs. Gill, a daughter of Mrs. Crawford, who died covert before her mother. The record does not show how the defendants acquired title, or the ages of the children of Mrs. Gill.

The road in controversy is the only one open to complainant and those living near him from their lands to the Nance's Ferry road. They have used it in going to church, school, and other places in the neighborhood in that direction, and the city of Knoxville, continuously, for some 30 years, repairing it from time to time, for their own convenience, without objection from any one, until the defendants inclosed the land, about the time this suit was brought. Complainant says he obtained permission from C. Y. Crawford, in 1874, to repair this road, and this seems to be about all that ever passed in relation to it between the owners of the land and those using it. Complainant does not claim an express grant of the road claimed by him, and there is no proof that he ever asserted a right to it, adverse to the owners, until shortly before it was closed; nor is there any proof of an express dedication to the public. The road was not opened by the county authorities, and they have never repaired or exercised any authority over it.

We think that these facts are insufficient to support complainant's claim to an easement of a right of way by prescription.

The doctrine of prescription is clearly stated in the case of Saunders v. Simpson, 97 Tenn. 385, 37 S. W. 196, in these words:

"To give user this effect [prescriptive right] it must be uninterrupted in the land of another by the acquiescence of the owner for a period of at least 20 years under an adverse claim of right, while all persons concerned in the estate in or out of which it is derived are free from disability to resist it and are seized of the same in fee and in possession during the requisite period. Where all these circumstances concur, it raises prima facie evidence of a right to such easement acquired by a grant which is now lost. Thus there may be two distinct estates, and the owner of the one may have claimed and exercised the right of passing over the other for a period of time ordinarily requisite to give a right of way, but would fail thereby to create a presumption of a grant, if the servient estate during that period, or any considerable part of it, had belonged to a minor, or was in possession of a lessee, or one under a disability, like a married woman. The law would never presume a grant from the apparent acquiescence of one who could not have made it, or had no right to oppose the user from which it was sought to be inferred."

Complainant, therefore, to establish a prescriptive right to the easement claimed, must show that, during the 20 years he used the road, the owners of the land were capable of contracting and granting the easement, that they had the estate in the land which he claims to have acquired, and that his use of the road was under a claim of right in himself and adverse to the true owners of the property. This he has not done.

Mrs. Crawford, who was in possession of the land from 1870 to 1900, was during all that time under the disability of coverture. She only had a life estate, and could not have conveyed the land, or an interest therein, for a longer period, and, of course, complainant, by prescription against her, could not have acquired more than she could expressly grant. The heirs of Mrs. Gill are not proven to have arrived at their majority, and capable of contracting and conveying an interest in the land. Aside from this, they, and the defendants, had been in possession only 8 years before this suit was brought, a period insufficient to raise a presumption of a grant.

Complainant has also failed to show that his use of the road was under a claim of right, hostile and adverse to Mrs. Crawford, the Gill heirs, or the defendants. This, of itself, is fatal to his claim of title by prescription. Sharp v. Mynatt, 1 Lea, 375.

We are also of the opinion that the complainant has not made out a case of dedication of the road to the public. Dedication is the appropriation or gift by the owner of land, or an easement therein, for the use of the public. It may be express, where the appropriation is formally declared, or by implication arising by operation of law from the conduct of the owner and the facts and circumstances of the case. To establish it by implication, there must be proof of facts from which it positively and unequivocally appears that the owner intended to permanently part with his property and vest it in the public, and that there can be no other reasonable explanation of his conduct. In other words, dedication is a question of intention, and the intent must be clearly and satisfactorily proven.

In the case of Jackson v. State, 6 Cold. 532, it is said:

"Dedication of a road to the public use over the waste and unclosed lands of an individual ought not to be inferred from bare use alone. Thus, where a road has been in existence for more than 50 years, and had originally passed entirely through woodland the jury were instructed that the mere use by the public, however uninterrupted and long-continued, would be insufficient to constitute it a public road, but must be accompanied by facts which show the use to have been claimed as a right, and not by permission of the owner, such as working on it, keeping it in repair, and requiring the removal of obstructions. Thus it has been held that the fact that a farmer leaves a lane through his farm for his own convenience, and permits the public to use it as a highway for 15 years, does not warrant the inference of dedication. An intention to dedicate must be obvious, and the same act which would warrant the inference in cities and towns would be quite insufficient in sparsely agricultural districts."

The case of Worth v. Dawson, 1 Sneed, 59, is to the same effect. It is there said:

"There is no evidence in this record showing a dedication by the owner of the way in question to the use of the public, or of any such intention on his part. The proof establishes nothing more than a mere license or permission of the owner to the inhabitants of a local neighborhood to use the pathway as a matter of favor and convenience; and such use being only by sufferance, during the pleasure of the owner, he had a right to put an end to it at any moment. No use or acceptance of the way by the public is shown, nor any recognition of it by the county court. That a right of way may be claimed by a dedication to the public use by the owner of the soil is not denied, but with us this doctrine must be cautiously admitted. Its too easy application would defeat the right of the owner of the soil to have compensation for the damages sustained by laying out a road over his land, to which he is entitled when such road is laid out by the proper authorities."

Complainant does not claim an express dedication from any of the successive owners of the land, but an implied one, because he and others living in the neighborhood were allowed to use this passway, repairing it from time to time for this purpose, without interruption, for 30 years. This is all of their case. The strip of land over which the road runs was uninclosed and in woods, and the most that can be said is that while in that condition the owners did not object to the use of it by the public. They merely permitted the use of it temporarily as a matter of favor. This is common in every part of this state, where there are uninclosed lands, and no intention upon the part of the owners to appropriate them to the public use can be implied from such conduct. They have the right at any time to inclose them and forbid further use by the public.

The use of this road was also, for the most part, during the existence of the life estate of Mrs. Crawford, and what occurred during that time cannot in any way affect the remaindermen, or those holding under them. A tenant for life cannot dedicate any interest in the fee.

It is immaterial that the road is the only one that the complainant has to the public highway or other places in that neighborhood. This gives him no right to use the property of the defendants. Private property cannot be taken and appropriated to the use of another, however convenient and necessary it may be to him. It cannot be taken for public use without proper proceedings for condemnation, and compensation made.

The decree of the chancellor and that of the Court of Civil Appeals are therefore reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

1. WILLS (§ 616*)—CONSTRUCTION—LIFE ESTATE—POWER OF DISPOSITION—EFFECT.

Testator, to afford his wife a "suitable and secure support" during her life, devised to her for her natural life all his property, to manage and use for her support, and at her death to be divided among testator's lawful heirs, and gave his wife power to sell any of the property for the "aforesaid use," but restricted her from selling realty in S. unless in her judgment her support absolutely required it. It also declared that, if the profits in her judgment were insufficient, then she could convert to her use so much of the estate as would be sufficient for her support, the balance to belong to testator's estate at her death. Held, that the widow took a life estate, with a limited power of disposition, and not a fee.

2. LIFE ESTATES (§ 11*)—RIGHTS OF LIFE TENANT—REMAINDERMEN.

Testator, to afford his wife a suitable support for life, devised to her for her life all his property, to use "for her support during such time," and at her death directed that the property should be divided among his heirs. Held, that the widow held the property during her life in trust to use for her support, and was bound to preserve that portion of the estate which she did not require for her support for testator's heirs.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Knox County; Joseph W. Sneed, Chancellor.

Suit by W. B. Emert and others against Hugh G. Blair and others. Judgment for complainants, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Pickle, Turner & Kennerly, for appellants. Jerome Templeton and W. G. Caton, for appellees.

McALISTER, J. Complainants, who are the heirs at law of John B. Emert, deceased, bring this bill against the heirs at law of his widow, Martha J. Emert, to recover certain property alleged to belong to the estate of the said John B. Emert, deceased. Complainants claim the property under the will of the said John B. Emert, while the defendants claim the property as the heirs at law and distributees of Martha J. Emert, deceased, widow of John B. Emert. The deceased, John B. Emert, left a widow surviving him, viz., Martha J. Emert, but no surviving children. The complainants are F. L. Emert, Sr., a surviving brother of John B. Emert, deceased, and certain children and descendants of children of brothers and sisters of the said John B. Emert.

As already stated, the defendants to this bill are the only heirs at law of the said Martha J. Emert, deceased. The contention of complainants is that under the will of John B. Emert, deceased, the widow, Martha J. Emert, only took a life estate in his property, and upon her death the estate was to be divided among his heirs at law and distributees, according to the laws of descent and distribution.

The contention on behalf of the defendants is that under the proper construction of the will of John B. Emert, deceased, his widow, Martha J. Emert, deceased, took an absolute title to all of the property therein devised, and that upon her death it descended to her distributees and heirs at law, under the laws of Tennessee.

It is obvious, therefore, that the questions presented must be determined upon the proper construction of the last will and testament of said John B. Emert, deceased, which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"First. All my just debts shall be paid.

"Second. In order to afford my wife, Mrs. Martha J. Emert, a comfortable and secure support during her life out of my estate, I hereby devise and bequeath to her, for the term of her natural life, all my property, real, personal and mixed, to have, manage and use for her support during said time. At her death said property shall be divided among my lawful heirs and distributees, according to the laws of inheritance and distribution in Tennessee.

"Third. To more effectually provide for my said wife, I hereby invest her with power to sell and convey any of said property for the use aforesaid. This power is given because some of said realty consists of mountain farms which may fail to sufficiently contribute to my wife's support. My realty in Sevierville my wife shall not sell, unless, in her judgment, her support absolutely requires the same. Any of my other realty my wife may sell if in her judgment she can then make said property more conducive to her support. In case of sale of any of said realty, the proceeds shall be loaned out with good security or reinvested, the interest or income to be applied to her support, the principal or property so purchased to belong to my estate. But if my wife's comfortable support should in her judgment demand an appropriation by her of part or all of said principal or property, she is hereby vested with such power.

"Fourth. Only such of my personal property shall be sold by my executors in administering my estate as shall meet the approbation of my wife. She shall at once have the possession and use of the balance. Any money, after paying debts and expenses in administration, my wife may use as provided for as to proceeds of realty.

"Fifth. That there may be no mistake, I here again direct that, at my wife's death, the realty unsold of my estate or, in case my wife exercises the power of sale herein conferred, the proceeds of such sale or sales or the property purchased thereby in case of reinvestment or the remainder of the principal, if any, of the proceeds, in case the principal is diminished, shall belong to my estate, and shall be divided among my lawful heirs and distributees according to the laws of inheritance and distribution in Tennessee.

"My intention is to give my wife the use of my entire estate for her support during her life, or if the profits of my estate are in her judgment insufficient, then to give her the right to convert to her own use so much of my estate as will be sufficient for that purpose, but the balance, if any, to belong to my estate at her death, in whatsoever shape it may be found.

"Sixth. I hereby nominate and appoint my said wife executrix and M. W. McCown executor of this my last will and testament. I specially request said McCown to give his attention to the management of said realty outside of Sevierville and to the protection of the same.

"After my debts have been paid, those due me collected, and the administration of the personality completed, and my entire estate is ready to be turned over to the quiet enjoyment of my said wife, the said M. W. McCown may in his discretion resign, and my wife thereafter exempted from settlements."

Now it is insisted on behalf of the heirs at law of Martha J. Emert, deceased, that while, in the first clause of the will, the testator devises all of his property, real and personal, to his wife, Martha J. Emert, for the term of her natural life, by the subsequent clauses of the will the power of absolute disposition of the entire property was conferred on the widow, and that thus her life estate was enlarged into a fee. The argument is that by the terms of the will she is authorized to sell and consume for her support, not only the income and profits of the estate, but, at her will and discretion, the entire corpus. It is said that she is made the exclusive and absolute judge of the advisability or necessity of converting the real estate and of using and consuming the personal assets and the proceeds of the realty. Especial attention is called to the following language of the will, wherein it is provided, after mentioning his realty in Sevierville, as follows:

"Any of my other realty my wife may sell if in her judgment she can then make said property more conducive to her support."

Again:

"But if my wife's comfortable support should in her judgment demand an appropriation by her of part or all of said principal or property, she is hereby vested with such power."

In the fourth clause power is conferred on his wife to make the same use of the personal estate.

Again in the fifth clause he says:

"My intention is to give my wife the use of my entire estate for her support during her life, or if the profits of my estate are in her judgment insufficient, then to give her the right to convert to her own use so much of my estate as will be sufficient for that purpose, but the balance, if any, to belong to my estate at her death, in whatsoever shape it may be found."

Attention is called to the language of the sixth clause as follows:

"After my debts have been paid, those due me collected, and the administration of the personality completed, and my entire estate is ready to be turned over to the quiet enjoyment of my said wife, the said M. W. McCown may in his discretion resign, and my wife thereafter exempted from settlements."

Counsel cites in support of his contention Bradley v. Carnes, 94 Tenn. 27, 27 S. W. 1007, 45 Am. St. Rep. 696; Brien v. Robinson, 102 Tenn. 157, 52 S. W. 802; Bean v. Myers, 41 Tenn. 226; Meacham v. Graham, 98 Tenn. 190, 39 S. W. 12; Clark v. Hill, 98 Tenn. 300, 39 S. W. 339; Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 74 Tenn. 402.

These cases settle the principle that, if the first taker is given an estate in fee or for life, coupled with an unlimited power of disposition, the fee or absolute estate vests in the first taker, and the limitation over is void. We are of opinion, however, that these cases are not applicable in the present instance, since the power of disposition conferred on the widow is restricted, and qualifies the right of sale to the express purpose of providing a support for the wife during her life. The rule is that, if the power is dependent upon a contingency, or if the power be definitely qualified, the estate of the first taker is limited to life, and the remainder over takes effect. Bradley v. Carnes, 94 Tenn. 36, 27 S. W. 1007, 45 Am. St. Rep. 696.

An analysis of the will of John B. Emert will show:

(1) The widow is given a life estate in all of his property.

(2) A limited power is conferred on her to sell to secure a support.

(3) A limitation over to the testator's heirs.

(4) An express power is conferred on the widow to sell for her own support or for reinvestment.

It will be observed that the second clause of the will contains this language:

"In order to afford my wife, Mrs. Martha J. Emert, a comfortable and secure support during her life out of my estate, I hereby devise and bequeath to her, for the time of her natural life, all my property, real, personal and mixed, to have, manage, and use for her support during said time. At her death said property shall be divided among my lawful heirs and distributees, according to the laws of inheritance and distribution in Tennessee."

It is shown by the next clause that a power of sale is conferred on the widow to provide funds for her support, and is therefore a restricted, and not unlimited, power of sale.

The third clause is:

"To more effectually provide for my said wife, I hereby invest her with power to sell and convey any of said property for the use aforesaid. This power is given because some of said realty consists of mountain farms which may fail to sufficiently contribute to my wife's support. My realty in Sevierville my wife shall not sell, unless, in her judgment, her support absolutely requires the same. Any of my other realty my wife may sell if in her judgment she can then make said property more conducive to her support. In case of sale of any of said realty, the proceeds shall be loaned out with good security or reinvested, the interest or income to be applied to her support, the principal or property so purchased to belong to my estate. But if my wife's comfortable support should in her judgment demand an appropriation by her of part or all of said principal or property, she is hereby vested with such power."

The fifth clause provides as follows:

"That there may be no mistake, I here again direct that, at my wife's death, the realty unsold of my estate or, in case my wife exercises the power of sale herein conferred, the proceeds of such sale or sales or the property purchased thereby in case of reinvestment or the remainder of the principal, if any, of the proceeds, in case the principal is diminished, shall belong to my estate, and shall be divided among my lawful heirs and distributees according to the laws of inheritance and distribution in Tennessee."

"My intention is to give my wife the use of my entire estate for her support during her life, or if the profits of my estate are in her judgment insufficient, then to give her the right to convert to her own use so much of my estate as will be sufficient for that purpose, but the balance, if any, to belong to my estate at her death, in whatsoever shape it may be found."

In Pillow v. Rye, 31 Tenn. 186, the will provided:

"It is my intention to provide for the comfort and independence of my daughter, Martha W. Keeble, during her natural life"—specifying the property and money which are bequeathed to her.

The will then proceeds:

"But it is my will and intention that said property and money shall be for her sole and separate use during her natural life, free from any debts and charges of any future husband she may have."

The will further provides:

"My object is to make provision for her, and not to postpone her interest to those of my remoter descendants, and if for any cause it becomes necessary for her and her comfort to sell any portion of the principal it is my wish that it shall be done."

Notwithstanding the power of disposal contained in the will, it was held the daughter took only a life estate. Judge McKinney said:

"The assumption that the clause of the will under consideration confers any such unlimited power of disposal is wholly unfounded. The intention of Mrs. Cooke (the testatrix) is too obvious to admit of any doubt. Her purpose was to make a comfortable provision for her daughter during her life in every event that might happen.

* * * The power of sale conferred upon the life tenant is perfectly consistent with the general restriction upon the life owner, and equally consistent with the limitation over, which vests the remainder, subject to be divested as far forth as, upon the happening of the contingency, necessity may demand. This qualification or exception, so far from conferring an unlimited power of disposal, the more clearly excludes all idea of such intention. We hold, therefore, that under the foregoing clause of the will Mrs. Keeble takes only a life estate, with a limited power of disposal, upon the happening of the contingency referred to in the will."

In Downing v. Johnson, 45 Tenn. 230, the will provided:

"I will and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sallie Johnson, the whole of my estate, both real and personal, choses in action, etc., for and during her natural life, to be by her freely possessed and enjoyed."

Another clause provided:

"The balance of my property, money or other effects that may be on hand, at the death of my wife, I dispose of in the following manner"—making specific bequests.

Construing this will, this court said:

"We think it was most clearly the intention of the testator to provide for the support and maintenance of his wife out of his property, and to that end he gave her a life estate in it, and declared that it should be freely possessed and enjoyed by her; and, as if anticipating the corpus of a portion of it at least must be consumed by his wife in her support and maintenance in her declining years, he only gives such balance as may be on hand at the death of his wife in remainder. Therefore Sallie Johnson, the defendant, is, under the will of her deceased husband, entitled to the possession, use, and enjoyment, during her life, of all the property belonging to her husband at the time of his death, and if her support and maintenance, in her discretion, require it, she may consume the corpus of the entire estate, except the land; and, should there be any balance on hand at the death of the wife, it passes, under the will, to the remaindermen."

In McGavock v. Pugsley, 59 Tenn. 690, the will provided:

"To my beloved wife, Eliza Pugsley, I give and bequeath all the remainder of my estate, of whatsoever kind, real and personal, to be used and enjoyed by her during her natural life, hereby authorizing her to sell or dispose of the same in any way she may deem necessary for the convenience and support of herself and our two daughters; and if at the death of my said wife any part or portion of my said property or effects shall remain, the same to be equally divided between our said daughters or their representatives."

The court said:

"What is the proper construction of the will we have cited? Does the wife take an absolute estate in it by virtue of the power of disposal therein contained, or is it so qualified and limited that the remainder may take effect?"

It was held that the power of sale was to be exercised only when deemed necessary for the convenience and support of herself and the two children, and was not an unlimited power of disposal. The court sustained the validity of the gift over in remainder. Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. Ed. 322.

It is unnecessary to cite other cases, since we think the principles enunciated in the foregoing citations are conclusive on the questions presented on this will, and show that the widow had only a limited power of disposition for a definite and prescribed purpose, and that therefore the remainder over to the testator's heirs was good.

In order to understand and intelligently decide the questions raised on the assignments of error, it will be necessary to make a further statement of fact.

It appears that John B. Emert departed this life about the 10th day of April, 1884, leaving the will in question, wherein he appointed M. W. McCown executor and his widow, Martha J. Emert, executrix, but neither qualified as such, and one R. H. Andes qualified as administrator with the will annexed. It appears that he paid to the widow in various installments from time to time the sum of $2,189.40 out of the personal assets of the estate. On the 8th day of April, 1884, a few days before his death, the testator entered into a partnership contract with two of his nephews, F. L. Emert, Jr., and W. W. Emert. The contract was in writing, and the salient features are:

(1) That the business was to continue for a term of five years, beginning May 1, 1884, under the firm name and style of Emert & Emert Bros.

(2) John B. Emert to furnish the capital of $4,500 and storehouse and furniture rent free during the term of the partnership.

(3) F. L. and W. W. Emert were to conduct the business, devoting their entire time and attention to it.

(4) John B. Emert was permitted to withdraw from the business per year $600, while F. L. and W. W. Emert were limited to $300 each.

(5) The death of John B. Emert before or during said term of partnership shall not terminate the business, but it shall be continued by John B. Emert's personal representative until the expiration of said term of five years, when the business shall be closed and wound up as speedily as practicable.

(6) From the net assets shall be paid, first, to John B. Emert or his personal representative said original capital of $4,500, without interest, and the balance shall be distributed, one-half to said John B. Emert and one-fourth to F. L. and W. W. Emert each.

It appears the testator died before the partnership business was launched; but it was carried on under the terms of the partnership contract by the widow, Martha J. Emert, and the two nephews, for the period of five years, when it was closed and settled. The widow was paid the sum of $4,500, the amount of the original capital put in by John B. Emert, and also her one-half of the profits of the business, estimated at $3,200; but the exact amount of these profits does not definitely appear from the record.

It appears that during the continuation of this partnership the widow also engaged in a logging business as a separate and independent undertaking, and realized profits therefrom which are estimated at $1,600. She also engaged in mercantile business on her own account with one of the nephews of J. B. Emert, and afterwards with one of her own nephews, in which it is claimed she made profits; but the exact amount does not appear.

It further appears that on June 6, 1889, the widow loaned to J. C. J. Williams $6,000, evidenced by his note of $6,480, maturing two years from date, with interest, which was secured by a deed of trust on certain lands in Knoxville, Tenn. It is a controverted question on the record whether this loan to Gen. Williams was made from money of the estate of John B. Emert or from the individual means of said widow. It is suggested by counsel for defendant that it is probable that it was derived from both sources. The loan was made in the widow's individual name, and the estate does not appear to be connected with it on the face of the papers. Gen. Williams made default in the payment of this loan, and there was a foreclosure of the deed of trust, and at the sale the property was bid in by Mrs. Emert for her own use for the sum of $4,680. The sale was confirmed, and the title was regularly divested and vested in Mrs. Emert. It appears that Mrs. Emert afterwards sold off a portion of this Williams land, and received about $7,000 in money and notes from the sales made, and at the time of her death she still owned portions of this land.

It also appears, from an exhibit to defendant's answer, that at the date of her death the said widow had on hand in the shape of a certificate of deposit, representing money in bank, and also notes for money loaned out, about $6,301.62.

It thus appears that when Mrs. Emert died she had on hand in money and in notes the total sum of $12,525.62. It also appears that after the death of the testator the widow sold two pieces of unimproved land belonging to the estate—one for $15, October 31, 1893, and the other for $500, January 11, 1905. It does not appear what disposition was made of the proceeds of these sales, but they do not appear to have been reinvested. There is proof in the record tending to show that Mrs. Emert had been advised that she had title to the personal estate and to the proceeds of the real estate sold by her, and that she could make any disposition of it she saw proper.

On the final hearing the chancellor decreed as follows:

"(1) That under said will Mrs. Martha J. Emert took only a life estate in the property of her husband, John B. Emert, and that all of said estate, including all accretions and profits made thereon by her and all property acquired by her out of its assets, and said accretions and profits passed on her death to his heirs; that she only had the right to her support out of said estate; and that all property purchased by her became a part of said estate and passed under said will, together with all of its profits, income, and increase.

"(2) That the widow accepted the benefits of said will, and became thereby a trustee under it, and was bound to execute the trust on behalf of said testator's heirs.

"(3) That neither she nor her personal representative was bound to account for what she had used and consumed of said estate.

"(4) That said Williams land was purchased by her in trust for said estate, and that, in so far as the same had not been sold by her, she held it in trust for the complainants, and that said land, as well as the money and other property on hand at her death, passed to complainants.

"(5) That the suit brought by the defendants for the partition of said land among themselves as her heirs be enjoined.

"(6) That defendants be enjoined from setting up or claiming title to said Williams lands.

"(7) That a true statement of the property received by her administrator and her agent had been rendered, and that all of said property had been derived from the estate of John B. Emert and belonged to his heirs and distributees, and that, if the widow had a separate estate, the amount of it had not been shown, and that it had been mingled with the estate of John B. Emert, and could not now be separated, and the same would pass to complainants; that no account with the defendants was necessary, but writ of possession was awarded of all property and assets in their hands."

It should have been stated that during the progress of the cause a receiver was appointed, and the administrator of Mrs. Emert and her agent and attorney in fact, who had possession of a part of her assets, were ordered to turn the same over to the receiver, which was done.

The defendants appealed from the decree of the chancellor, and have made 11 assignments of error.

We have already disposed of the first assignment of error, and held that Mrs. Emert, the widow, took only a life estate, and not the absolute fee in the property devised by her husband.

The next assignment is that the chancellor erred in holding that the widow was an active trustee for the management of said estate for the benefit of said remaindermen, and that all the income, interest, profits, and increase of said estate, together with all property which she purchased with its assets, and its proceeds, profits, income, and increase, inured to the benefit of and passed to said remaindermen. It is said there is nothing in the will indicating that the testator intended to impose upon his widow the burden of a trusteeship for his heirs, or any duty to increase and accumulate said estate for their benefit. It is claimed that, so far from this purpose being disclosed, it distinctly appears that the comfort and support of his widow was a matter of deep solicitude to the testator, and to that end he gave her the use of all of his property, and authorized her, if her necessities required, in the exercise of her own discretion, to use the corpus of said estate. As an evidence of the testator's intention to allow his wife to use all of his property, he speaks of the time when his entire estate is ready to be turned over to the quiet enjoyment of his said wife, and that thereafter his wife will be exempted from settlements.

In the case of King v. Sharp, 25 Tenn. 55, a tenant for life is held to be quasi trustee for the remaindermen, and that "he may dispose of the property at pleasure, so that he does not thereby injure the inheritance in the remainder. The tenant is to have this amount to be used for his benefit during life, but so to be used as that the property shall not be destroyed and the remainder defeated.

In Vaden v. Vaden, 38 Tenn. 450, in referring to Bonner v. Bonner, 26 Tenn. 436, the court said:

"It was argued by counsel in that case, as it is here, upon the authority of King v. Sharp, 25 Tenn. 55, and other authorities, that the tenant for life was entitled to have the original fund, or the property, or that in which it might be invested, or for which it was exchanged, at his election, upon the general principle on that subject applicable to trustees and beneficiaries. But that argument was considered unsound by the court.

* * *

"He [the life tenant] may use it, and make all the profit that he can, with due regard to its safety and protection. To that extent he may be called trustee; but he is not so in the sense of a pure trust, as a personal representative, guardian, etc. In cases of pure trusts, the fund is held solely for the benefit of the cestui que trust; but a tenant for life has a limited interest in the fund, with a right to use and enjoy the profits of it, without accounting for the same to any person. If a fund be given to a person for life, with remainder over to another, the tenant for life has the right to use and employ said fund in any way he chooses, if he does not endanger its safety. If the tenant for life invests the fund in the purchase of slaves or other property, the title vests absolutely in him. The remainderman has no right to or interest in the property, except so far as it may be held upon a bill for that purpose as a security for the fund."

In the Vaden Case it was held that in case of investment of money held for a party for life in slaves the remainderman had no right to the slaves so purchased, but only to the money so invested, at the termination of the life estate, that the holder of the life estate is not a trustee for the remaindermen as a guardian, personal representative, or pure trustee is, and the fund could not be followed in its new form.

In Adylett v. Swope, 1 Shan. Cas. 447, it was held:

"Where the life tenant of a fund invests the fund or exchanges the property which he holds subject to a remainder in other property, this property does not take the place of the funds so invested in it, and the remainderman is not entitled to elect whether he will take the fund or the property purchased with it. He is entitled only to the money invested in it at the termination of the life estate." McHaney v. McNelly, 57 Tenn. 539.

In Swan v. Finney, 63 Tenn. 30, it was held:

"On the first hypothesis—that is, investment by the life tenant of money, in which said party had only a life interest, in lands—it is settled by the authorities, and probably on sound principle, that no trust results or is allowable in favor of parties having remainder interest"—citing Vaden v. Vaden, 38 Tenn. 444.

It is further said that the tenant for life is entitled absolutely to the entire fruits of the life estate. Forsey v. Luton, 39 Tenn. 183; Vancil v. Evans, 44 Tenn. 345; Hunt v. Watkins, 20 Tenn. 498.

It is said, however, that the principle announced in these cases is not applicable in the present instance, since under the will of John B. Emert a life estate was given the widow in his property for a comfortable and secure support, and that the widow had no right to use any part of the estate, except for this specific purpose.

We are constrained to hold that this is the proper construction of John B. Emert's will. This purpose is disclosed everywhere in the will, and we find no provision under which she can take any part of the estate, except for the purpose of a comfortable and secure support. This purpose is disclosed in the first item of the will, namely:

"In order to afford my wife, Mrs. Martha J. Emert, a comfortable and secure support during her life out of my estate, I hereby devise and bequeath to her, for the term of her natural life, all my property, real, personal and mixed, to have, manage and use for her support during said time."

He then proceeds to devise the remainder of his estate, after his wife's death, as follows, viz.:

"At her death said property shall be divided among my lawful heirs or distributees, according to the laws of inheritance and distribution in Tennessee."

The devise to the wife is coupled with the limitation that she is to "manage it and use it for her support" during said time, and no purpose is disclosed to give her any part of the estate absolutely for any other purpose. It is very clear, therefore, that all the personal property and proceeds from the sale of real estate held by her at her death, and which was necessary for her support, passed with the corpus of the estate to the remaindermen. The limited power of disposition of the estate conferred upon her was for the purpose of securing to her a comfortable and secure support during her life, and except for this purpose and for the purpose of reinvestment she had no power to convert the real estate or to appropriate the personal property.

An examination of the cases cited by counsel for defendant in support of the proposition that Martha J. Emert became the absolute owner of the rents, income, profits, and increase of the estate of her husband shows that they are cases where an absolute life estate had been given in specific property; but in the present case the property is devised to the wife for a specific purpose, and she is nowhere authorized to receive or use any part of the property except for this purpose. The widow, therefore, holds the property in trust "to have, manage and use for her support during her life."

Mrs. Emert, by accepting the benefits of the estate of her husband, was thereby constituted a trustee to manage said property, collect rents, sell property for reinvestment for the purpose of securing for herself a comfortable support out of the estate, and to preserve that portion of the estate which she did not require for herself for the heirs of John B. Emert. The fifth clause of the will clearly discloses the purpose for which his wife should hold his estate, as follows:

"That there may be no mistake, I here again direct that at my wife's death the realty unsold of my estate or, in case my wife exercises the power of sale herein conferred, the proceeds of such sale or sales or the property purchased thereby in case of reinvestment or the remainder of the principal, if any, in case the principal is diminished, shall belong to my estate, and shall be divided among my lawful heirs," etc.

The testator again discloses the twofold purpose for which his wife could hold his property, as follows:

"My intention is to give my wife the use of my entire estate for her support during her life, * * * to belong to my estate at her death, in whatsoever shape it may be found."

It is true that under this will the amount required for the support of the widow is left entirely to her judgment and discretion, but after she has been provided a comfortable support, all that remains on hand at her death under the express terms of the will, passes to the remaindermen.

It is suggested on the record that the widow had a separate estate of her own, independent of anything that she acquired from the estate of her husband; but there is no proof that will justify the court in holding that any of the funds on hand at the death of the widow or real estate held in her name was acquired by her as a separate estate. We are of opinion that the J. C. J. Williams tract of land was purchased with funds belonging to the estate of John B. Emert, and that the chancellor was correct in holding that the notes due from the purchasers of this land, and on hand at the death of Mrs. Emert, and also the unsold land on said tract, passed to the estate of John B. Emert. It is unnecessary to go into the details of the property on hand at the death of the widow, since our examination of it has satisfied us that it was all acquired from the estate of her husband, and that there is no provision in the will under which the widow could hold it, except for the purposes of support.

It results, in our opinion, the decree of the chancellor was correct, and it is in all respects affirmed. We think, however, this is a proper case for the construction of the will of John B. Emert, and that the costs should be paid out of the estate, and we so decree.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. May 1, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTION—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Evidence in an action by a servant for personal injuries held to require a directed verdict for defendant, for failure to prove negligence by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 77*)—PRESUMPTIONS—FAILURE TO CALL WITNESSES.

Where plaintiff in an action for personal injuries fails to make out a case, it is not incumbent on defendant to introduce any evidence; and hence no presumption of fact arises from failure of defendant to call certain witnesses of the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 97; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 236*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—OPERATION OF RAILROAD.

It is the duty of a brakeman, ordered to go forward and flag an expected train, to look and listen continuously so long as he is on the track, and his failure so to do is such contributory negligence as will defeat his action for negligence of the crew of the approaching train, unless they see him and can prevent the accident, but fail to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 739, 740; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—OPERATION OF RAILROAD.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 202*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—OPERATION OF RAILROAD—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANTS.

Where such brakeman falls asleep on the track, or so near thereto as to be within the sweep of the train, it is the duty of such train crew to make every effort in their power to stop the train and prevent the accident, if they discover his peril; and an avoidable injury inflicted after such discovery is wanton and inexcusable.

C. H. Trimble, for plaintiff. Bell, Terry, Anderson & Bell, for defendants.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought in the circuit court of Shelby county to recover damages for an injury inflicted upon the defendant in error by plaintiff in error's railroad train, of which Forsyth was engineer, in the state of Mississippi. There was a demurrer, and judgment in the court below for $2,500, from which the plaintiff in error appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, and there the judgment was affirmed. A petition has been filed by the plaintiff in error in this court for the writ of certiorari to bring the case here for trial.

We have examined the case with care, and are convinced that both the circuit court and the Court of Civil Appeals committed error, and the judgment rendered by each of them must be reversed.

Only one witness testified, the defendant in error himself. He says that he had left Memphis on the previous night about 7:30 on one of plaintiff in error's trains, and had, with the train, reached, about daylight, or nearly daylight, a station known as Plantersville, in the state of Mississippi. There the train stopped for the purpose of meeting the north bound passenger train. He testified that his train was under orders to wait at that point for the passenger train, and that he was ordered by the conductor to go forward and notify the passenger train that the freight train was so heavy that it could not go in on the side track, which was down-grade, with any expectation of getting out again, and therefore that the passenger train must take the siding; that his duty under these orders was to go down with his red light, and his white light, and with torpedoes, and, after lining up the switch, to place torpedoes upon the track, and then retire further up the track, and, when he saw the passenger train coming, to signal to it with his red light, and then with his white light, and, when the train should be stopped, he was to go down and get on the engine, and let the engineer know what he was to do; that is, to go in upon the siding. He testified that he did line up the switch, and went some 10 or 12 telegraph poles down the track, and put out his torpedoes, and came back 2 or 3 telegraph poles to the switch, and set his red light and white light on the track. He says then: "I didn't feel sleepy. I sat on the end of the cross-ties and went to whittling with my knife, about 15 or 20 feet behind my lantern, and I dropped off to sleep, and that's the last I remember. * * * I was down on the end of the cross-ties, looking up the track the way the train was coming. * * * The next thing I remember after that, my arm was mashed up. Q. Where were you? A. I was at Plantersville. Q. Did anybody have you at the time you waked up? A. Mr. Forsyth had hold of me on one side, and I don't know who the other fellow was—a passenger off the train. Q. Is that the first you remember, some men had you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What time, about, was it that these men had you there, and your arm was cut off, and you waked up? A. I don't know the exact hour, but just about sunrise, I suppose." Cross-examination: "You sat down on the tie? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did your arm happen to get run over? A. How did it happen to get run over? Q. Yes. A. I don't know, sir. All I know the engine run over it. I was setting down on the end of the tie with my head on my hand, and before I knew anything it was mashed. Q. You were on the north side of the track? A. On the north side of the track."

This was all of the evidence upon the subject of how the accident occurred. There was a motion entered in the court below for a peremptory instruction in favor of the defendant. We think it should have been granted. It is impossible to say from this evidence, or to conjecture, when the defendant in error's arm fell upon the track. It may have been lying upon the track some time before the passenger train approached, or it may have fallen across the track immediately in front of the passenger train, too late for the engineer to see it, or to do anything towards preventing the accident. It does not appear that the defendant in error's body was close enough to the train to be struck; only his arm was crushed. As stated, it is impossible to say from this evidence that the employes on the passenger train were guilty of any sort of negligence. It was not incumbent upon the railway company to introduce evidence to show anything upon the subject, since the defendant below stopped short of making a case. Therefore no presumption of fact could arise from the failure of the engineer to testify, or from the failure of any employes to testify.

In addition to the view just stated, if we could assume from this evidence that the defendant in error had his arm lying upon the track at the time, and before, the passenger train approached, still he would not be entitled to recover. There is no averment or proof of the existence of any statute in Mississippi, similar to our statute, upon the subject of obstructions upon railroad tracks. Our cases, however, hold that the statutory provisions above referred to are but declaratory of common-law duties, except in respect of the burden of proof and the absolute liability imposed for failure to use the precautions referred to. *Railroad v. But it is also held that these requirements do not apply to the employes of the railroad company upon its track in the discharge of their duties. Railroad v. Holland, 117 Tenn. 257, 96 S. W. 758; Taylor v. Railroad Co., 93 Tenn. 305, 27 S. W. 663; Railroad v. Hicks, 89 Tenn. 301, 17 S. W. 1036; Railroad v. Rush, 15 Lea, 145; Railroad v. Robertson, 9 Helsk. 276; Haley v. M. & O. Railroad, 7 Baxt. 239; Railroad v. Burke, 6 Cold. 45. It has been specifically held that they do not apply to the case of a brakeman, who, while under the duty to go forward and flag an expected train, after setting his white and red lights upon the track, sits down upon the end of a cross-tie and goes to sleep in such a position as to be struck by the train which he was sent out to warn. Railroad v. Rush, supra. It is the duty of an employe having such commission to discharge to look and listen continuously so long as he is upon the track, and his failure to do so would constitute such contributory negligence on his part as would defeat his action for any negligence of the crew of the approaching train, unless they saw him on the track, and could have prevented the accident, and failed to do so. Taylor v. Railroad, supra; Railroad v. Hicks, supra. These principles are applicable under the common law. The servants of the railroad company in the conduct of an approaching train have the right to assume that a brakeman sent out to warn and signal the train will not go to sleep upon the track, but, on the contrary, that he will be alert and watchful in the discharge of his duties. However, if he should fall asleep upon the track, or negligently sit so near the track as to be within the sweep of the passing train, and there go to sleep, it would be the duty of the company's servants upon the advancing train to make every effort in their power to stop the train and prevent the accident, if they should discover his peril. An injury inflicted after such discovery would be wanton and inexcusable. When an employe, however, sent out to warn and stop an expected train, so far forgets his duty as to go to sleep upon the track, he cannot justly complain that the servants of the company on the train referred to were also negligent in failing to keep a proper lookout. He is bound to know that no one upon the approaching train could contemplate him as having abandoned his duty, and exposed himself to imminent and known danger by going to sleep upon the track, or so near it as to be struck by the train. We do not think this case is one for the application of what is called the "last clear chance doctrine," discussed in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals, and we express no opinion upon the merits of that doctrine.

We have not in this case applied the rule applicable to the negligence of fellow servants, since the declaration pleads and relies upon a statute of the state of Mississippi, where the accident occurred, which relieves the defendant in error of the disabilities arising out of such relation.

On the ground stated, the judgment of the circuit court and of the Court of Civil Appeals must be reversed, and the suit dismissed, with the costs of this court and of the court below.

McBURNY et al. v. GLENMARY COAL & COKE CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. May 10, 1909.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—CONVEYANCE—EFFECT.

While minerals may be by deed separated from the rest of the land, a conveyance of the minerals does not create a separate and distinct estate in the technical sense, but rather separates a part of the property from the remainder, and the right of ownership and control of the minerals is consistent with all other rights of ownership to the surface and other parts of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-165; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—CONVEYANCE OF PARTICULAR MINERAL—EFFECT.

Where a particular mineral is conveyed by a specific term, and not by a general term, only that mineral will pass, and all other minerals will remain with the property of the owner of the fee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 162; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—CONVEYANCE—REMOVAL OF MINERAL—EFFECT.

Where a mineral which has been conveyed is removed from the land, the owner of such mineral ceases to have any other rights in the land, which then belongs to the owner of the fee and surface.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

4. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 49*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION—POSSESSION BY GRANTOR—EFFECT AS TO GRANTEE.

The possession, by a grantor of a mineral interest and mining rights in property, of the surface, inures to the benefit of the grantee of such rights as against third parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

5. EASEMENTS (§ 18*)—WAY OF NECESSITY.

A grantee of minerals has no way of necessity over land of a stranger to remove such minerals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show title in defendant by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

7. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 68*)—DISCLAIMER—EFFECT.

Where, before the statutory period had run, one in possession of land disclaimed title, his possession thereafter was not adverse or under color of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 390; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1151*)—DISPOSITION OF CASE—RELIEF GRANTED—CONDITIONS—PAYMENT OF COSTS.

Though defendant in ejectment denied complainant's ownership generally and described a number of tracts which it averred it owned, instead of disclaiming as to the part it did not claim, where complainant failed in the trial court to ask that decree be rendered for him as to the tracts outside those claimed, such relief will be granted on appeal only on payment of costs by complainant.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Morgan County; D. L. Lansden, Chancellor.

Ejectment by Samuel McBurney and others against the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company and others. From a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals, affirming a decree dismissing the bill as to part of defendants, and for complainants as to the others, complainants and the latter defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

James A. Monroe, Lucky, Sanford & Fowler, and Brown & Cassell, for complainants. Templeton, Lindsay & Templeton and James F. Baker, for defendants.

McALISTER, J. This is an action of ejectment to recover of the defendant the coal in certain lands described in the pleadings. Complainants do not claim the surface, but only the coal mineral in a certain tract of land covered by grant No. 21,879, and entry No. 1,935. Complainants claim that they acquired this mineral interest as owners of entry No. 1,935 and grant No. 21,879, issued to Thomas B. Eastland on the 29th of January, 1838.

Complainants show a perfect title under his entry and grant to the lands containing the minerals involved in this controversy. The theory of the bill is that there had been a severance or segregation of the stone minerals in said land, and that the possession of the defendants had not been extended to or covered the stone mineral interests therein. It was alleged that defendant Edward R. Diden in 1851-1856 purchased from Jas. S. Duncan four different tracts of land lying within the boundaries of complainants' entry No. 1,935. These deeds describe one tract of 470 acres of land, another tract of 500 acres, and a tract of 400 acres, and a tract of about 500 acres of land, only a portion of which is situated within the complainants' title. These deeds describe the lands by metes and bounds, and purport to convey the entire fee from Jas. S. Duncan and Edw. R. Diden. It appears that Jas. S. Duncan purchased this land from one Julian F. Scott, who by his deed reserved the stone coal. The theory of the bill, therefore, is that the reservation of the stone coal in the deed from Julian F. Scott was a severance of the mineral estate from the surface right, and that therefore the person in possession under any of the deeds from John S. Diden only held the surface, and that his possession would not inure to the benefit of the mineral estate in the land. Complainants' original insistence in the present bill is that the possession of E. R. Diden of this land was a possession of the surface only, and not of the mineral, and that, since complainants' entry 1,935 and grant 21,879 constituted the oldest title appearing in the record, the mineral interest in said land was not barred by the adverse possession by Diden and his devisees.

This grant and the entry on which it is based include the lands in litigation. It appears that complainants have deraigned a perfect chain of title by connected mesne conveyances from the grantee to themselves.

Defendants, however, insist complainants are barred against a recovery of these lands because of defendant's possession under the statute of limitations.

It appears that in 1851-1856 Edward R. Diden purchased from one James S. Duncan four tracts of land lying within the boundaries of entry No. 1,935 and Eastland grant. Duncan, it appears, in 1851 obtained a deed for 2,000 acres from Julian F. Scott, to whom a grant for the same had been issued by the state on June 19, 1851. The four tracts of land purchased by Edward R. Diden from James S. Duncan comprised about 1,700 acres. The first of these tracts embraced 470 acres, and was acquired by E. R. Diden from J. S. Duncan on April 4, 1851. On May 7, 1852, Duncan executed to E. R. Diden a deed purporting to convey 500 acres. On March 1, 1855, Duncan executed to E. R. Diden a deed for a tract containing 400 acres. On February 13, 1856, Duncan executed a deed to E. R. Diden for three tracts, one of which lies outside the lands in controversy.

The Court of Chancery Appeals reports that James S. Duncan, from whom E. R. Diden had purchased these several tracts of land, is not affirmatively shown to have other title than the deed made by Julian F. Scott, which appears to be without date, but which is shown to have been acknowledged before the county court clerk of Morgan county on the 2d day of July, 1851.

It appears that the grant to Julian F. Scott was No. 27,992, based on entry 1,787. There was another grant, issued to Julian F. Scott, covering entry 2,281. The Court of Chancery Appeals was of opinion that it does not appear, by the description in Duncan's first deed to E. R. Diden, that the land conveyed was claimed under grant No. 27,992, the J. F. Scott grant; but, on the contrary, it is said to be a part of the grant No. 28,464 and a part of grant No. 27,739.

The deed made by Julian F. Scott to James S. Duncan, conveying lands estimated at 2,000 acres, appears to have been acknowledged on the 2d day of July, 1851, or subsequent to the date of James S. Duncan's first deed to E. R. Diden, which was on the 4th day of April, 1851. This deed from James S. Duncan to E. R. Diden describes the land by specific boundaries, with covenants of seisin and general warranty, and containing this clause, "excluding all the stone coal in said bounds." It appears that in none of the deeds of Duncan to E. R. Diden, and in no deed subsequent to the deed of Julian F. Scott to James S. Duncan, was any exception made as to the stone coal.

The Court of Chancery Appeals finds, Judge Barton delivering the opinion of the court, that E. R. Diden in 1850 or 1851 moved upon the tract of 470 acres described in the deed of April 4, 1851, from J. S. Duncan to E. R. Diden; that E. R. Diden cleared from 40 to 50 acres on said tract, and occupied it as a residence from that time until his death in 1871, and that during that time he was in the open, notorious, continuous, and peaceable possession of this place, holding it adversely to all the world; and that no part of this possession was outside of the 470-acre tract. That court further reports that:

"After the death of E. R. Diden in 1871, his son John S. Diden lived upon this place with his mother, the widow of E. R. Diden, until 1879, and that the possessions were still kept up on this place until about 1894, and that from April 4, 1851, until 1894, a period of more than 40 years, there was a continuous adverse possession of 40 or 50 acres of cleared land and improvements, and this possession was under the color of title of the deed from Duncan to E. R. Diden, dated 4th of April, 1851, which purports to convey an estate in fee."

Defendants contended in the court below that by certain acts of E. R. Diden his possession was extended by construction to the entire boundaries claimed by him under all five of the deeds executed to him by J. S. Duncan, comprising altogether 1,700 acres. On this subject the Court of Chancery Appeals finds as follows:

It further appears, and we find, that shortly after Diden procured his last deed from Duncan, in 1857 or 1858, Diden had the lands run out, and went around the entire outside boundary of all of his lands, and marked the outside line, so as to have a clearly marked line between him and adjoining owners.

"It appears that he adopted a mark of his own; it being a cross-jack, or mark. It further appears that it was his custom, so long as he lived thereafter, to go around his lines at frequent intervals—the proof shows about once every year—and remark the lines, marking not only the line trees, but pointers, so as to clearly show the location of his lands. As we say, he is shown to have done this from probably 1857 or 1858 up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1871. It is also shown that in 1859 E. R. Diden made a will, and treated his farm as one entire tract, and this will was acknowledged and registered, and it is shown that he thus consolidated all the tracts, and from that time on until his death in 1871 held them under the consolidations; and it is further said, which is true, that in 1866 he made the will, which was afterwards established, under which the defendant John S. Diden claims, in which he gives the boundaries of the tract as now claimed by John S. Diden, and it is said that he held under that until his death, and his son held it afterwards.

"While these are facts, we are of opinion that that treatment of the place by making a will, or by referring to it as his farm, or by marking the outside lines of all his tracts so to make it one tract, could not affect the rights of the parties under the statute of limitations. It must be remembered that the rights of defense and of title acquired under the statute of limitations are statutory rights, which can only be acquired on the terms and conditions prescribed by the statute, and under the limitations therein provided. The possession which becomes effective either in giving a defensive right or in procuring and tolling the title to land, is aside from actual inclosures purely a constructive one given by the statute.

"Now, the words of the statute are: 'That any person having had by himself or those under whom he claims seven years adverse possession, * * * holding by conveyance, devise, grant, or other assurance of title purporting to convey an estate in fee, * * * is vested with a good and indefeasible title in fee to the land described in his assurance of title.'

"And the holding has been, in accordance with this language, that the constructive possession herein provided for must extend to the bounds of the color of title under which a party claims the land on which his possession is located.

"Now, when we come to examine the facts in this case, we find that E. R. Diden's possession, except the occasional acts of possession we have referred to of the coal mines, was within the bounds of the 470-acre tract which was held under the deed of the 4th of April, 1851. If demand had been made upon him at the time he was holding the possession for a showing of title as to the land covered by his inclosures, he would simply have produced his deed of the 4th of April, 1851, and we are of opinion that the constructive effect cannot be extended beyond the bounds of that deed. To hold that, by marking lines covering other tracts, a man could consolidate the tracts or extend the effect of his possessions upon a single tract, would be in effect to hold that a man could by his own action amend and extend the effects of the statute of limitations. So we think the wills executed by E. R. Diden could have no effect, notwithstanding the fact that they were acknowledged and recorded, because he was not claiming under his will, but simply preparing a paper for others to claim under him. We are therefore of opinion that the possession held by E. R. Diden himself of the inclosed lands did not in any of its effects go beyond the bounds of the deed of April 4, 1851. In this conclusion we concur.

"It further appears that on September 10, 1866, E. R. Diden made a will, revoking one made in 1859, wherein he described all of the lands comprised in the Duncan deeds as one tract. In this will he provided that upon his death it would all become the property of his son John S. Diden, provided his wife, Esther Diden, did not survive him, in which case, quoting from the will, 'she is to have dominion over this farm whereon we live and to be supported until her death, and at her death John Steven Diden, my youngest son, takes it for his own property for himself, heirs, and assigns, freehold, forever.' It appears that E. R. Diden died in 1871, and his widow, Esther Diden, survived him until 1888, during which time she and her son, John S. Diden, lived at the old home place on the 470-acre tract until 1879, when John moved away and took a possession outside the 470-acre tract, and at the place designated on the map as 'House John S. Diden.'

On the subject of this possession the Court of Chancery Appeals reports:

"The possession known as the 'John Diden possession,' and marked on the map as house and field, lying on both sides of the county road, and about the center of the property claimed by John S. Diden under his father's will.

"We find from the evidence," says the court, "that John S. Diden went to his place after his father's death, and after his marriage in the year 1879, cleared up the tract of land, and built a house. He cleared from 20 to 30 acres at this place, improved and inclosed the same, built a house, and has remained on it and in possession of the same continuously to this time, a period of some 28 years before the bill was filed in this case. His occupancy of this place had been peaceful, continuous, open, and notorious, and adverse to all, claiming under his father's will, which purports to convey a fee, and for a period of 28 years prior to the filing of the bill.

"On December 24, 1884, John S. Diden and wife conveyed to J. H. Parker & Co. the mineral interest in certain contracts designated on the maps as 'John S. Diden to Glenmary Coal & Coke Co.' extending to the W. L. Davis tract on the east. The conveying clause of that deed is as follows: 'The party of the first part has this day optioned and sold to John H. Parker & Co., the second named party, all of the minerals, etc., coal, iron, fire clay, gas, oil, lead, sulphur, marble, rock, etc., in or under the certain tract of land herein set forth and described' (embracing 342 acres). The deed also contains the further provision: 'Now it is agreed that said party shall have the necessary timber off of said land for the purpose of carrying on any work or business they may engage in in the pursuit of mining, etc., and it is further agreed that they have the right to enter upon said land in search of coal, oil, etc., at any time they choose within the next two months.'

"On March 19, 1890, Parker & Co. executed a deed for the same mineral interest to G. W. Chandler, and on the same day Chandler deeded it to the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company."

As already observed, complainants seek by this bill to recover all the coal mineral in the lands lying within their Eastland grant and the tract described in the will of E. R. Diden, except the land covered by the 470-acre tract conveyed by James S. Duncan to E. R. Diden April 4, 1851. In his answer the defendant John S. Diden claims the land described in his father's will; but it is shown that he conveyed the W. L. Davis tract, with the minerals, and also the minerals in the tract comprising 242 acres, described and designated on the map as conveyed by John S. Diden to Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, and the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, claims both of these tracts under John S. Diden.

The defense relied on is possession under the statute of limitations. The position relied on is that no one has the "Diden old home place," or has the "Diden old field" held by old man E. R. Diden. The Court of Chancery Appeals finds:

"There was some 40 or 50 acres cleared up at this place, and that E. R. Diden, the father of John S. Diden, moved upon this tract in 1850 or 1851, his deed from Duncan being dated April 4, 1851, and he then made these clearings and improvements, though the original clearings and improvements were doubtless extended, and he lived on this place until his death in 1871. During that time he was in open, notorious, peaceful possession of this place, holding it adversely to all the world.

"This possession was wholly within the boundaries of the 470-acre tract first purchased and covered by the deeds from Duncan to him, dated 4th of April, 1851. It is not denied that E. R. Diden and his son, John S. Diden, obtained a perfect and complete title to this tract of 470 acres, and as to this tract the complainant on the hearing dismissed his bill."

In respect of the possession of the coal mineral interest covered by John S. Diden to Parker & Co., December 24, 1884, and now held by the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company under mesne conveyances, the Court of Chancery Appeals report:

"That under this conveyance, made by Diden to Parker & Co., he (Diden) has remained in the actual adverse possession of this land, not claiming, however, the mineral interest as against his grantee and their successors; and the legal question presented is as to the effect of this holding of Diden as against the complainant. It is not claimed, as we understand, that Parker & Co., jointly, or the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, have themselves, since the deed made to them by Diden, had any actual possession of the coal or any part of the land west of the W. L. Davis tract and within the bounds of the conveyance to them by the deed of Diden made the 24th of December, 1884."

However, the Court of Chancery Appeals held as a matter of law, although John S. Diden executed this deed to Parker & Company before he had acquired, by adverse possession or otherwise, any title to the minerals therein, yet his possession at the place designated "House John S. Diden" inured to the benefit of Parker & Co., vesting in them title to the minerals in the 242-acre tract at the expiration of 7 years from the establishment of that possession in 1879, and as to all these interests dismissed complainants' bill. A decree, however, was pronounced in favor of complainants against Young & Foster for the mineral interests on a tract comprising 400 acres, which will be noticed on their appeal.

Complainants appealed from so much of the decree as denied them any recovery of the mineral interest embraced in the other tracts, and their first assignment is that the Court of Chancery Appeals erred in not pronouncing a decree in favor of complainant Samuel McBurney, and against the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, for the coal in the 342-acre tract, which is particularly described in the deed executed by John S. Diden to Parker & Co. on December 24, 1884. This tract lies in the northwestern portion of the Diden lands, and is described on the plat as "John S. Diden to Parker & Co., December 24, 1884," and lies between the north line of the Diden lands and the south line of the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company's lands, and extends on the east to the W. L. Davis tract.

The position of defendant is that after the execution of the deed to Parker & Co., on December 24, 1884, the possession of John S. Diden at his home place, which was begun in 1879, inured to the benefit of Parker & Co., and vested them with title to the mineral and mining rights therein described.

The question propounded on this assignment of error is res integra in this state, and presents a question of much difficulty and perplexity. The nature of the estate created by the severance and segregation of the mineral interests in a tract of land under a separate conveyance seems to be well established by the authorities. In Delaware &

Hudson River Co. v. Hughes, 183 Pa. 69, 38 Atl. 569, 38 L. R. A. 826, 63 Am. St. Rep. 743, it was said:

"The general principles regulating the titles to upper and lower estates in the earth's crust are pretty well settled by our own cases. The ownership of the surface carries with it, if there be no obstacle to the application of the general rule, title downwards to the center of the earth and upwards indefinitely. So long as mineral deposits remain in place, they are part of the freehold, and pass with it by deed, gift, or other form of conveyance; but, when the minerals are removed from their position or bed by mining, they become personal property, and are sold like other personal chattels. If the owner grants to another the right or privilege of taking coal from his lands, this grant, if not an exclusive one, is not the grant of an interest in land, but of an easement or incorporeal right, which leaves the title to the coal in place remaining in the grantor. But a grant of all the coal or of the exclusive right to mine the coal, is a sale of the coal in place. The conveyance of the coal creates in the vendee an interest in land. The deed or other conveyance is within the recording acts, and is subject to all the rules and regulations governing conveyances of the surface. It may convey an estate in fee simple in the coal or other mineral, or any lesser estate, in the same manner and by the same words of grant made use of in conveyance of the surface. When such a conveyance has been made of the coal or other mineral, it works a severance of the estate so conveyed from the surface, and, if the deed be recorded, it is constructive notice to all the world of the fact of severance. Thenceforward the owner of the soil may cultivate, inclose, and reside upon his estate for any length of time; but his possession will not extend below it. It will not grasp or affect in the slightest degree the estate below him which has been severed by the deed," etc.

In Barringer & Adams on the Law of Mines and Mining, p. 36, the rule is thus stated:

"A conveyance of all the minerals, or a defined part or kind thereof, in or under a tract of land, passes an estate therein in fee. If the description is sufficient to contain the whole of the minerals, it is unimportant whether they be described as such, or the conveyance be of the usufructuary rights to them, provided those rights are equivalent to the permanent or absolute ownership. Such an owner has all the rights of an owner of land in fee, with the same remedies to assert and defend those rights and to protect his title. The ownership of the mineral is vested immediately upon the delivery of the conveyance. The minerals in place, then, being land, are conveyed in the same manner and are subject to the same rules, as regards their transfer, as land is. The statute of frauds and the law governing the transfer of interest in real estate are applicable to the transfer of such interest in the minerals. A separate estate in the minerals may be created, not only by an affirmative grant, but also by reservation or exception in a conveyance of the land."

In Murray v. Allred, 100 Tenn. 100, 43 S. W. 355, 39 L. R. A. 249, 66 Am. St. Rep. 740, this court recognized this doctrine and quoted with approval from Chartiers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon, 152 Pa. 286, 25 Atl. 597, 18 L. R. A. 702, 34 Am. St. Rep. 645, as follows:

"It often happens that the owner of a farm sells the land to one man, the iron or oil or gas to another, giving each purchaser a deed or conveyance in fee simple for his particular deposit or stratum, while he retains the surface for cultivating purposes precisely as he held it before. The severance is complete for all legal and practical purposes. Each of the separate layers or strata becomes a subject of taxation, of incumbrance, levy, and sale, precisely like the surface."

The next question presented is what constitutes an adverse possession of the mineral strata or deposit, after the title thereto has been separated from the title to the surface.

In White on Mines & Mining, p. 32, the principle is thus stated:

"But, where there has once been a severance of the title to the minerals from the title to the surface, the presumption of ownership in the minerals no longer exists in favor of the party in possession of the surface; but, on the contrary, the ownership of the minerals is supposed to follow the title to the same, and, in the absence of proof of the possession of the mineral strata, evidence of the possession of the surface will not avail to establish a title by adverse possession to the minerals."

Barringer & Adams thus state the rule at pages 59 and 69:

"Where the ownership of minerals in place is severed from the ownership of the soil or surface, the mere possession of the latter is not such a possession of the minerals beneath as to be adverse. Nor will the non-user of the minerals, or the right to dig them, by the mine owner, convert the possession of the surface owner into an adverse possession of the minerals. The latter must perform some act adverse, hostile to the rights of the mine owner, which prevents him from exercising his rights. The surface owner, setting up the statute, must establish a possession of the mine as such, independently of his possession of the surface. Such a possession must be actual, notorious, exclusive, continuous, peaceable, and hostile for the statutory period; and in these respects, the surface owner is in no better position than the stranger. No act or acts on his part will establish title in him which would not give title to a stranger. Actual possession is taken by the opening of mines and carrying on of mining operations."

On this subject the exact findings of the Court of Chancery Appeals are as follows:

"Since the conveyance by John S. Diden to Parker & Co. he [John S. Diden] has remained in the actual adverse possession of the land, not claiming, however, the mineral interests, as against his grantees and their successors; and the legal question presented is as to the effect of this holding of Diden as against the complainant. It is not claimed, as we understand, that Parker & Co., Chandler, or the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company have themselves, since the deed made to them by Diden, had any actual possession of the coal or any part of the land west of the W. L. Davis tract, and within the bounds of the conveyance to them by the deed of Diden made the 24th of December, 1884.

"The claim on behalf of the complainants is that they are entitled to recover this mineral interest because, up to the time of Diden's conveyance to Parker & Co., Diden had been in actual, adverse possession of the land only about five years. And the insistence is that the effect of Diden's deed was to sever the coal in this tract from the rest of the estate, and that thereafter his possession (Diden's) did not protect the coal interests, and that, the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company and Parker & Chandler not having themselves had possession, they have acquired no defense to the complainants' older and better paper title."

Upon these facts that court held:

"In this case the conflict is not between parties claiming under the same chain of title, but between parties claiming under entirely separate and distinct chains of title. It appears to us that the better, safer, and most sensible rule would be to adopt the rule established in those cases where there is a joint or mixed possession by heirs and life tenants, or by mother and child, guardian and ward, etc., where the possessions are held to be consistent, and in harmony, and all under the same title. While it is true that coal, minerals, etc., may be by deed severed and separated from the rest of the land and become subject to the laws of devise, descent, and conveyance, as in their nature they are inseparably mixed and connected with the balance of the land, a conveyance of the minerals in a tract of land does not in the technical sense of the word create a separate and distinct estate; but it separates a part of the property from the balance, and the right of ownership and control of coal and other minerals may be, and usually is, in entire harmony and consistent with all other rights of ownership to the surface and any other parts of the land. Where a particular mineral, as oil, coal, iron, or marble, is conveyed by a specific term covering that particular mineral, and not by a general term, only that would pass, and all other minerals would remain with the property of the owner of the fee; and, where a mineral which has been conveyed is taken or removed from the land, the owner of such a mineral ceases to have any other right or interest in the lands, and the land then all belongs to the owner of the fee and surface. The right to own and take a mineral upon a tract of land is confined to the ownership and taking alone, and cannot otherwise interfere with the rights of dominion and possession of the owner of the balance of the land. It is in reality simply a right to enter and go upon the land and take therefrom the particular mineral conveyed, and when that is done the right is exhausted.

"Under such a right, a possession can only be to the extent of occupying so much of the land as may be necessary and proper for such taking, and it is not at all inconsistent with the other rights of possession and ownership by the owner of the balance of the estate or land.

"The situation we have presented here is that the complainants and others under whom they claim were claiming under a title entirely different and distinct from that under which the defendants claimed, and they were claiming the entire interest in the land, the surface as well as the minerals. They have only abated part of the claim—that is, the right to the possession of the surface, timber, etc.—because they have discovered that their rights to these interests at least are barred by reason of a possession held by the defendant Diden for a period of more than a quarter of a century, during which time they have left him undisturbed. It is true that in the meantime he has conveyed to another the right to the minerals that are upon this land, and the right to go upon the land and take therefrom these minerals, including the usual mining rights.

"We think the better rule and principle is to hold that such possession by a man who has conveyed the mineral rights to others is a possession in their interest, and in harmony with them, as well as for himself. If it be not so held in this case, we have this peculiar condition of matters presented: Diden by his deed conveyed to Parker & Co., and through them to the defendant Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, the mineral rights and mining rights; that is, the rights to go upon this land and take out these minerals, and to use the necessary timber on the land for mining purposes. Now, these parties are claiming under him and under his warranty, and, if they be ousted therefrom, can hold him liable on his warranty, and the loss will be occasioned by the entry of a party against whom he has been asserting an adverse right for a period of more than a quarter of a century. In addition to that, Diden has certainly been holding the land for all purposes as against the complainants, and is entitled to hold all of it for all purposes, unless it be held that the coal has been severed, so as not to protect it; and if it should be decided under this holding that the complainants have not lost their title to the coal, by what right or on what principle could it be held that they can enter upon the surface in order to reach the coal, and can it be held that they have the right to use the timber upon the land for mining purposes?

"We think, in a case of this kind, as heretofore said, the better holding would be that the possession of Diden inured to the benefit of his grantee, to whom the mineral and mining rights were transferred. Suppose Diden had held this tract of land for a period of six years, and then had conveyed to a neighbor the easement for a right of way for a private road over his land, and after that continued in possession for a period of a quarter of a century; could the complainants have come in and recovered possession of the land covered by this road, on the ground that there had been a severance? We think not. We are of opinion, as stated, that the better and more sensible rule, and the rule which will best promote and carry out the purpose and policy of the statute of limitations, by quieting titles, etc., will be to hold that the possession by a grantor (of a mineral interest and mining rights in property) of the surface will inure to the benefit of the grantee of such rights as against third parties; and such is our holding."

We are of opinion that the Court of Chancery Appeals announces a better rule than that indicated in the authorities we have cited from other states. We are the better contented with this rule in view of the fact that there would be no way of putting complainant in possession of these minerals if his title thereto should be established. The adverse possession of the defendants has deprived the complainant of an easement to remove this coal from defendant's premises, even if it belonged to complainant. Complainant could not assert a way of necessity over the land of defendant Diden to remove the minerals. The case of Pearne v. Coal Creek Mining & Mfg. Co., 90 Tenn. 627, 18 S. W. 402, was a case wherein a way of necessity was declared in a suit between parties and their privies, and it was not a case in which a way of necessity was asserted over the land of a stranger. In Logan v. Stogdale, 123 Ind. 376, 24 N. E. 135, 8 L. R. A. 60, the Supreme Court of Indiana, through Elliott, J., said:

"The theory is that, where land is sold that has no outlet, the vendor grants one over the parcel of which he retains the ownership. It results from this that a way of necessity cannot be successfully claimed over the land of a stranger, and, if the appellant here were asserting a right of way over a stranger's land, she could not succeed."

See, also, Ritchey v. Welsh, 149 Ind. 214, 48 N. E. 1031, 40 L. R. A. 106.

It is conceded that, as against the defendants, the complainant McBurney has no title or right of possession in the part of the land embraced in defendant's possession. There is no privity of contract in the estate between the complainants and defendants, but as to each other they are as strangers, and under well-settled principles there can be no way of necessity or right of easement over the defendant's land to remove minerals which may belong to complainants.

Complainants also assign as error the refusal of the Court of Chancery Appeals to pronounce a decree in their favor for the coal in so much of the homestead tract as lies between the 470-acre tract and the 342-acre tract.

The Court of Chancery Appeals held that complainants' title to the coal in this tract was divested by virtue of either the possession of the widow Diden after the homestead was laid off in 1880 or by John Diden's possession at his home place. It is insisted on behalf of complainant that his right of recovery is not defeated by either of these possessions for the following reasons:

(1) The Court of Chancery Appeals, in its additional findings, expressly found that the possession held by Mrs. Diden was the old E. R. Diden home place possession, and was never extended outside the boundaries of the 470-acre tract. That court also found that E. R. Diden held possession of the 470-acre tract from 1851 until his death in 1871, and that prior to his death he had acquired title to that tract.

(2) With reference to the John S. Diden home place possession, in its first opinion, the Court of Chancery Appeals found that he (Diden) had a possession for more than seven years before this suit was brought, after the death of his mother, within the tract now in question.

In its additional findings that court reported upon this subject as follows:

"The proof shows, and we find, that John Diden first cleared six acres in 1879 at the point where he now lives, but that very soon after that he extended his inclosures so as to cover 40 or more acres, and that these extensions and inclosures have been there from shortly after he cleared the land until now, and we understand the effect of the proof is to show that these improvements made by John Diden were partly and for a considerable part within the lines of the homestead tract assigned to his mother, and part of his lines were outside of that tract."

It is insisted on behalf of complainants that this small possession across the homestead line, which was held by John Diden, could not, by construction, extend beyond the actual inclosures previous to the widow's death, because the right of possession had been vested by the court in the widow, nor could it extend by construction after her death, and the life estate had fallen in, because Diden had the acquired title to the small boundary thus inclosed, and there were no extensions of the actual clearings or inclosures thereafter.

The substance of the finding of the Court of Chancery Appeals is that the possession of John S. Diden, embracing that part of the possession which was included in the widow's assignment of dower, was kept up by John S. Diden all the time. His mother died in 1888, and John S. Diden continued his possession from 1888 until the bringing of this suit, a period of 14 years, and he had a possession of 1 or 2 years outside of some 470-acre tract, when dower and homestead were assigned to his mother. It thus appears that he had possession 7 years when dower was assigned to his mother. But John S. Diden had had his own new possession under his father's will on these lands for 1 year and more when dower and homestead were assigned to his mother. He continued these possessions 14 years after his mother's death. We think, therefore, the title of John S. Diden is perfected by the statute of limitation as to all lands claimed by him, including this particular portion of his land embraced within the assignment of homestead and dower, and outside of the 470-acre tract, and south of the lands in which he had sold the mineral to the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company.

We therefore are of opinion that this assignment of error should be overruled.

In conclusion, we find no error in the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals in its disposition of the alleged claim of Young & Foster to the minerals in the 397 acres. The Court of Chancery Appeals properly held that John S. Diden had not acquired title to this 400-acre tract after the decree of 1884 by adverse possession. That court finds that in 1884, in the McBurney suit, John S. Diden did disclaim title to this 400-acre tract, and we concur with that court in holding that thereafter his possession was not adverse or under any color of title. It appears that in 1884 his title had not been perfected to this 400-acre tract by any continuous possession for 7 years, and his possession after his disclaimer of title could not have that effect.

This disposes of this interest, and affirms the decree of the court of Chancery Appeals in adjudging that complainants are entitled to recover the coal interests in this tract.

In conclusion, we notice an additional assignment of error filed by complainant by leave of the court at the present term as follows:

"The Court of Chancery Appeals erred in not pronouncing a decree in favor of complainant Samuel McBurney and against the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company and Jas. S. Duncan for all the coal left within the lands described in the original bill as amended, and outside of the tracts described in the answers of defendants Duncan and Glenmary Coal & Coke Company."

It will be observed complainants sought in their original bill to recover of defendants all the coal contained in the Eastland grant, No. 21,879, except the tract known as the "Elisha Chaney lands." At a later date complainants dismissed the bill as to four small tracts and the 470-acre tract deeded by James S. Duncan to E. R. Diden on April 24, 1851. In his answer John S. Diden disclaims title to all the lands described in the bill, except the 1,700-acre tract described in E. R. Diden's will. Diden's answer expressly denies possession of claim to any of the land sued for, except that described in the answer. In its answer the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company denies generally that complainants are the owners of the coal sued for, but describes a number of tracts which it avers it owns. It is said some of these tracts lie outside of the land sued for.

The second and third tracts described in the answer are the two tracts that are designated on the map as the "Jno. Griffith tract" and the "J. C. Hamby tract," and the seventh and eighth tracts therein described, and the two tracts of land which lie inside of the boundary embraced in the Diden will, and known as the "W. L. Davis 157-acre tract," and the 342-acre tract lying west of the Davis tract. The Glenmary Coal & Coke Company has only set up title to these four tracts, and has disclaimed any interest in the balance of the land embraced in the description in the original bill.

The Court of Chancery Appeals held that complainants had deraigned a good title from the Eastland grant and were entitled to recover the coal in the land sued for, except the lands held by adverse possession under the statute of limitations, located inside the land embraced under the Diden will and the John Griffith and J. C. Hamby tracts. Now it claimed that the maps sent up with the transcript and made a part of the findings of fact of the Court of Chancery Appeals show a large boundary of land sued for which is not covered by any deed or title papers filed in the record by either of the various defendants, and to which, under the findings of the Court of Chancery Appeals, complainant Samuel McBurney has an absolute and undisputed title. The chancellor, however, dismissed complainants' bill as to the coal in all of the land sued for in said Eastland grant as against all of the defendants except Young & Foster, and this decree was affirmed by the Court of Chancery Appeals. This statement of fact made by counsel for complainants in support of his additional assignment of error, we think, is established by the record.

Now, it is said under these facts complainant Samuel McBurney is entitled to a decree for all lands embraced in the original bill as amended, and not described in the answers of John S. Diden and the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, and the failure of the chancellor and the Court of Chancery Appeals to pronounce such a decree was a mere oversight; the attention of both court and counsel having been absorbed in the contest over the controverted questions.

As already seen, the answer of John S.

Diden embraced a distinct disclaimer, while the answer filed on behalf of the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company only denied generally that complainants were the owners of the coal sued for, and then proceeded to describe a number of tracts which it claimed to own. This disclaimer on the part of the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company was not in exact accord with the rule. Says Gibson in Chancery, § 395:

"So if the bill seeks to recover more land than the defendant is in possession of, or is exercising acts of ownership over, he must disclaim as to so much of the land as he does not claim, or is not in possession of, or is not exercising acts of ownership over, and as to the part he does claim he must plead or answer. * * * Hence it is of great importance to the defendant to show distinctly in his answer by metes and bounds, or other definite description, the extent of his possession or claim, and to enter a full and absolute disclaimer as to the balance of the land sued for; otherwise, although he may defeat a recovery as to that part of the land which, outside of his answer, he really claims, he will be liable for the costs of the cause for contesting the complainant's right to all the lands sued for."

This is a clear statement of a familiar rule of pleading, and the answer of the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company, when tested by this rule, does not show a technical disclaimer. However, it appears that throughout this entire litigation all parties have treated the answer of the Glenmary Coal & Coke Company as a disclaimer of all lands sued for, excepting those specifically described in this answer. The complainant, however, failed in the chancery court, and also in the Court of Chancery Appeals, to ask for the relief which he seeks by the assignment of error filed in this court. The complainant has certainly established an undisputed title to the lands outside of the boundaries claimed by the defendants, and was entitled, as a matter of course, to a decree for the minerals in all the lands embraced in his title papers which were not contested by the defendants; but, since complainant has been at fault in not embracing these matters in his decree, he must be operated with the costs as a condition of permitting this relief.

The decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals will be affirmed, as modified. Complainant will pay nine-tenths of the cost of appeal, and the defendants Young & Foster one-tenth.

MISSOURI & N. A. R. CO. v. PULLEN.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. April 19, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 227*) — INJURIES TO LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—ACTION—PLEADING.

Where, in an action against a carrier of live stock for negligent failure to provide watering and feeding facilities, the carrier claims that the contract of carriage exempted it from such duty, it should not only refer to the contract, but specifically set forth the terms thereof limiting its liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 211*) — INJURIES TO LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—DUTY OF CARRIER.

The mere fact that a shipper of stock accompanied and agreed to water and feed the same did not absolve the carrier from the duty to furnish him ways and means to feed and water the stock, and, on failure to do so, it is liable for injury thereby sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 928; Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 84*)—CARRIAGE OF PROPERTY—PLACE OF DELIVERY.

The place where property is to be delivered by a carrier is at the usual place for making such delivery at the point of destination, unless the specific place is named in the contract of shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 290; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 218*) — INJURIES TO LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

Where no place for delivery was named in the contract, a shipper of stock has the right in course of unloading the same to take it to some place for its care, which is within a reasonable distance of the car, before it can be said that there is a completed removal, within the provision of the contract, reciting that as a condition precedent to recovery for damage for delay, loss, or injury, the shipper should give notice in writing of the claim therefor to the agent at destination, before such stock is removed from the point of shipment or from the place of destination, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 218*) — INJURIES TO LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

The removal of stock to the shipper's farm, 1½ miles from the car, was not an unreasonable distance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 218*)—CARRIAGE OF PROPERTY—TIME FOR UNLOADING.

A shipper of household goods and live stock is entitled to a reasonable time in which to remove the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 218*)—CARRIAGE OF PROPERTY—TIME FOR UNLOADING.

Where a shipper was compelled to take his goods and stock 1½ miles from the car for care and protection, a day and a half was not an unreasonable time for removal of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 218*)—CARRIAGE OF PROPERTY—DELIVERY—INDIVISIBLE SHIPMENT.

Where a shipment of household goods and live stock was made in one car, the carriage of the same was indivisible and was not completed until there was a delivery at the destination, so that the delivery of no part was completed until delivery of the entire shipment was made, provided the same was removed within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County; Brice B. Hudgins, Judge.

Action by B. B. Pullen against the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Smith and J. Merrick Moore, for appellant. J. W. Story (J. Sam Rowland, of counsel), for appellee.

FRAUENTHAL, J. On February 15, 1907, the plaintiff, B. B. Pullen, delivered for carriage at Mayfield, Ky., to the Illinois Central Railroad Company household goods and a number of head of live stock, and on that day that company, in consideration of $100, then paid to it by plaintiff, executed to him a written contract by which it agreed to carry said goods and stock from Mayfield, Ky., to Harrison, Ark. The goods and stock were shipped in one car and were transported to Memphis, Tenn., by the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and thence to Seligman, Mo., by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, and from that point they were carried by the defendant, the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad Company, to Harrison, Ark., the place of destination. The plaintiff in his complaint alleged that the defendant on its line of railroad unnecessarily and unreasonably delayed the carriage of said stock and negligently failed to provide facilities for watering and feeding same, from which causes the stock was greatly damaged, and for these damages he seeks a recovery. The defendant, in its answer, alleged that the plaintiff had an agent in charge of the stock whose duty it was to feed and water the same. It further alleged that the plaintiff shipped the stock under a contract limiting the liability of the defendant in this: That in consideration of reduced rates, the plaintiff agreed that as a condition precedent for any damages for delay, loss, or injury to the live stock, he would give a notice in writing of his claim in the manner as will hereinafter be more specifically set out, and on failure to comply with said condition of the agreement he should be barred from a recovery of any such claim; and defendant charged that he did not give such notice as he had contracted to do. The case was tried by the court sitting as a jury upon an agreed statement of facts, and a finding was made and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for $125. From this agreed statement of facts it appears that the stock was damaged in the sum of $125 by reason of the delay in shipping which occurred on the line of defendant's railroad. The answer of the defendant presents two propositions, the determination of which will decide whether there is any valid defense to a recovery for these damages.

1. The defendant urges: That the plaintiff or his agent was by the terms of the contract given free transportation and under the testimony did accompany the stock; that by one of the provisions of the contract, in consideration of such free transportation, it was the duty of the plaintiff to feed and water the stock; and that thereby the defendant was exempted from liability for failure to water and feed the stock. But in its answer the defendant did not set forth the alleged provision of the contract exempting it from liability in this regard, and did not specifically plead such provision. "If the company held a contract limiting its liability and relied as a defense upon the failure of the plaintiff to comply with the contract, it should not only have set up the contract, but should have stated the particulars in which plaintiff had thus failed." Kansas City, Pittsburg & Gulf Railroad Company v. Pace, 69 Ark. 256, 68 S. W. 62. It should in its pleadings not only refer to the contract, but also set forth the terms thereof specifically whereby its liability is limited. And in its answer the defendant has not set forth any provision of the contract that exempted it from liability by reason of the plaintiff or his agent accompanying the stock, and in its abstract it has not set forth any such provision. St. L., I. M. & Sou. R. Co. v. Randle, 85 Ark. 127, 107 S. W. 669; St. L. & N. Ark. Rd. Co. v. Wilson, 85 Ark. 257, 107 S. W. 978; 1 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 444. But even though this defense had been properly pleaded, it is not sustained by the evidence. The agreed statement shows that the car was delayed and held at Eureka Springs, Ark., by the defendant for an unreasonable time, and that plaintiff requested defendant to give him permission to unload his stock so as to attend to their wants and save them from injury on account of the delay, and the defendant would not give him that permission. The plaintiff attempted to and did all he could to give the stock the attention that was necessary and which the stock required, and the defendant failed and refused to furnish him the opportunity and facilities for the performance of that duty. The defendant thereby became liable for the injury which thus resulted to the stock, and it was agreed in the statement of facts that the stock was damaged by reason of the delay that occurred on defendant's line at that place. The mere fact that plaintiff accompanied the stock and agreed to water and feed same did not absolve defendant from all responsibility. The defendant owed to plaintiff the duty to furnish him the ways and means to water and feed the stock. In 2 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 641, it is said: "But even though, by virtue of the contract under which the animals are carried, it is the duty of the shipper to attend the animals, provide for their wants, and protect them from injury to themselves, yet if the carrier fails or refuses to furnish the shipper reasonable opportunities and facilities for performing the duties which he has undertaken, the carrier will be liable for the injury thereby sustained." 6 Cyc. 439. The defendant is therefore liable for the damages to the live stock thus caused by the unnecessary and unreasonable delay in their carriage and the negligent failure to furnish facilities for watering and feeding said stock while same was being transported by the defendant on its line of railroad.
